It is, however, said that the voter has the right to suppose that all his party nominees will be on his party ticket. The constitution neither expressly nor impliedly confers any such right. If he be possessed of any intelligence whatever, he cannot fail to see at once the vacant space upon the ticket, and to know that, if he desires to vote for a congressman, he must check one of the two candidates, or write a name in the blank space. Both the opportunity and the facility to vote are afforded. If it be said that the voter who does not examine his ticket may by this means be deprived of his vote for an office, it may also be said with equal certainty that, if another candidate than the one nominated by the convention is upon it, he will probably vote for the man who he had no reason to suppose was on his ticket, and for whom he never intended to vote. The ballot prepared under the present law challenges the voter's attention by the vacant space upon his party ticket to the fact that, if he desires to vote for a candidate for that office, he must seek his name upon other tickets, or write a name upon his own ticket. It is apparent that this law will tend to secure a more intelligent vote than if the name of the candidate was upon all three tickets. It is alleged in the answer that the convention of one of the political parties did not expressly authorize its committee to fill any vacancy, and that its congressional candidate withdrew, and such committee placed the name of the relator upon its ticket. It is alleged by the respondents that corrupt bargains have been made, between unscrupulous managers of different political parties, by which one candidate has been bought off and another substituted, and that new political parties have been organized by unscrupulous men for the sole purpose of bargain and sale, and that the purpose of this law is to prevent these corrupt deals between corrupt politicians. No fraud is charged in the present case, but it affords an illustration of the opportunities for such trades which every good citizen condemns, and which should, if possible, be prevented by law.

It is also insisted that the candidate has the constitutional right to have his name appear upon the ticket of every party which indorses him. It gives every candidate the right to have his name appear upon the ticket once. Naturally, it belongs in the column of that party with which he is openly affiliated; but if he chooses to have his name attached to the ticket of some other party, and that party does not object, he possesses that right. But I know of no reason or authority for saying that any candidate possesses the constitutional and inalienable right to have his name appear more than once upon the official ballot containing the tickets of two or more political parties. The Australian ballot contemplates that his name shall be there but once. It follows, then, that every voter has a reasonable opportunity to vote for him. This is the sole constitutional right guaranteed him. He has no occasion to find fault so long as he is permitted to have his name upon the ballot upon such ticket as he chooses, with the constitutional right following of an opportunity given to every voter to vote for him, which he can do by simply making two crosses instead of one. The law is general, and aims at no political party. One party may be affected at one election, and another at another, or all parties may be affected at one election, some in one locality and others in another. It does not prevent coalition between different political parties, which is often very commendable and patriotic. It does not deprive the members of those political parties of the means to put their coalition into effect by their votes, but furnishes all reasonable facilities for so doing. It only requires some degree of intelligence and care on the part of the voters.

We hold the law to be constitutional.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

OHIO GAS FUEL CO., Plf. in Err.,

Louisa ANDREWS.

(50 Ohio St. 685.)

The provisions of section 3561a, Rev. Stat., imposes on plaintiff in error the duty of keeping under its control natural gas while it is transporting the same, and if damages should result to others, without their fault, by its explosion, while being thus transported, the plaintiff in error will be held liable therefor, although not negligent in regard thereto.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Mahoning County, to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's building by reason of defendant's negligence in permitting gas to escape into it. Affirmed.

This note is strictly confined to the question of negligence in allowing an escape of gas and for explosions occasioned thereby, and does not include cases wherein gas companies' actions have been held to create a nuisance, neither does it include cases wherein the companies' actions have been held remedial by way of injunction.

As to natural gas, see note to People's Gas Co. v. Tyner (1892) (Ind.) 16 L. R. A. 443.

As to the transportation and supplying of natural gas as a public business and the municipal control thereof, see note to Saltburg Gas Co. v. Saltburg (1890) (Pa.) 10 L. R. A. 193.

The question of explosions caused by the manufacture of gun-powder, nitro-glycerine, and other explosives will form the subject of another note; and the question of liability for the escape and explosion of gas in mines will also be treated later.

I. General doctrine governing such actions.

The common law declares that he who puts in action anything which he cannot control must answer 29 L. R. A.

pleas of Mahoning county, a judgment for damages caused to her property by an explosion of natural gas while the same was being conducted by plaintiff in error along one of the streets of the city of Youngstown. The judgment was affirmed by the circuit court. The facts necessary to understand the decision will be stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hine & Clarke and George F. Arrel, for plaintiff in error:

Section 8324 of Revised Statutes provides that a company having control or management of a railroad shall construct or cause to be constructed and maintained in good repair on each side of such road along the line of the lands of the company a fence sufficient to turn stock, and further provides that such company shall be liable for all damages sustained in person or property in any manner by reason of the want or insufficiency of any such fence.

In construing section 8324, this court determined that there is no liability on the part of the company for damage which results from defects in an otherwise sufficient fence if the company is free from fault or neglect.

for all the consequences, leading to the affirmative rule that where an agent so introduced is controllable by care, attention, or science, he who receives the emolument must take the responsibility. Holding v. Liverpool Gas Co. (1846) 8 C. B. 1, 5 N. Y. Legal Obs. 77, Anthon, N. P. 353, note.

Negligence in cases of this description as in others may be either in omitting to do something which, in the exercise of ordinary care and skill, ought to have been done, or in the doing an act dangerous in itself under circumstances in which it cannot consistently with ordinary care and prudence be said that it should be done. Blenkiron v. Great Central Gas Consumers Co. (1860) 2 Fost. & F. 437.

Before a gas company can be liable for negligence it must have been guilty of it, and it will not be charged for the negligence of another over whose movements it has no control or ordinary authority and whose negligence it has no reason to anticipate, and though the doctrine may in some cases expose it as a defendant to an action where, if the action were brought by another person for damages resulting from the same cause, he would not be liable, yet it works no injustice as it never allows a party to recover unless his adversary has been guilty of negligence and he himself is free from it. Lannes v. Albany Gas Light Co. (1865) 46 Barb. 264, affirmed 44 N. Y. 450.

There is a great difference between bringing upon one's premises a dangerous substance or element for private profit, and the introduction of that substance or element for public convenience by authority of law; in the former case a person may well be held responsible for results which naturally arise out of the dangerous character of the thing itself, as he may be said to assume the risk of all the consequences just as a man assumes the risks of all accidents happening from keeping upon his premises animals which are ferre nature, without regard to any question of negligence in the keeping, while on the other hand no man can be held responsible for doing that which he is expressly authorized by law to do unless he is guilty of some

Unless there is negligence no action will lie against a municipality authorized by law to manufacture and furnish gas. Ibid.

A violation of the contract of a gas company, or any unauthorized intrusion, must be redressed as all ordinary wrongs are redressed, by the usual legal remedies, the injured party having a remedy for any grievance. People v. Mutual Gas-Light Co. of Detroit (1878) 38 Mich. 154, 156.

Such a company is, as every one else should be, held responsible for its unlawful acts or their consequences, when by the exercise of ordinary judgment it could have foreseen the danger. Louisville Gas Co. v. Gutenkuntz (1884) 82 Ky. 482.

As a defendant it is bound for the consequences of its own negligence, though those consequences were not and could not by any ordinary prudence have been anticipated; while a plaintiff is bound only to a knowledge of the probable consequences of the facts of which he was cognizant, and to that ordinary prudence which the circumstances required, exercising reasonable care for his own safety. Oil City Gas Co. v. Robinson (1881) 99 Pa. 1, 5.

In such actions, as in others, no exact legal definition can, however, be given of the words, "with ordinary prudence and care," which will embrace all their meaning and be precisely applicable to every possible case, there being no such thing as an absolute standard of ordinary care and prudence to which the conduct of individuals in each particular instance can be brought, and by which it can be compared and tested. Holly v. Boston Gas-Light Co. (1857) 8 Gray, 123, 69 Am. Dec. 233. See Smith v. Boston Gas-Light Co. (1880) 129 Mass. 318, infra, head, III. a.

Yet care and diligence should always vary according to the exigencies which require vigilance and attention, conforming in amount and degree to the particular circumstances under which they are to be exerted. Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co. supra.

The vigilance and attention required of the company must in such cases conform to the nature of the emergency and the danger to which others may be exposed, and must always be judged of according to the subject-matter; the danger and force of the material under the defendant's charge. Hutchinson v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1877) 122 Mass. 219.

A gas company is bound to exercise reasonable care, and the degree of care depends upon the degree of danger, the duty increasing with the degree of danger where parties have a dangerous element under their control. Butcher v. Providence Gas Co. (1878) 12 R. I. 149, 34 Am. Rep. 623.

There must, as in other cases of negligence, be an omission to do something which a reasonable man acting upon considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs would do, or the doing something which such a man would not do. *Hutchinson v. Bradbury, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record discloses that the plaintiff in error, a body corporate, was engaged in transporting, in pipes, natural gas to the city of Youngstown, and underground, along its streets, to supply its inhabitants with fuel; that the defendant in error owned valuable improved real estate in said city, the improvements of which were substantially destroyed by an explosion of the gas while in course of transportation along a street of said city adjacent thereto.

Upon the trial of the action in the court of common pleas, the evidence tending to show that the explosion occurred without negligence of the plaintiff in error; and in contending that it was not liable for the results of such explosion, in the absence of proof of its negligence contributing thereto,—it requested the following separate propositions to be given in charge to the jury by the court: “(1) If you shall find from the evidence that the gate or valve which defendant placed in its line of pipe broke by reason of some latent defect in the metal of which it was composed, which defect defendant did not dis-

The liabilities must grow out of the subject-matter and must be peculiar to it, and it is the duty of those who introduce such a dangerous agent and derive emolument from it, to understand it and provide all the safe-guards which science may from time to time develop. Holding v. Liverpool Gas Co. (1848) 8 C. B. 1, 5 N. Y. Legal Obs. 77, Anthon, N. P. 251, note.

One who owes a duty to the community, as such a company does, owes it as a general rule to every member of the community, and if any member suffers a special injury from a breach of that duty, an action lies. Mississinewa Min. Co. v. Patton (1891) 129 Ind. 472.

The proximate cause must be one without which the accident would not have occurred, and therefore where the existence of a gunny sack led to the experiment which caused the accident, it was held not to be the proximate cause of such accident. Taylor v. Baldwin (1899) 78 Cal. 517.

Thus if through the negligence of the defendant a current of their gas is set in motion, and in its course through the sewer and drain takes up other gases which are noxious and carries them into the house of the plaintiff, who is made sick thereby, the defendant's negligence is as much a proximate cause of the injury as if their own gas had caused it. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1864) 8 Allen, 169, 85 Am. Dec. 697.

Whether the act of permitting gas to escape, which in itself was not the cause of the explosion, can be said to have contributed to it in such direct or proximate manner as to justify the imputation of such negligence as would defeat a recovery for damages consequent upon the explosion, was said to be a question of some difficulty. Lannen v. Albany Gas Light Co. (1865) 46 Barb. 284, affirmed 44 N. Y. 450.

If a gas company has or ought to have knowledge of the construction of a sewer near to its own gas mains, it is its duty to guard against the damage likely to be sustained thereby if the injury to 29 L. R. A.

such mains is a natural and probable consequence of the construction of the sewer. Koelach v. Philadelphia Co. (1893) 18 L. R. A. 759, 152 Pa. 355.

The company is responsible for what may in the nature of things occur from its neglect, and its responsibility is not limited by what its officers may have thought to be improbable or even impossible. Oil City Gas Co. v. Robinson (1881) 99 Pa. 1, 5.

It is the duty of the company's agent to exercise such care as one of ordinary prudence and judgment in the discharge of a duty would be required to exercise for the safety of the premises from an explosive substance such as gas. Louisville Gas Co. v. Gutenkuntz (1884) 82 Ky. 432.

A defendant gas company, in managing a dangerous element, is bound not only to due care on the part of itself and its servants, but also to due care in preventing injury from the careless or wrongful meddling with its works on the part of others. Butcher v. Providence Gas Co. (1878) 12 R. I. 149, 34 Am. Rep. 626.

The handling of a key used by the agent of the company for turning off the gas in a street main, by a third person, is the ordinary and natural result of the negligent act of such agent in leaving it there for which the company is liable. Louisville Gas Co. v. Gutenkuntz (1884) 82 Ky. 432, 433.

It is the duty of a gas-light company, as of all incorporated companies invested, for their profit and advantage, with the privilege of supplying the community with light for private habitations and for other places devoted to public or private use, to exercise due care and diligence in keeping it constantly under their control, and preventing it from escaping into a dwelling-house or other place of business, where the inmates or occupants are in such cases involuntarily subjected to its effects, whether they are positively injurious, or merely disgusting or offensive. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1862) 3 Allen, 410.

So it is bound to exercise such care in the proper location, structure, and repair of pipes, as will pro-cover, or by the exercise of reasonable care could not have discovered, and that the escape of gas was due to such break, then the plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict should be for the defendant. (2) The court says to you that, in and about the laying and constructing of the line of pipe which the defendant laid in and along Boardman street, the defendant was not required by the law to use the best possible mode and appliances for laying and constructing such line; but it was only required to lay and construct its pipe line in such manner, and to employ such means and appliances to guard against the escape of gas, as were at that time in common use by persons of ordinary care and prudence, who were at that time engaged in the same, similar business, in similar locations. (3) The court says to you that, in and about the laying and constructing its line of pipe in and along Boardman street, the defendant was required to use only such care and precautions to guard against the escape of gas as prudent persons, who at the time when said line of pipe was laid and constructed, and who were then engaged in the same kind of business, were accustomed to use, under the same or similar circumstances. (4) If you shall find from the evidence that the fire by which plaintiff's property is alleged to have been destroyed, was caused by the gas escaping from the break which is alleged to have occurred in the gate or valve forming a part of defendant's line, but if you shall, nevertheless, find, from all the evidence in the case, that such break did not occur through any negligence on the part of the defendant, in any of the particulars set forth in the plaintiff's petition, but, on the other hand, occurred by reason of some casualty, over which the defendant had no control, and of which it had no knowledge in time to prevent the injury which may have resulted therefrom, then the defendant would not be liable, and your verdict should be in favor of the defendant. . . . (7) The burden of proving negligence is on the plaintiff, and, before there can be any recovery in this case, you must be satisfied, by a fair preponderance of the evidence, that the defendant was, in the manner averred in the petition, guilty of the negligence which directly resulted in the damage to the plaintiff by reason of the destruction of her property described in the petition, or some part thereof. (8) Before the plaintiff can recover in this action, she must satisfy you, by a fair preponderance of all the evidence, that the defendant was guilty of negligence in and about some of the particulars set forth in her petition; and, if you are not so satisfied that the defendant was guilty of negligence, your verdict should be in favor of the defendant."

The court declined to give either proposition to the jury, and, instead, instructed them as follows: "But if, on the other hand, you find that the defendant was engaged in the transportation of natural gas for the purposes mentioned; that the same escaped from the pipe line of the defendant, at the gate or vent an escape of gas dangerous to life and health. Smith v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1880) 129 Mass. 818.

And to use reasonable and ordinary care in so planting its pipes and mains as to prevent escape of gas therefrom in such quantities as to become dangerous to life and property. Mississinewa Min. Co. v. Patton (1891) 129 Ind. 472.

Being authorized to lay down their pipes and convey gas through them under the surface of the public streets, they must conduct their business in all its branches and in every particular with ordinary prudence and care. Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1857) 8 Gray, 123, 69 Am. Dec. 232.

The construction and care of the works being exclusively in the company's hands; and where no cause independent of some negligence on the company's part is shown to have produced the effect, the company is liable. Smith v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1880) 129 Mass. 818.

The contract is not to supply a pipe which might perhaps be defective until tested, but to supply a pipe reasonably sufficient for the purposes for which it is to be used, and therefore if the pipe supplied is defective and the consequence (the natural and necessary consequence) is that the gas escaped, and having so escaped a further natural consequence is that an accident might be expected to result, the company is liable. *Burrows v. Affording ample facilities to all parties interested, to make communications to them, having a sufficient force ready to be put in action and fully competent to supply and furnish a prompt remedy for all such accidents, defects, and interruptions in the conduct of their affairs, as from experience and the character and peculiarity of their works there is reasonable ground to anticipate may occur. Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1857) 8 Gray, 123, 69 Am. Dec. 232.

valve therein, while the same was being so transported, at the time and place and in the manner claimed by the plaintiff in her petition, and that the buildings were in fact destroyed by reason thereof, and that the same was the proximate and direct cause of the destruction of the buildings mentioned; and that the plaintiff's own acts and conduct did not contribute to the injury of which she complains,—then your verdict should be for the plaintiff, in such sum as the evidence shows you she has actually been damaged.”

The effect of the instructions thus refused and given was to render the plaintiff in error liable, if the explosion was the proximate cause of the injury, although the jury should entirely exonerate it from negligence in connection therewith.

The question of how strictly one who undertakes to transport through or along the highways of populous districts, or to store adjacent thereto, subtle and dangerous substances, like natural gas, should be held to the duty of absolutely controlling it, is both interesting and important; but we are relieved from the duty of discussing it, in the case before us, by the provisions of the statute under which the plaintiff in error was authorized to transport natural gas through the streets of Youngstown at all. That statute reads as follows: “. . . But said company shall be liable for any damages that may result from the transportation of the same.” This language is explicit and un-ambiguous. This court is asked to add to the language chosen by the legislature the word “negligent,” so that the statute may read, “But said company shall be liable for any damages that may result from the negligent transportation of the same.”

Upon principles of universal application, the company would be held liable for any damages that might result from its negligence in transporting natural gas through the streets of a city. Therefore, to construe the statute as the plaintiff in error contends would deny it any operation or effect whatever. We think that when the subtle and dangerous properties of this fluid are considered, together with the long existing, and perhaps still unsettled, controversy that has claimed the attention of courts and text-writers, both in England and in this country, respecting the extent of the liability of those who deal in dangerous substances, for damages caused by them, the absence of the word “negligent,” in the act declaring the liability of the plaintiff in error has great significance, and can only be reconciled with a legislative purpose to impose upon the company the duty of absolutely controlling this substance when it should introduce it into places where, if it escaped control, it would menace the lives and property of others, who had no control over it, and who were without fault themselves contributing to injury.

Judgment affirmed.

It is, however, manifestly impossible for a gas company to have at its service at every moment and every point of exposure an adequate force to overcome a sudden fracture of its pipes, or any other casual or unexpected obstacle in the conduct of its affairs in the shortest possible time. Ibid.

If the system is all right and all due preparation has been made in advance, and the force which can be commanded is applied in a proper manner to the reparation of the brake in the pipes or correction of any disturbance in the regular operation of its business, it cannot be held to have failed in the exercise of ordinary care, even though it happens that owing to the occurrence of several interruptions or leaks at the same moment of time, through an extraordinary state of the weather, or other unforeseen causes, a particular defect should not be overcome with the same promptitude and dispatch that it might be under other and more favorable circumstances. Ibid.

Admitting that the main pipes were in all respects properly constructed and secured, yet if the city officials knew or ought to have known, previously to the time of the explosion, that such pipes were in a defective condition, and failed to have them properly repaired, such default would fix the liability for the explosion on the city. Kibele v. Philadelphia (1884) 105 Pa. 41, 44.

In order, however, to ascertain whether due diligence has been exerted on the part of a gas company in any particular instance, it is necessary to know what is its general system and what are the means of relief at its command and within its control. Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co. supra.

Probability of danger is to be taken into account but not that which arises when the elements with unprecedented power overcome all ordinary restraints. Hutchinson v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1877) 122 Mass. 219.

A city as a manufacturer of gas is bound to know about its character, and to take care that through the default of its officers or servants the article manufactured and sold occasions no harm to any one. Kibele v. Philadelphia (1884) 105 Pa. 41, 44.

Although gas companies having the right or use of the streets for laying the gas pipes, cannot interfere with or prevent the building of a sewer, yet they have a right to and are bound to see that in restoring the earth to its place, their own pipes are properly supported, and, if injured, to see that the injury is repaired within a reasonable time, any negligence on their part rendering them liable. Butcher v. Providence Gas Co. (1878) 12 R. I. 149, 84 Am. Rep. 622.

Where the loss and injury sustained were the result of the negligence of a gas fitter, and of the gas company, the former being the proximate and the latter the main cause of the explosion, the court held the plaintiff was entitled to hold both responsible for what occurred, the former's negligence co-operating with that of the latter, the act of sending for a gas fitter to ascertain the escape of gas not being a negligent but a prudent act. Schermerhorn v. Metropolitan Gas Light Co. (1874) 5 Daly, 144. Burrows v. March Gas & Coke Co. (1870) L. R. 5 Exch. 69, 39 L. J. Exch. 33, 22 L. T. N. S. 24, followed.

In Holding v. Liverpool Gas Co. (1846) 8 C. B. 1, 5 N. Y. Legal Obs. 77, Anthon. N. P. 356, note, it was attempted to make the company liable by reason of there being no stop-cock on the outside of the meter so that it could turn off the gas entirely from the interior of the house when required, other companies having entire command of the gas by means of such appliance, the facts showing that the injury to the plaintiff's house by the explosion which proceeded from some unlawful destruction of the interior pipes by a burglar, could not have occurred had the company turned off the gas effectually by such a contrivance. The court below consulted the plaintiff, holding there was no duty cast by law up-

AMOS LEAP.

(.....Ind.)

1. Pipes for natural gas cannot lawfully laid on the surface of a highway.
2. Conducting natural gas at high pressure through poorly jointed pipes with numerous leaks, lying loose upon the ground where the public, including children and other inexperienced persons, daily pass, especially when it is laid on a public highway in violation of law, constitutes actionable negligence.
3. A company actually using natural gas which flows through a pipe over a highway crossing cannot escape liability the dangerous condition of poorly jointed and leaking pipes because the contractor who laid them has not yet formally turned over the plant to the company or fully completed his contract.
4. The acts on previous occasions of a person injured by an explosion of natural gas in defective pipes may be taken into account in determining his contributory negligence by showing his experience and knowledge of the danger, especially when previous disturbances of the pipes are charged to have been the occasion of the explosion.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hamilton County, in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendants' negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. P. Schlater and T. J. Terhune, with Messrs. Shirts & Kilbourne, for appellants:

A party can never be liable for injury arising from a work over which it has neither possession nor control.

If the company let the contract for the completion of such work to Doxey, and if Doxey sub-let such work to said Snow, as another independent contractor, then the Lebanon company cannot be liable for negligence.

Ryan v. Curran, 64 Ind. 355, 31 Am. Rep. 123; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Farmer, 111 Ind. 195, 60 Am. Rep. 696; New Albany Forge & Rolling Mill v. Cooper, 131 Ind. 368.

If Doxey had "possession," it must have been, in the opinion and mind of the jury, a bare, naked, legal possession wherein Doxey was unable to give directions or exercise controlling influence. Under the circumstances, on the defendant, and upon an application for a new trial, the court stated that the act under which the company was formed gave no directions as to the use of an outer stop-cock, and as the legislature was silent upon the point, the common law imposed no precise duty on the defendant, or any other duty than that expressed in the general doctrine of using proper and sufficient care in the supply of gas.

Where the plaintiff, who carried on business as a livery-stable keeper contrary to the Massachusetts statute, which requires a license, sought to recover damages for an escape of gas, the court held the case would not lie although he might sustain the action for nuisance to real estate. Sherman v. Fall River Iron Works Co. (1862) 5 Allen, 213.

II. Legislative and municipal control.

Although the public by reason of the gas company being authorized by the legislature may be barred from recovering damages, yet private persons may maintain an action for damages against such company. People v. New York Gas Light Co. (1872) 64 Barb. 55, 6 Lans. 467.

Even for consequential damages it is not exempt as a corporation by reason of its being so authorized by statute. Pottstown Gas Co. v. Murphy (1861) 39 Pa. 257.

Yet, in the absence of negligence, no such action for damages can be maintained for acts which are within the scope of an express authority conferred by law. Strawbridge v. Philadelphia (1879) 13 Phila. 173, 36 Phila. Leg. Int. 276.

III. Evidence.

a. In general.

In actions of this description the plaintiff must show that he is free from fault. Bartlett v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1877) 122 Mass. 209.

The question being whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the action of the plaintiff 29 L. R. A.

is that of a man of ordinary prudence and discretion, and if not and injury results from such action, the company will not be liable. Langigan v. New York Gas Light Co. (1877) 71 N. Y. 29.

Each separate and individual case must stand upon and be decided by the evidence particularly applicable to it. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1862) 3 Allen, 410.

As the fact that the agent of the defendant company was negligent as to the block on the other side of the street, does not of itself tend to prove that he or any one else was negligent in respect to plaintiff's premises. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1863) 6 Allen, 144, 33 Am. Dec. 621.

The mere fact that gas escaped into a certain block, not of itself tending to prove that it also escaped into the plaintiff's premises, and therefore not relevant. Ibid.

It is a proper subject of inquiry, in cases where it is insisted that gas infused into the air of a dwelling house is noxious to the health of its occupants, to inquire whether such is its usual, necessary, or probable effect. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1863) 3 Allen, 410.

The evidence should, however, be limited to the effect of the gas upon those who have in common and under similar circumstances inhaled it. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1864) 3 Allen, 169, 35 Am. Dec. 697.

As the case cannot be allowed to branch out into several collateral issues on such a point. Ibid.

Evidence that the inmates of another house were made sick, in consequence of inhaling the gas that escaped into their house from the same defect in the defendant's pipes, is inadmissible. Ibid.; Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. supra.

The reason being that the gas company's action could not in any degree have been, or have been required to be, influenced by facts of the existence of which it had received no information and of which it was entirely ignorant. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. supra.

So if the evidence falls short of proving that the under the doctrine of Ryan v. Ourran, Wabash St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Furcor and New Albany Forge & Rolling Mill v. Cooper, supra, Doney was not liable.

The appellee, being a person in full possession of his faculties, was bound to know that he was standing within the presence of one of the most dangerous agencies known to modern times.

The appellee was so clearly guilty of contributory negligence that he had no standing in court. The question is not only, what caused the injury, but, Did the plaintiff contribute?

gas caused the sickness of the other persons, it amounts to nothing. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. supra.

The attending circumstances may be so different that the occurrence of sickness in one house would have no tendency to show the cause of illness in the occupants of another. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. supra.

If the plaintiff have other relevant evidence, it is within the discretion of the court to reject this until the other is put in, the order in which evidence should be offered, being subject to the control of the judge. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1863) 3 Allen, 146, 38 Am. Dec. 621.

As the plaintiff cannot establish or strengthen the evidence in his own case by any proof concerning the condition of, or the injury sustained by, another. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1862) 3 Allen, 410.

Yet it is competent to show that gas has escaped from the defendant's pipe through the fracture into the sewers and into other houses in the neighborhood, the company being notified that it so penetrated and entered. Ibid.

Such evidence being confined to prove that certain gas was pervading the streets under which the company's pipes were laid, was in relation to a fact of which the defendants, after notice that the gas in consequence of a defect in their works was escaping in that vicinity, must be presumed to have had knowledge, or reasonable means of knowledge. Ibid.

So evidence as to the presence of gas in other adjoining premises has been held properly admissible. Butcher v. Providence Gas Co. (1873) 12 R. L. 149, 34 Am. Rep. 626.

And evidence of the particulars of the sickness of any one of the persons in the house with which the plaintiff was visiting, is a collateral fact, admissible merely for the purpose of showing the nature of the gas which came into the house, to the influence of which all the inmates were subjected alike. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1864) 3 Allen, 169, 35 Am. Dec. 697.

For if it be a fact that the inhalation of gas will produce sickness or generate disease, such fact being determinable by the jury upon evidence submitted to them, the defendants are bound to exercise that care and diligence in its control and management which is reasonably sufficient to guard the public against its deleterious effects whether their agents are aware of its bad influences or not. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1862) 3 Allen, 410.

How far the plaintiff should be permitted to go into particulars in offering such evidence should depend somewhat on the circumstances of the case, and must, within reasonable limits, be left to the discretion of the presiding judge. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. supra.

It may be shown by evidence which excludes fault; and in a case where there was nothing which excluded the inference that both mother and child went to sleep in the usual manner, with nothing to indicate that there was any unusual exposure to injury, and they were suffocated in their sleep by the gas which escaped from the defendant's pipes, they were held to be in the exercise of such care as prudent people ordinarily use under circumstances of similar exposure to injury from hidden and unsuspected causes. Smith v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1890) 129 Mass. 318.

In an action against a gas company to recover injuries for an escape of gas, it is competent for the defendants after first obtaining from a witness testimony as to what was actually done by them or by persons in their employ, after the fact of the leak came to the company's knowledge, to show due diligence on their part by proving the system of the company in regard to complaints of leaks, how they were usually treated, and what was the established course of proceeding in applying remedies and making needful repairs. Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1857) 8 Gray, 123, 69 Am. Dec. 233.

The evidence of a witness that it was possible for gas to escape in the manner plaintiff claimed, was held properly admitted in rebuttal. Butcher v.

The whole case proceeds upon the theory that this boy was, for the purposes of this case, a man.

See Dietrich v. Baltimore & H. S. R. Co. 58 Md. 354.

If while in the act of experimenting with this dangerous agency this explosive, inflammable material, he was injured, it must be held, as matter of law, that he was guilty of contributory negligence.

It is averred in this complaint that at the time of this injury the appellee was in full possession of all his faculties, which relieves this case from one view which has been taken by the courts in some cases.

Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Kincaid, 29 Kan. 654; Johnson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 49 Wis. 529; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Payne, 59 Ill. 534; *Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. In cases of this kind, where the appellants owe no duty to the appellee except that of humanity, no presumption of negligence would arise from the mere fact of an explosion.

Biddle v. Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. 112 Pa. 551.

Messrs. Kane & Davis for appellee.

Howard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Lebanon Light, Heat & Power Com-

Providence Gas Co. (1878) 13 R. I. 149, 34 Am. Rep. 626.

The mere fact that an explosion of gas, caused by the negligence of the company, was effectuated by the lighting of a match, will not relieve the company from liability. Koelsch v. Philadelphia Co. (1898) 18 L. R. A. 769, 152 Pa. 355.

But the simple fact that gas accumulated in a pit, though unusual and not according to the ordinary occurrence of events, will not give rise to a prima facie presumption that it was there by the negligence of the defendant, it being a mere circumstance to be considered in connection with the full facts of the case. Washington Gas Light Co. v. Eckloff (1894) 22 Wash. L. Rep. 656.

So evidence showing that a business was not specially dangerous when prosecuted with reasonable care, that there were suitable regulations, arrangements, and equipments, and reasonable care exercised, and that there was no neglect by the defendant to enforce such regulations, is sufficient to rebut the prima facie presumption of negligence in an action to recover damages caused by an explosion. Warn v. Davis Oil Co. (1894) 61 Fed. Rep. 651. In which case it was not sufficiently proved whether the explosion was caused by an escape of gas or by the nature of the articles manufactured upon the premises.

In Butcher v. Providence Gas Co., supra, plaintiff recovered damages for injuries to his plants in a green house caused by the defendant's negligence in allowing illuminating gas to escape from their pipes in the city sewers and drains, and thence into the plaintiff's green house.

The evidence of witnesses who passed along the highway and lived in the neighborhood of the house into which the gas escaped owing to a fracture in the main, entering plaintiff's house through the drains and sewers, as to what extent the gas escaped into the street, has been held admissible, being material as tending to show how rapidly and in what quantities the gas was escaping, thereby affording some means of judging as to the amount of force and labor to be applied in arresting its escape, and 29 L. R. A.

the alacrity with which it should be applied and as indicating the place where the leak occurred, and for that reason in connection with other evidence is available upon the question whether the defendants had been negligent and careless in not having discovered the leak earlier than they did. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1862) 3 Allen, 410.

If the company seeks to prove by a witness that the gas from its pipes was not escaping in great or dangerous quantities into houses in the vicinity of the plaintiff's, it is competent for the plaintiff to produce testimony tending directly to contradict it and to disparage the credibility of such party as a witness, the contradiction being only in relation to a collateral matter, and although such evidence may tend directly to contradict such a witness in relation to the answer which he may give to the inquiry, yet being in conflict with his testimony in chief, must be considered to have been material and therefore subject to be refuted by showing that he elsewhere made different statements on the subject in controversy, or to be disproved by any competent countervailing evidence. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1862) 3 Allen, 418.

In Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1864) 3 Allen, 109, 85 Am. Dec. 697, the plaintiff alleged that the gas escaped from the main pipe into one of the large sewers, and thence passed through a drain and up the sink spout into the kitchen of the house of a family with which the plaintiffs were at the time visiting. Plaintiff's evidence showing that the family they were visiting had been in perfect health up to the time the gas escaped, and that immediately or soon after, every member of the family became seriously sick, was held admissible.

So where the facts, as in the principal case, showed that the plaintiff's property was destroyed by an explosion of natural gas in transportation along a street in the city, without negligence; and it was contended that defendants were not liable for the results of such explosion in the absence of proof of negligence, the court held (under the Ohio revised statutes relating to the transportation of natural gas through the pany entered into a contract with its coappellant Charles T. Doxey, according to which the said Doxey was to construct a natural gas plant for the appellant company. The terms of this contract do not appear from the record. The appellant Doxey also entered into a contract with his coappellant John E. Snow, according to the terms of which the said Snow was to drill four gas wells in Hamilton county to supply gas for said gas plant. The wells were to be drilled at such points as Doxey should direct. Snow was to receive $625 for each well, and was himself to do all the work and furnish all labor; also fuel for the first well. He was to have the privilege of using gas from the first well or wells for drilling purposes. He was to pipe such gas at his own expense, except that Doxey was to furnish him the necessary pipes and fittings.

The four wells were located near the crossing of two highways. The first well was situated near the east and west highway, and about half a mile west of the crossing. Doxey located well No. 2 near the north and south highway, and about three quarters of a mile north of the crossing. In like manner, well No. 3 was located by Doxey near the east and west highway, and about half a mile east of the crossing. Well No. 4 was not near the highway, but was located about a mile north of well No. 1. After drilling well No. 1, and when well No. 2 was located, Snow laid a two-inch supply pipe on top of the ground, along the north side of the highway, from well No. 1 east to the crossing, where he put in a T, and thence continued the pipe along the west side of the highway, north to well No. 2. After well No. 2 was drilled, and well No. 3 located, Snow continued the pipe line from the T at the crossing, east along the north side of the highway, to well No. 3. At the time of the accident, wells Nos. 1, 2, and 3 had been drilled.

The accident occurred September 20, 1890, about two weeks after the completion of well No. 3. Snow was then engaged at No. 4, away from either highway. Soon after well No. 3 had been completed, Doxey's men took up the pipe on the north and south highway, from the T at the crossing, north to well No. 2. There was then no gas in the pipe at the crossing. Snow was getting his gas from wells 1 and 2 for use in drilling No. 4, and it does not appear that he had anything further to do with well No. 3 or with the pipe on the highway.

Doxey's assistant testifies that he began taking up the pipe north from the crossing by cutting the second joint north of the T. He then took two pairs of tongs,—one to hold streets of a city, which provides, "but said company shall be liable for any damages that may result from the transportation of the same") that the language was specific and unambiguous, and could only be reconciled with a legislative purpose to impose upon the company the duty of absolutely controlling the substance whenever it should introduce it into places where, if it escaped control, it would menace the life and property of others who had no control over it and who were without fault themselves contributing to the injury.

b. Burden of proof.

As in other cases of negligence a party charging negligence as a ground of action must prove it; he must show that the defendant by his own act or by his omission has violated some duty incumbent upon him which has caused the injury complained of. Washington Gas Light Co. v. Eckloff (1894) 22 Wash. L. Rep. 656; Nitro-Glycerine Case (1873) 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 524, 537, 21 L. ed. 206, 211; Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1857) 8 Gray, 123, 60 Am. Dec. 233; Adams v. Carlisle (1838) 21 Pick. 146; White v. Winnisimmet Co. (1851) 7 Cush. 155.

He must allege facts showing that the injury was due to the defendant's negligence. McGahan v. Indianapolis Natural Gas Co. (1894) (Ind.) post, 255.

Showing some specific act or acts of negligence directly contributing to the result, there being no rule of law requiring individuals or corporations to provide against an overwhelming calamity which in the exercise of ordinary prudence could not have been foreseen. Hutchinson v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1877) 122 Mass. 219.

And it has been held that such a plaintiff must prove the use of ordinary care for his own protection against the noxious influences of gases. Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1857) 8 Gray, 123, 60 Am. Dec. 233.

It being for him to establish that his own negligence did not cause or contribute to the injury. Lee v. Troy Citizens Gas-Light Co. (1885) 98 N. Y. 115, 118.

One having no right to expose oneself carelessly and willfully to the injurious effects of gas, and thereby make the defendant responsible for the mischievous consequences resulting from such exposure. Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co. supra.

Although the burden of proof in these cases is upon the plaintiff to show the exercise of due care in respect to the occurrence from which the injury arises, yet it has been held that this, although in form a proposition to be established affirmatively, need not be proved by affirmative testimony addressed directly to its support. Smith v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1860) 129 Mass. 818.

Injuries which do not ordinarily happen when reasonable and proper care is taken to avoid them, afford a presumption of negligence and place upon the defendant the burden of proof that ordinary and reasonable care was taken to avoid the accident, the principle of evidence being that he who has peculiarly within his power the means of producing evidence of reasonable care shall be required to produce it. Warner v. Davis Oil Co. (1894) 61 Fed. Rep. 631.

A plaintiff charging the omission of the defendants to discharge their duties in keeping their pipes in a sound and safe condition for the transmission and distribution of gas, must, in order to maintain his action, show that they failed in that respect to exercise due and ordinary care. Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1857) 8 Gray, 123, 60 Am. Dec. 233; Adams v. Carlisle (1838) 21 Pick. 146; White v. Winnisimmet Co. (1851) 7 Cush. 155.

c. Expert testimony.

The evidence of expert witnesses has been held admissible in cases of this description and it has been held that it is for the presiding judge to decide whether a witness so offered has been proved an expert, the evidence on the point being addressed to him and not to the jury; and if it has been excluded, no part of his testimony tending to prove him such, can go to the jury. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1863) 6 Allen, 146, 38 Am. Dec. 621.

The testimony of a doctor as to his experience relative to the breathing of burning gas has no the first joint in place, and keep it from turning into the T, while the other tongs were used to unscrew the piece of the second joint which had been cut off. They then plugged up the end of the first joint with a two-inch wooden plug, and went on and took up the rest of the pipe north to well No. 2. When cutting the second joint, and unscrewing the piece from the first joint, and plugging the end of the latter, they did not examine the T to see if the joint of pipe was tight in it, but it seemed tight. There was no gas on that line at the time. The T was cast iron, and of heavier make than the pipe. It would weigh about 25 pounds. The joint of pipe left attached to it was about 19 feet long. It was about 12 feet from the nearest fence.

It does not appear how soon after the taking up of the pipe north of the T that the gas was again turned on, nor does it appear who turned it on, nor for what purpose or use it was turned on. Snow, as we have seen, had not used gas through this line since his completion of well No. 8, which was about two weeks previous to the accident. It does appear, however, from the testimony of Frank K. Pierce, an employé of the appellant Doxey, and superintendent of construction of the permanent line to Lebanon that that line was completed into the city of Lebanon, and gas furnished to the city, in the month of August, 1890, the month previous to the dates of the accident. But, for whatever purpose the gas was turned into the pipe between wells 1 and 3 after the taking up of the pipe north of the T, it is certain that between that time and the time of the accident the leak of gas at the T was observed frequently. It also seems very probable that the leak was noticed before the taking up of the pipe; but of this the evidence is not so marked, while it is clear that the leak grew worse from time to time up to the date of the accident.

The appellee was at the time about eighteen years of age, and lived with his father about 40 rods south of the crossing. Several persons testified that they saw gas on fire at the leak in the T on the day of the accident and at other times previous. John Griffin, who lived near the crossing, and who was the father of Warren Griffin, another boy who was hurt at the accident, testified that there had been a leak at the T, to some extent, ever since the pipe had been laid, and that the leak had been quite bad for some length of time previous to the accident. Others who had passed there frequently had never no-

As the mere fact that he is in practice as a physician does not of necessity give him any knowledge as to gas. Ibid.

Where the doctor's evidence was that he was a physician, and as such had witnessed the effects of the gas which escaped from the defendant's pipes at the time when the plaintiff alleged they were injurious, and the persons whom he saw lived in another house in the neighborhood, the mere fact that he was a physician would not prove that he had any knowledge of the gas without further proof as to his experience, as a physician may have professional learning without being acquainted with the properties of gas or its effect on health. Ibid.

Yet it is competent for the plaintiffs to show all the facts and circumstances attending their sickness, and to add proof of the opinions of persons of skill and experience as to the cause which produced such sickness and particularly whether it might have been or probably was produced by the gas to which they were exposed in their house. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1862) 3 Allen, 410. Upon the question as to whether or not due diligence had been used by the defendant company in making the excavations in the street necessary to enable them to find the place and cause of the leak in their pipe, the testimony of a witness offered as an expert should be received and submitted to the jury. Ibid.

Such evidence being intended to show with what dispatch, in the judgment of persons experienced in such work and competent to give a reliable opinion concerning it, that which was done by the defendants might have been accomplished in order to aid the jury in coming to a conclusion on the question whether, under all the circumstances of the particular case, the defendants were not guilty of negligence by failing to employ a sufficient number of men of vigor and activity, and of experience in that kind of labor. Ibid.

d. Sufficient to establish negligence.

failing to prevent the accumulation of inflammable gas in a pit on premises under their control, which the plaintiff in the discharge of his duty to his employer, a water company, was required to visit for inspecting and taking the register of the water meter fixed in the pit, over which the defendants had placed a shed which was dark and required the use of a light, which the plaintiff took for such inspection, when, gas having accumulated in the pit through percolation from a leak in the main pipes some thirty feet from the pit, an explosion occurred. The defendants contended that they owed no duty to the plaintiff, and that in order to maintain an action for a negligent injury it must appear that there was a legal duty owing from the person inflicting the injury to the person on whom it was inflicted, and that such duty had been violated by the want of ordinary care on their part. The court held that although such proposition might generally be conceded, yet it did not apply, defendant being under a contract duty to the municipal government to maintain the water meter upon its premises in good condition, and in such position that it could be approached and examined with reasonable safety by the agents of the municipal government, the defendant's duty being created by contract; the right of the plaintiff to go upon the premises of the defendant being derived from the municipal government, it was therefore a duty imposed upon the defendant to the plaintiff, even though there was no privity of contract between them, there being a right created by contract with the government that afforded protection to the plaintiff against the negligence or want of reasonable care on the defendant's part.

In Chisholm v. Atlanta Gas Light Co. (1876) 57 Ga. 28, the question was whether there was sufficient evidence to make out a prima facie case of negligence for the jury; the facts showing that the property damaged had been vacant; that on the evening of the explosion the plaintiff rented it for an evening, but no gas was used although gas fixtures were there; that defendant was notified of the house being vacant, that gas was not needed and must be cut off, which was done by means of a meter cock in the cellar; further, that there were two ways of cutting off the gas, one by the ticed the leak before that day. Some had smelled gas for a few days previously, but saw no fire. John Leap, father of the appellee, had seen it on fire about two weeks before, and had put out the fire with a bucket of water, but had not seen it burning on any other occasion.

The appellee himself testified that he had noticed the leak on fire about two months before the accident, and at different times all along up to the time of the accident. The last time previous he had seen it on fire was on the preceding Monday night. The accident happened on Saturday. On that Monday night, he says, there was a charivari party out, and they stopped for a while near the leak, and some one set it afire. It burned for five minutes or less, when they put it out, and went home. He did not touch the pipe or set the gas afire himself. He saw two of the party lift up the end of the link of pipe about four feet, and then let it down again. Appellee next saw the leak afire on the Saturday of the accident, about 10 o'clock in the morning. The blaze was then three or four feet high when he came up to it. The pipe at the T and across the traveled part of the road was covered with about an inch or two of earth. It had been so covered when first laid. He again saw the leak between 1 and 2 o'clock that afternoon. He was on his way afoot to Sheridan, a town about a mile north of the crossing. When he came up to the fire, he saw Warren Griffin, a boy about twelve years of age, standing there. He began talking to Warren about the nice time they had at the charivari. He noticed Warren with a small stick scraping along the dirt where the fire was burning. While they were standing there, a neighbor came along in a team going to Sheridan, and asked appellee to go along but he said he was not quite ready. Another neighbor, Mr. Raridan, passed along a minute or two later, and made some remark about the fire. The two boys were standing without talking during this time, when appellee testifies he said to Warren, "If that plug was taken out of that pipe, it would make a nice fire." He asked, "What plug?" and I went around and pointed to the plug. . . . the plug in the north end of the pipe. . . . He walked around to the end of the pipe, and raised the end of the pipe up somewhere about three inches, and that was the last I knew." The explosion followed, the joint of pipe being thrown out, and the two boys thrown violently back and burned by the gas.

meter cock, the property of the plaintiff, but used by the defendant also; the other by the service cock under the curb stone, the property of the defendant and under its exclusive control; that if the gas had been cut off by the latter method the explosion would not have occurred; that defendants sometimes used the one and sometimes the other method, the service cock under the curb stone being the safer as it was under the exclusive control of the defendant; that the meter examined after the explosion, had been tampered with, a nail being found in the hole of the meter cock used to turn it, though the gas was turned off when examined, the gas getting into the building in that manner. The court held that the plaintiff having no reason to suppose that any of defendant's gas was on the premises, was not bound to take any precautionary action in relation to the escape, neither for himself nor tenants, and that the principle, that in conducting its business as a gas producer and furnisher, the company was bound to use such ordinary skill and diligence as was proportioned to the delicacy, difficulty, and nature of that particular business, applied, and further that the evidence being sufficient to be submitted to the jury for them to say whether the explosion was caused by the defendant's negligence or not, the granting of a nonsuit was error.

When the evidence showed that deceased employed by the company as a laborer, subject to the orders and directions of the superintendent of the works, while following the instructions of such superintendent was suffocated by the negligent escape of gas into a room not properly arranged so as to allow of its passing out, the company having knowledge thereof and of the danger of inhaling the same, the deceased going to the room as instructed by such superintendent, without knowledge of the danger or fault or negligence on his part, defendants were held liable. Citizens Gas Light & Heating Co. v. O'Brien (1886) 118 Ill. 174.

So where the defendant was engaged to supply natural gas to certain premises through its service pipe extending from its main to the property line connecting there with a valve in the pipes on the premises; and the tenant discovered gas escaping from the pipes after passing through the valve and employed an experienced plumber to locate and remedy the defect, the valve used for that purpose and the only means of cutting off the supply of gas from the main, being shut, the said premises being under the exclusive control of the company; and to repair a defect it was necessary to cut off the supply of gas and for that purpose the defendant was notified, but through the negligence of the company and its incompetent servants the valve was not turned off and, the gas escaped and, in searching for the escape, exploded causing the injuries complained of, without contributory negligence on plaintiff's part,—it was contended that the company knew of the dangerous character of the gas, but there was no allegation as to the cause of such explosion, nor that the gas would have exploded without some intervening agency. It was held that there was no sufficient allegation to show that the injury was the proximate result of the defendant's negligence, and that the injury complained of must appear from the facts to have been the proximate result of the defendant's negligence. McGahan v. Indianapolis Natural Gas Co. (1894) (Ind.) post, 355.

Again where the facts showed that an employé of the company was directed by the defendants to turn off the gas from the house, that afterwards the plaintiff's wife, finding the smell of gas strong in the house and thinking it was gas escaping from the pipes in the cellar after the removal of the meter, took a lighted candle to the cellar door with a view to opening and ventilating the cellar, when the explosion occurred, there being no contributory negligence on the part of the wife, the company was held liable, the act of its servant being the proximate cause of the injury. Louisville Gas Co. v. Gutenkuntz (1884) 82 Ky. 428.

And again, where the facts showed the plaintiff was too young to testify, and there was no other person who could be called upon to give an account of the accident, but it was in evidence that upon a door of the room in which the parties were sleeping being broken open plaintiff was found insensible, by the side of the dead body of his mother, the escape coming from a crack in the pipe laid by the defendant corporation through a street, no gas fixtures being in the room; and there was no evidence that

On cross-examination the appellee testified that he had seen the wells put down, and saw the gas burning at the wells, and knew that it had been turned into the pipe. He had stopped at the crossing a great many times since the pipe was put down. Quite a crowd of boys and girls used to assemble there Sunday evenings. He never lit the gas or interfered with the pipe himself. He saw the link of pipe lifted up by boys several times, sometimes when the leak was afire. They just raised it up, and then let it down. On the night of the charivari, when the gas was lit, and two persons lifted up the joint of pipe, he heard his father say, "Boys, I would not do that," and they laid it down. At the time of the accident he told Warren, "If the plug was took out, and it was lifted up, it would make a nice fire." The dirt which Warren was scratching with a stick was burned red, like tile. Warren turned to look at the fire just as he raised the pipe. Appellee did not touch the pipe.

Warren Griffin testified that he was at the crossing with his brother before noon on the day of the accident, for about five minutes. The blaze at the leak was then about six feet high. He went down again alone after dinner. Just after he got there, the appellee came along, going to town. He had not seen the appellee since the Sunday before, and did not expect him then. They had been there about five minutes before the explosion. They were standing near the end of the link. Appellee said, "If the plug was out of the end of the pipe, and the pipe was raised up, it would make a nice fire." I said, "What plug?" and he showed me; and I lifted the pipe up a little, . . . about three inches." Appellee did not have hold of it. Thomas W. Raridan, one of the neighbors who passed while the boys were standing near the pipe, testified that after he passed them, going north, he looked back and saw the smaller boy stoop, as if he were about to lift something up. The other boy was standing near by, but not in a stooping position. Just then the explosion took place.

We think that no other evidence given substantially changes the facts as we have set them out from the record. The question for decision is as to the negligence of the appellants and the contributory negligence of the appellee. The material parts of the complaint, as presenting the issues on the question of negligence, are the following: "That the appellee was, on and prior to September 20, 1890, "a strong, active, intelligent, and plaintiff or his mother had notice of escaping gas, or that they were conscious of its presence in the room in time to leave or to take precautions to prevent the consequences by opening windows or doors; but there was evidence that on the day before the accident there was no smell of gas in the street, and that the mother was a sober and prudent woman,—the court held the jury justified in finding that the crack in the pipe and the escape of gas first occurred during the night of the accident, and that neither the plaintiff nor the mother were chargeable with any want of ordinary care in preventing or escaping the result, and in finding a verdict for plaintiff. Smith v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1880) 129 Mass. 318.

The court distinguished the action of Smith v. Boston Gas Light Co., supra, from that of Hutchinson v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1877) 122 Mass. 219, upon the ground that in the latter case the injury to the pipes and the leakage of gas were produced by other causes, excessive heat, and the fall of heavy buildings, and other destructive agencies of the great fire, while in the former case there was evidence that the pipes were not laid with sufficient care, or made of proper material, with reference to the action of frost, and therefore more liable to break in winter.

Where the evidence of the plaintiff tended to show that his intestate was killed by inhaling gas while engaged in the cellar of a building, pursuant to his duty as an employé for the purpose of reading a gas meter, but there was no evidence as to how the gas got into the cellar, nor of the defendant's negligence, beyond the fact that the gas was there and that the ventilators of the cellar were stopped up, it was shown that the defendant, by taking the meter, voluntarily entered into a relation the result of which was to require some one to enter its premises in order to read its meter. The court held it was bound to use reasonable care to prevent the place necessarily entered by the deceased from becoming a death trap, and that the jury might have found that it knew or ought to have known of the presence of gas in the cellar in quantities sufficient to be dangerous and that it might have prevented the accumulation by ventilators, or might have put the meter in a different place, and therefore might have found the defendant guilty of negligence. Finnegan v. Fall River Gas Works Co. (1893) 159 Mass. 311.

In Sherman v. Fall River Iron Works Co. (1861) 2 Allen, 524, 79 Am. Dec. 709, the action was for injuries caused by laying imperfect gas pipes in the streets near to plaintiff's premises, by reason of which the gas escaped through the ground into the plaintiff's well and thereby injured him, the court holding the defendant liable even though such state of things existed at the time the plaintiffs hired the premises.

So where the defendants were notified that gas was escaping, and directed one of its servants, a common laborer in its employ, to ascertain where the leak was, and the evidence showed that such servant found the smell of gas so strong as to be dangerous, and in the absence of the person who gave the notice to the company, and whom the company had directed to prevent any one from going into the cellar with a light, struck a match which ignited the gas and caused an explosion, the court held that the evidence of negligence on the part of the company was clear and decisive, being the direct and immediate consequence of the explosion which was caused by the negligent act of their agent in lighting the match, and that such negligence was established by such fact, whether he was wholly or only in part their agent. Lanuen v. Albany Gas Light Co. (1895) 46 Barb. 264, affirmed 44 N. Y. 459.

In the above case where the instructions given by a gas light company to its servants sent by it were to examine and find out the locality of the leak in the gas pipe, and extended to the finding out of such leakage wherever it might be, the injury being sustained through the improper manner adopted by such agent in finding out the leakage, the company was held liable, no matter whether the leak was in the brass head of the pipe or in the service pipe.

In Kimmel v. Burfeind (1896) 2 Daly, 155, the plaintiff hired from the defendant the second floor of premises, the basement of which was occupied by another tenant. In the former's apartments was a gas pipe or fixture neither covered nor stopped. Gas was introduced into the basement by energetic young man, eighteen years of age, in good health, and in full possession of all his faculties, and with good prospects for a long, successful, and profitable life." That "said defendants, a short time prior to the date hereinbefore stated, negligently constructed a gas-pipe line along and in the highway . . . for the purpose of conveying and transporting natural gas through said line, and that said line so constructed as aforesaid was in use and operation by said defendants on said date." "That said line was made of pipe three inches in diameter, screwed together, and negligently laid on top of the ground in said highway. . . . Said defendants negligently and imperfectly and partially screwed one end of the joint of pipe, perhaps twenty feet in length, into said pipe running east and west." "That said joint of pipe was negligently, loosely, and imperfectly inserted and screwed into said pipe line, as aforesaid, in such an insecure and imperfect manner that it was liable at any moment to become disconnected from said line. That the north end of said joint of pipe was plugged, and the south end was, as before stated, imperfectly and carelessly inserted into the pipe line as aforesaid." "That natural gas was, at the time herein mentioned, being negligently conducted by said defendants through said pipe line at the high and dangerous pressure of more than three hundred pounds to the square inch." "That at the place of intersection of said joint of pipe with said line the gas was, on account of said deficiencies and imperfections, constantly escaping, and was frequently on fire; and that the said line and the said joint of pipe aforesaid were unprotected and unguarded." "That on the said 20th day of September, 1890, the plaintiff, who was a young man eighteen years of age, as aforesaid, and who was passing by said public road crossing and said pipe line, as aforesaid, and who stopped to look at said escaping and burning gas, and had but little knowledge and comprehension of the dangers of handling, using, and transporting natural gas, was in said highway at or near the point where this joint of pipe intersected with said line, and was at or near the north end of said pipe, and was standing there looking at said escaping and burning gas; and that without fault or want of care on his part, and on account of said negligence and carelessness of said defendants, the said joint of pipe was blown out of said line, and the fire and escaping gas from said line, through said defendant's tenant's permission in the absence of the plaintiff, who, subsequently discovering the escape, notified the defendant who tested the pipe and found the escape in one part of the premises, but did not make a thorough search. Upon an explosion occurring the court held the defendant liable for negligence there being no contributory negligence on the plaintiff's part, the defendant being guilty of a violation of the obligation which enjoins care and caution and of a duty which he owed to his tenant.

Where the gas company contended that the cause of the accident was the contributing negligence of a plumber called in by the plaintiff to ascertain and stop the escape of gas, who, examining the fixtures in the basement and finding the smell not strong enough to do harm with the light, and therefore not dangerous, used a light, as accustomed to do when examining for a leakage of gas, it being his custom to judge by the smell whether it was safe to light a candle, relying upon his nose when he went where gas was escaping, which he did on that occasion, and finding no leak in the basement, took a candle to go into the cellar to examine the meter, when opening the cellar door an explosion occurred,—the court stated that to hold that such gas fitter did not exercise ordinary care and prudence would be equivalent to holding that he was bound to know that it might be dangerous to open the cellar door with a lighted candle in his hand. Sohmerhorn v. Metropolitan Gas Light Co. (1874) 5 Daly, 144.

In the above case plaintiff's evidence showed that the breakage in the pipe was occasioned by the frost, and that the pipe was not laid at a proper depth, but the defendant contended that the pipe was laid at a sufficient depth, that the breakage was not occasioned by the frost but from other circumstances for which it was not liable, the gas escaping through the break in the pipe into the plaintiff's house. The court held the main, though not the proximate, cause of the accident was the escape of gas in consequence of the breakage in the pipes in the street, and that there was evidence sufficient to go to the jury thereon. Ibid.

discontinuing the supply of gas and removing the meter the service pipe not being properly closed. The court held the defendant guilty of an omission of duty in neglecting effectually to cap and close the service pipe so as effectually to exclude the gas from the cellar of the store. Lannen v. Albany Gas-Light Co. (1871) 44 N. Y. 459; Holding v. Liverpool Gas Co. (1846) 8 C. B. 1, 5 N. Y. Legal Obs. 77, Anthon, N. P. 356, note.

The court, in Holding v. Liverpool Gas Co. (1846) 8 C. B. 1, 5 N. Y. Legal Obs. 77, Anthon, N. P. 356, note, held that the outer stop-cock was in that case so obvious a protection and being in addition in actual use, there was no apology for its omission and the mischief being traced to that cause the liability of the defendants admitted of no doubt.

Where it was admitted that the death of the plaintiff's minor son resulted from asphyxia caused by inhaling illuminating gas, which escaped from a broken gas pipe in the street, the court held that even without reference in detail to the uncontradicted evidence tending to prove that the proper city authorities had been duly notified of the fact of the escape of gas, and that they neglected for several days to locate the leak and replace the broken pipe, the plaintiff's evidence, if believed by the jury, presented a case of inexcusable and protracted neglect of duty on the defendant's part resulting in the death of the plaintiff's son, the duty of promptly locating and stopping the leak being one that devolved solely upon the proper authorities of the city. Ottersbach v. Philadelphia (1894) 161 Pa. 111, 114.

So where the pipe and sewer were in the immediate vicinity of each other and there was a defect in the former from which through negligence gas escaped, not merely by absorption or by gravity, but also by pressure, finding its way into the sewer, the fact that the city contractor in building the sewer disturbed the pipe was held not to affect or shift the cause of action, the facts still remaining that gas was escaping, and that the company knowing of the defect neglected to make the necessary repairs, and that even if the plaintiff by his own negligence occasioned the defect, that fact would not make the cause less direct so as to defeat his action on the ground of contributory neg-opening, instantly caused a terrible explosion. the flames of said escaping and burning gas, on account thereof, extending to and beyond the plaintiff, who at the time was at or near the north end of said joint of pipe, completely enveloping him; and that on account of said explosion and burning gas, the said plaintiff was violently thrown a distance of many feet, and his clothing was burned, and he was so deeply, seriously, and terribly burned," etc. "That all of his said injuries were sustained as a result of the said negligence and carelessness of said defendants, and without fault on his part."

This complaint charges, in substance, that the appellants were guilty of negligence in laying a natural gas pipe, as described, upon the public highway, and in transporting through such pipe, as so constructed, natural gas at the dangerous pressure of 800 pounds to the square inch. We think the charge is fully sustained by the evidence. That the pipe was carelessly put together is evident from the numerous leaks, in addition to the one at the crossing; which are testified to. It was additional negligence to lay such a poorly jointed pipe, containing such a dangerous explosive, loose upon the ground where the public, including children and other inexperienced persons, were passing day after day. Besides all this, it was a violation of the law to lay pipe upon the public highway. Whatever may be said as to the right to lay gas pipe or other pipe, in covered trenches along the highway, after due permission obtained from proper authority, and so laid as not in any manner to obstruct the highway or endanger public travel, there can be no question that it is unlawful to occupy the surface of the highway, as done in this case. The public roads, free from any obstructions to travel, are solely, and from fence to fence, for the use of the traveling public. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Trowbridge, 126 Ind. 391; Elliott, Roads & Streets, chap. 24.

And we think that the jury were fully authorized from the evidence in finding, as they did by their general verdict, that this negligence attached to all the appellants. Snow actually put the pipe together, and laid it in the highway. Doxey furnished him with the pipe and the fittings, and located the several wells, and his agents took up the north and south line, cutting and unscrewing the second joint from the first at the crossing. The accident happened after this, and after Snow had ceased to use the pipe, ligence. Oil City Gas Co. v. Robinson (1881) 99 Pa. 1, 5.

In Burrows v. March Gas & Coke Co. (1872) L. R. 7 Exch. 36, 41 L. J. Exch. 46, 28 L. T. N. S. 818, 20 Week. Rep. 493, the court held that the company were guilty of a double default, first in supplying a defective pipe, and secondly, in sending gas through it in quantities calculated to produce the catastrophe which occurred, the escape of gas being the direct consequence of their breach of contract and necessarily dangerous.

And where the defendant, a gas fitter, was employed by the plaintiff's master to repair a gas meter, and for such purpose took away the meter making a temporary connection by means of a flexible tube between the inlet pipe and the pipe connecting with the house, and the plaintiff going in performance of his duty with a lighted candle into the cellar, gas which had escaped by reason of the insufficiently connected tube exploded and injured him, the jury found the work negligently done and that the injury proceeded entirely from such negligence, and the court held the defendant liable. Parry v. Smith (1879) L. R. 4 C. P. Div. 225, 48 L. J. C. P. 731, 27 Week. Rep. 801, 41 L. T. N. S. 93.

e. Insufficient to establish negligence.

In Taylor v. Baldwin (1889) 78 Cal. 517, the defendant constructed gas works and laid pipes therefrom for the supply of his own property; the flow of gas decreasing, plaintiff, the superintendent of the works, acting under the suggestions of others, attempted to increase the pressure by taking the weights out of the buckets attached to the gas meter, when the latter tilted, the gas escaping thereby causing an explosion. The evidence showed that the taking of the weights out of the bucket removed the balance from the receiver and permitted it to tip over; that the utmost care and caution was used by the defendant in the construction of the works, the best mechanics and engineers being employed by him. The court held that the defendant was not liable inasmuch as the plaintiff knew of the danger and acted in the matter without the authority or instructions of the defendant, and further that the accident was caused by the defendant's own negligence, and not by the gunny sack alleged to have been left over the gas pipe in the construction of the works.

Where there was no evidence to show that the defendants had not made suitable provision against the consequences of all conflagrations in the city, or that the pipes from which the gas escaped were not of suitable material and properly laid, or that all appliances for the proper distribution or retention of gas were not fully provided, or that the officers and agents were not properly skilled, or that the work as a whole with the system of management adopted was not adequate to all the reasonable exigencies of the business no better system being shown to exist, the injury to the pipes and the leakage of gas being caused by the fall of heavy buildings, the excessive heat and all the distributive agencies of the fire,—the court held the defendants not liable. Hutchinson v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1877) 122 Mass. 219.

In that case it was contended that the company had notice early in the morning of the explosion "that the gas was escaping from somewhere," and more especially in the adjoining building, and failed to respond to the notice, but there being no evidence that the escaping gas as described by the party giving the notice was the cause of any explosion whatever, or that it had anything to do with the burning of the building, the fire originating at another point of the street. Ibid.

The fire in question followed close upon the great fire, which, although under control, required great efforts on the part of the public authorities to restore order and prevent further calamity, and the court was bound to take notice of it in considering the nature and weight of the evidence relied on to prove the defendant's negligence, and, upon a careful consideration thereof, there was not enough to justify a verdict for the plaintiff charging the defendant with negligence, it not being a case in which negligence could be inferred from the happening of the accident alone. Ibid.

And although there was evidence that the defendant company had a large number of valve boxes in the vicinity of the place where the explosion occurred none of which were closed for the purpose of shutting off the gas, but it was not shown that if all had been closed the leak would which then belonged solely to Doxey. Doxey thereafter must be held to have assumed Snow's former charge of caring for the pipe; and he did in fact afterwards bury this line of pipe in the highway, using it as a part of the permanent line to Lebanon. And from the fact that, a month before the accident, gas was delivered to the city of Lebanon from well No. 1, which, by the pipe passing the crossing, was directly connected with well No. 3, the jury were amply justified in finding that the gas flowing through this pipe from well No. 3 was taken, along with the gas from No. 1, to be distributed by the appellant company to its patrons in the city. It does not appear from the evidence that any other use could be made of the gas, for Snow had ceased to use it before the north and south line was taken up, and two weeks before the date of the accident. If this inference of the jury that the company was in the actual use of the gas that flowed over the crossing at the date of the accident were incorrect, it was the duty of the appellant company to show that fact, and by introducing upon the trial its contract with Doxey, or by other competent evidence, to prove the absence of liability on its part. The evidence adduced makes a prima facie case against the company.

As said by Mr. Broom (Legal Maxims, 939): "Where a party has the means in his power of rebutting and explaining the evidence adduced against him if it does not tend to the truth, the omission to do so furnishes a strong inference against him." Notwithstanding, therefore, the fact that Doxey had not at the time fully completed his contract, nor formally turned over the plant to the company, yet the company, being in the actual use of the gas which flowed through the pipe over the crossings, cannot escape liability for the negligent manner in which the gas was conveyed through the pipe thus carelessly constructed along the public highway.

The other question—as to the liability of the appellee, and whether he was himself guilty of negligence contributing to his injury—is one not free from difficulty. In the complaint it is alleged that "plaintiff was on and prior to the 20th day of September, 1890, a strong, active, intelligent, and energetic young man, eighteen years of age, in good health, and in full possession of all his faculties." It is further alleged "that on the said 20th day of September, 1890, the plaintiff, who was a young man eighteen years old, as aforesaid, and who was passing by said public road crossings and said pipe line as aforesaid, and who stopped to look at said have ceased, or that it was practically possible to reach and close them, and it was evident that there had been made a sudden demand upon all the resources of the company to meet the requirements of the occasion, gas escaping from all pipes of the burning district, the court held there was no evidence that all resources were not exhausted in duties that were equally or more pressing. Ibid.

The fact that the plaintiff made no claim on the defendants, or on their agent, on account of the damages sustained or alleged to have been caused by the escape of gas until some time after, is admissible in evidence as tending to show that the plaintiff did not originally attribute his illness to the gas which escaped into the house, of which fact defendants were entitled to avail themselves. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1892) 3 Allen, 410.

In Schmeer v. Gas-Light Co. of Syracuse (1892) 85 Hun, 373, plaintiff took a lighted candle for the purpose of finding the escape against the remonstrance of other people in the building, and the explosion occurred which caused his death, subsequent discovery showing that the end of a gas pipe which had been carried to the hall in the third story for the purpose of attaching a meter was open. A gas fitter and plumber of the city was employed to put the pipes through the building which was a new one, whose instructions were "to put the joints together in red lead, all pipes to be capped, proven tight with caps left on." It was proved that the service pipe was of proper size, properly put in and left in a proper condition with the gas shut off, a shut-off cock being properly placed in the pipe to admit of its being turned off in the street, the pipes in the building being connected with this service pipe a few days before the accident, and on application by a tenant for gas a meter was attached to the horizontal pipe in the cellar by means of a branch or riser, entirely separate from those in the stories above and the gas turned on in the street, the operation sending the gas through the meter into the store for which the application had been made, and also into the other part of the building, thus causing the accident. The court held the gas company not liable, as it merely in the ordinary course of its business allowed its gas to be taken into a receptacle furnished and owned by the party himself, preparatory to its being used in his building, and it had therefore no knowledge or reasonable ground for believing that such receptacle was defective, the court ordering a new trial.

So where the question was whether the defendant's negligence was established by a fair preponderance of proof, the evidence showing that on a given date gas was leaking in the cellar, that the plaintiff and another boy were lawfully standing upon the cellar door in front of the premises; that the housekeeper being notified of the leak called the attention of the defendant's employes to the fact; that an employe of the company went into the cellar to search for the leak, or its cause, when the explosion occurred,—the court held that under the circumstances the jury were not entitled to infer that the explosion occurred through the negligence of the employe, as by conjecture and presumption the cause of accident could be attributed to any one of several causes with quite as much certainty as to the negligence of the defendant, there being no evidence whatever of any defective workmanship, nor of the defendant's failure to make repairs, the defendant entering diligently upon the work and the explosion occurring before the discovery, the testimony failing to establish negligence, and that therefore a verdict of the court below in plaintiff's favor not supported by the evidence should be reversed. Krzywosynski v. Consolidated Gas Co. of New York (1895) 11 Misc. 61.

In Oil City Fuel Supply Co. v. Boundy (1888) 122 Pa. 449, 460, the court held that in order to warrant the proof of admissions by an agent as part of the res gestæ it must appear that the agent was specially authorized to make them, or his power must have been such as to constitute him the general representative of the principal, having the management of the entire business, or the admissions must have formed part of the consideration of the contract, or if they were noncontractual must have been part of the res gestæ. Therefore where the evidence showed that the witness was only agent for a certain line and that the general office of the company was in another county, and the accident escaping and burning gas, and had but little knowledge and comprehension of the dangers of handling, using, and transporting natural gas, was in said highway at or near the point where this joint of pipe intersected with said line, and was at or near the north end of said pipe, and was standing there looking at said escaping and burning gas, and that without fault or want of care on his part, and on account of said negligence and carelessness of said defendants, the said joint of pipe was blown out," etc., causing the injury complained of.

While, therefore, the appellee was in the full possession of his strength and faculties, it does not appear from these allegations that on the occasion of his injury he was himself guilty of any negligence. He was at the time on the public highway, where he had a right to be. Whether he walked, or rode in a wagon at the invitation of his neighbor, or whether he stood talking with an acquaintance, and watching the gas pipe or any other object, was an affair that concerned himself alone, so long as he did not interfere with the equal right of any one else to use the highway. Least of all have the appellants, who had placed an unlawful obstruction upon the highway, a right to complain of his presence. If, however, it should appear that the appellee was aware of the dangerous character of the obstruction thus placed upon the highway, and, notwithstanding such knowledge, should persist in standing in the immediate presence of the danger, and, still more, if he should in any manner, either by his own act or by suggestion to another, have aided in liberating the dangerous explosive, he could not recover for an injury thus brought about. It appears from the evidence that the appellee lived near the crossing, and within a mile of the town of Sheridan, for fifteen years prior to the accident, and that for four or five years previous to that time gas wells were put down in and around that town.

The appellee had been present a few times at the drilling of the first well in Sheridan; also, when they fired the second well. He also knew of the use of gas for fuel in Sheridan, Noblesville, and other parts of Hamilton county, prior to the drilling of the wells for the Lebanon Company. He was also present at the drilling and firing of these wells, and knew that gas was piped around from well No. 1 to well No. 2. He saw the size of the flames from the wells, and heard the noise. He had been warned by his father occurred when the agent was not there and had not been there and knew nothing of it and was accosted in another city by the plaintiff, the declarations of such agent were not within the rule.

Where the injury suffered resulted from gas in the street mains which was clearly traceable to negligence or improper meddling, and the facts as found by the referee showed that the fault did not lie at the door of the city, the court refused to find otherwise than for the defendant company. Strawbridge v. Philadelphia (1879) 13 Phila. 173, 36 Phila. Leg. Int. 276.

So the possibility of injury from gas escaping downward to coal in a mine 140 feet below the surface, instead of upward to the air, was under the evidence considered too doubtful, remote, and speculative to form an element of damage to coal lands crossed by a pipe line laid three feet beneath the surface. Wallace v. Jefferson Gas Co. (1892) 22 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 293, 29 W. N. C. 349.

And in a case where the unlawful act of a thief, whose presence was neither caused nor procured by the defendant, was the immediate cause of the explosion, the damage thereby occasioned to the plaintiff was held to arise from a combination of circumstances, and accidental so far as the defendant was concerned. Sofield v. Sommers (1878) 9 Ben. 526.

In that case, the defendant was the owner of a lighter transporting petroleum, and had on board a deck load of refined petroleum in barrels, the lighter being moored for the night, without a watchman; the plaintiff's boat, at the same wharf and a short distance from the lighter, being set on fire through an explosion on the latter boat. It was claimed there was negligence on the defendant's part in leaving the lighter without a watchman, and that the destruction of the plaintiff's boat resulted therefrom, and that no precaution being taken to prevent the access of the thief amounted to negligence; but the court held that the placing of the lighted match was not the natural result of the nonpresence of a watchman, and that there was no evidence to show how the gas escaped into the cabin, nor to show that the presence of gas in the cabin was caused by any negligence on the part of the defendants; neither was it shown that the presence of such gas was to have been expected or that it was known to any one, and therefore there was no want of due precaution against fire.

IV Contributory negligence.

The question of contributory negligence forms an element in the consideration of the liability of such companies for damages occasioned by explosions and the escape of gas, and it has been held that in all such cases negligence being the gist of an action, a party claiming damages must show that he has not failed in the performance of his duty, in relation to the subject-matter out of which the suit has arisen. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1881) 1 Allen, 343.

As any degree of neglect on his part contributing to the injury in such cases destroys his right to recover; the negligence must contribute materially and essentially to the injury. Oil City Fuel Supply Co. v. Boundy (1888) 122 Pa. 449; Lanigan v. New York Gas-Light Co. (1877) 71 N. Y. 29.

Therefore if, after reasonable notice of the danger being aware of the inflammable and explosive character of gas the plaintiff heedlessly encounters it he is without redress. Brown v. New York Gas-Light Co. (1860) Anthon, N. P. 351, 355.

And must be held responsible for a disregard of the peril. Lanigan v. New York Gas Light Co. supra.

For the assertion of a right involves the necessity of showing the performance of a corresponding duty. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. supra.

Thus where it was probable that gas was escaping from the leak and would find its way into the sewer in quantities sufficient to produce an explosion, and plaintiff (a civil engineer) ought to have anticipated the result and not have entered the sewer with a lighted lamp, such act of entering being contributory negligence sufficient to prevent recovery. Oil City Gas Co. v. Robinson (1881) 99 Pa. 1, 3.

A civil engineer is presumed to have some knowledge of the dangerous nature of illuminating gas, of its penetrating powers, and explosive not to light the gas at any of the leaks. Parties of young people with whom he joined had been in the habit, particularly on Sunday evenings, of congregating at the crossing, lighting the gas, and watching it burn. Appellee says he did not himself light the gas or touch the pipe. On these occasions he saw the end of the joint of pipe raised up and let down several times, sometimes when the gas was lit, and sometimes when it was not. On the Monday night previous to the accident he and his father were with the charivari party at the crossing. He saw the gas lit and the pipe raised up that evening. The fire blazed up two feet or more. He heard his father say at the time, "Boys, I would not do that," and they laid the pipe down. On the day of the accident, when talking to the boy Griffin, he said to him, "If the plug was took out, and it was lifted up, it would make a nice fire." On that occasion he noticed the fire stronger than usual, and that the earth near it was burned red, like tile. When he told Griffin about taking out the plug and lifting up the pipe, Griffin said, "What plug?" and they both walked around to the end of the pipe, and he showed Griffin the plug, when Griffin stooped down and lifted up the pipe. Appellee was then standing on one side of the pipe, and Griffin on the other, and appellee noticed Griffin turn to look at the fire as he raised the pipe. Appellee at the same time observed the fire himself. Then the explosion took place. The appellee does not appear, at the time, to have himself touched the pipe, and for this reason, perhaps, the jury did not think that he was guilty of contributory negligence. Considering the evidence adduced, it seems very doubtful whether this conclusion was correct.

As bearing on this question, the following, with other instructions given the jury, is complained of: "(7) On the subject of contributory negligence the question for your consideration is whether the plaintiff himself was in fault in any act he did or caused to be done at the time of the accident, if any such act has been proved which contributed to the injuries sustained by him. Anything any other persons may have done then and there, or at any other time, independently of himself, and for which he was not responsible, or anything he may have done himself, at any other time or place, in way of intermeddling with any of the gas wells or pipe lines of said defendants, or either of them, if any such acts have been proven, would not affect the right of the plaintiff to recover in this action, unless he was in fault at the time and place when the accident occurred, in doing something which contribcharacter, when mixed in certain quantities with common air, and where he knows that the gas escapes and saturates the adjacent earth, he is bound to be upon his guard. Ibid.

But an ordinary person, one not skilled as an expert, is not bound to know that natural gas when mixed in certain portions of the common air is explosive. Kibele v. Philadelphia (1884) 105 Pa. 41, 44.

And the same principles apply when the act is that of a fellow servant. Lehigh Valley Coal Co. v. Jones (1873) 86 Pa. 432.

If, therefore, the injuries were occasioned by the plaintiff's own carelessness, he can only recover for the natural and direct consequences of the wrongful act of the defendant, and not for the consequential damages which might have been avoided by ordinary care on his part. Sherman v. Fall River Iron Works Co. (1861) 2 Allen, 524, 79 Am. Dec. 790.

Yet if the plaintiff was put to expense in reasonable and proper attempts to exclude the gas, defendants will not be protected from responsibility to the extent that these facts were justified, because the plaintiff had negligently permitted such injurious consequences to follow for which he could have no remedy. Ibid.

And although there may be some slight evidence of contributory negligence yet if upon an examination of the testimony the court is satisfied that it is not of such a character as will warrant it in virtually declaring, as a matter of law, that either the plaintiff or the deceased was guilty of negligence which contributed to the latter's death, the plaintiff will be entitled to recover. Ottersbach v. Philadelphia (1884) 161 Pa. 111, 114.

The defendants, sued for personal injuries to a child caused by the escape of gas, may show conduct on the part of the father indicating a want of ordinary care in adopting suitable precautions against the hurtful effect of the gas after it has been discovered penetrating or pervading the house where they reside. Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1867) 8 Gray, 123, 69 Am. Dec. 233.

It being competent to offer proof of the conduct of the parties in order that the jury may determine whether the plaintiff has not neglected to use ordinary care in seeking relief or resorting to expedients readily available for his own protection and security. Ibid.

Thus it is a want of due care to remain in a house after the plaintiff has had a reasonable opportunity to procure another house or place of residence and to remove thither, the defendants not being liable for consequences which ensued after such removal might have been made. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1861) 1 Allen, 348; Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co. supra; Bartlett v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1875) 117 Mass. 533, 538, 19 Am. Rep. 421; Sherman v. Fall River Iron Works Co. (1861) 2 Allen, 524, 79 Am. Dec. 790.

And he must either do this or take other precautions for his sake until the leak is discovered and stopped, as he cannot knowingly take upon himself such a risk and then seek to charge a city therewith. Kibele v. Philadelphia (1884) 105 Pa. 41, 44.

So if a tenant, upon discovering the presence of gas in large quantities upon the premises, neglects to give notice to the agents or servants of the company. Bartlett v. Boston Gas Light Co., Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. and Sherman v. Fall River Iron Works Co. supra.

Where the husband, notifying the company of an escape of gas, sent a servant with a light to stop the leak, and followed with another light for the purpose of assisting him, the carrying of the light was held such contributory negligence on the husband's part as precluded a recovery for damages against the company. Vallée vs. Qualité v. The New City Gas Co. (1872-3) (a Canadian case) 7 Am. L. Rev. 797.

So an experienced miner killed by an explosion occasioned by his lighted lantern in passing near an oil well from which he smelled gas escaping, which was so great and created so much noise that he was not in ignorance of its existence, and had perfect knowledge of the great danger of approaching it with the flame of fire, was charged uted to his own injuries." This seems too broad. From it the jury were given to understand that anything which the appellee might have done before the date of the accident could not be taken into account. His experience as to the dangerous nature of natural gas, the admonition of his father not to light the leaks, and warning the boys of the charivari party to let the pipe alone, were matters of knowledge which would certainly affect his responsibility on the day of the accident, even though drawn from events that occurred on former occasions. Still more questionable is the clause of the instruction that "anything he may have done himself at any other time or place, by way of intermeddling with any of the gas wells or pipe lines, would not affect the right of the plaintiff to recover."

It was charged as a part of the defense that the working up and down of the joint of pipe on the night of the charivari and at other times had so loosened the joint at the T that when, at the suggestion of appellee, Griffin lifted it up at the time of the injury, the loosened and weakened joint suddenly gave way, when but for the disturbances on former occasions it might have withstood the weakening caused by Griffin's raising it up. Whatever may have been the facts as to this, the appellants had a right to make such proof as they were able; and if, in fact, appellee himself, by his own act, or by participating in the acts of others, either on the occasion of the charivari, or at other times, had in any degree caused the loosening or weakening of the joint, and so helped to bring the injury upon himself, he ought not to recover. The effect of the instruction was to exclude from the consideration of the jury all former acts of the appellee in connection with the wells or the pipe lines, and to confine their attention strictly to his actions at the time and place of the accident.

We do not think that the error in this instruction is cured in any other instructions given, if, indeed, it could be cured by other instructions. The all-important question, after establishment of the negligence of appellants, is whether the appellee was or was not negligent, and we do not think that his negligence or want of negligence is to be measured solely by what he did on the occasion of his injury. The error was probably an inadvertence on the part of the learned and accomplished trial judge; but we think it was nevertheless calculated to lead the jury away from the consideration of important evidence in the case, and therefore that a new trial ought to be granted. Other alleged errors discussed by counsel need not, as we think, be considered.

with contributory negligence, although the owners of the well had not exercised care usual in such cases. McClafferty v. Fisher (1885) (Pa.) 1 Cent. Rep. 571.

And where the proximate cause of the explosion was the introduction of a light into the cellar by the servants of the plaintiff under his immediate directions, the plaintiff having for a long time been aware that the gas had escaped and was escaping into his cellar and finding its way into other parts of the building, it will be presumed that he knew it was accumulating in larger quantities and in more condensed form in the cellar, which was seldom opened. Lanigan v. New York Gas Light Co. (1877) 71 N. Y. 29.

In the above case plaintiff knew of the escape of gas and had occasion to visit that part of the premises with lights, and therefore it was a voluntary and negligent exposure of his property to danger not to see that the escape of gas was properly prevented, the fact that he had frequently before exposed himself and property to the same risk and escaped with impunity, not exempting him from the consequences of his carelessness when damage ensued, the prior acts not justifying his negligence on that occasion or proving it prudent to take a lighted match or candle into the cellar. Ibid.

Where it appeared that the house occupied by the plaintiff was situated several hundred feet from the leak in the pipe, and on a street through which the gas was not conducted, there being no direct communication with the pipe through which the gas flowed and the plaintiff's house, the escape being through a private drain into the cellar, of which matter the defendants had no knowledge or information such as would lead them to suppose that the gas had made its way into the house,—it was held that if the defendants did not know of the leak in the pipe which caused the gas to escape into the house, and by the use of reasonable care and after due inquiry could not ascertain the fact, the plaintiff had no right to remain passive and permit the nuisance to exist for a number of days to his injury and then claim the damages during the whole time, due diligence requiring some action on the plaintiff's part. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1861) 1 Allen, 842.

But where the facts showed that the deceased was acting under a certain stress of duty, the jury would be warranted in finding that the risk run did not appear to be great, and in fact would not have been great if there had been ventilation, and that therefore the deceased could take such risk as was manifest without losing the protection of the law. Finnegan v. Fall River Gas Works Co. (1893) 159 Mass. 311.

So where a gas pipe had been injured by an accident occurring to the exterior pipe from which gas had escaped all the afternoon, and the workmen were notified thereof and expected to remedy it and finished their work later in the day, declaring that it was done, and an hour or two later the plaintiff closed his barn, but noticed a smell of gas which led him to look at the meter and occasioned remark, the facts showing that the odor of gas and the leak during the afternoon might have accounted for the smell, and that the workmen had been engaged thereon, the court held that the natural presumption was that the odor was not due to an undiscovered leak, but the escape of gas before the repairing of the discovered leak, and therefore was not sufficient to show contributory negligence on the plaintiff's part. Lee v. Troy Citizens Gas-Light Co. (1885) 98 N. Y. 115, 118.

And a boy six years old, who was ordered to keep away from a ditch across which he, with others, was jumping allowing the stuff to fall down, but who had no knowledge or was not warned of any danger from gas, was held not guilty of contributory negligence by remaining there, so as to prevent recovery for injuries received by an explosion. Rummele v. Allegheny Heating Co. (1889) (Pa.) 14 Atl. Rep. 78.

INDIANAPOLIS NATURAL GAS CO.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A complaint charging a gas company with negligence in failing to cut off the supply of gas from a building in which there was a defective pipe, and denying that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, is insufficient to show that the negligence of such company was the efficient cause of an injury to plaintiff from an explosion, as this would be impossible without some agency acting upon the leaking gas.
2. It is a matter of common knowledge that natural gas will not explode spontaneously without some agency acting upon it.
3. A plaintiff must be presumed to have caused an explosion of natural gas by his own act, where his complaint against a gas company for the explosion does not charge the company with any negligence except in failing to cut off the supply, and does not make any allegation as to the cause of the explosion.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendant in an action brought to replosion of gas is to be judged of by the jury according to the subject-matter and force and danger of the material under the defendant's charge, and the circumstances of the case. Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1867) 8 Gray, 123, 69 Am. Dec. 233.

The plaintiff can only prove what care he has himself taken, and it is then to be determined by the jury whether it was sufficient, so far as depends upon that question, to entitle him to recover damages for the injury sustained. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1862) 8 Allen, 410.

So the question of contributory negligence on the plaintiff's part is for the jury to decide. Ribele v. Philadelphia (1884) 105 Pa. 41, 44; Ottersbach v. Philadelphia (1894) 161 Pa. 111, 114.

It is also within the province of the jury to decide whether the immediate communication to the officers or agents of the gas company that such a leak had occurred was not a necessary, or reasonable measure of precaution, of which those liable to suffer from inhaling the gases ought to have availed themselves. Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co. supra.

And the jury should be instructed that if the defendants did not know, and by the use of due care could not ascertain, that the gas was escaping into the plaintiff's house, they would not be liable for damages sustained after the time when the plaintiff, in the exercise of due care, could have given notice to the defendants, and they had thereby opportunity given to prevent the further continuance of the escape. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1861) 1 Allen, 843, citing Peyton v. London (1829) 9 Barn. & C. 725, 8 Car. & P. 363.

It is a question for the jury whether upon the liability attending the construction of a sewer, a gas company having a proper system of inspection would or ought to have knowledge of a leak in its pipe caused by the construction of the sewer, sooner than the leak was in fact discovered. Koelsch v. Philadelphia Co. (1893) 13 L. R. A. 799, 153 Pa. 355.

So it is for the jury to consider whether remaining in a house after it becomes known to its inmates that it is being filled with the gas escaping cover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. P. Baker for appellant.

Messrs. Winter & Elam for appellee.

Hackney, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was by the appellant, and by it he sought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting from an explosion of natural gas. The complaint was in two paragraphs, to each of which the lower court sustained the appellee's demurrer, and that ruling is the only assigned error. The material facts alleged were that the appellee was engaged in supplying natural gas, for fuel and other purposes, to the citizens of the city of Indianapolis; that a tenement occupied by one Kilburn was supplied with natural gas by said company, through a service pipe of said company, extending from its mains to the property line, and there connecting by a valve with the pipes of said tenement; that said tenant discovered that the gas was escaping from the pipes upon said premises and after passing through said valve; that she employed the appellant, an experienced plumber, to locate and remedy the defect in the pipes which permitted from a leak in the pipes, is not a manifest want of prudence. Holly v. Boston Gas Light Co. and Kibele v. Philadelphia, supra.

And if the defendants in making the necessary excavations occupy more time than is reasonably requisite for the purpose, such delay and tardiness make the circumstances proper to be considered by the jury in forming an opinion upon their alleged inattention and negligence. Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co. supra.

Where the break on the inside of the foundation wall was caused by one of two causes, either by the blow of the heavy stone on the service pipe, or by a forcible twisting of the inner couplings, in the process of putting on a new elbow on the outside of the foundation, whichever it was; and whether the workman could or should have discovered the leak and repaired it,—are questions which the court should submit to the jury. Lee v. Troy Citizens Gas-Light Co. (1885) 98 N. Y. 113.

In an action against a gas company for negligently allowing the escape of gas from their main into premises where lights were known to be burning, the plaintiff's case being that the gas found entrance through an open window nearly level with the trench from the main, after a hole had been made in the main for the purpose of inserting the service pipe, it was held that even if the jury thought the gas so entered, it was still a question for them whether the defendant's men might reasonably have foreseen and were bound to have the window closed. Blenkron v. Great Central Gas Consumers Co. (1890) 2 Fost. & F. 437.

Where the witnesses and among them the city patrolmen testified to smelling the escape of gas for some time prior to the accident, and the evidence indicated a broken pipe and the need of immediate repairs, it was held it might well be supposed that the proper officers ought to have discovered the leak, and that it was part of the business of the patrolmen to have informed them thereof, such matters being questions for the jury which ought to be submitted to them. Kibele v. Philadelphia (1884) 105 Pa. 41, 44.

the gas to so escape; that said valve was for the purpose and was the only means of cutting off the supply of gas from the appellee's mains to said premises, and it was under the exclusive control of the appellee; that, to repair said defect, it became necessary to have said supply of gas cut off, and for that purpose the appellee was repeatedly requested and promised to have said valve turned without delay, but, through the negligence of said company and its incompetent servants, said valve was not so turned, and said gas continued to escape, within said tenement, for more than twenty-four hours; that during that period, and while upon a second visit to said premises, the appellant was

An instruction to the jury that it was in law the duty of the defendants to exercise reasonable care and supervision of gas boxes placed by them in the public streets of the city, is correct. District of Columbia v. Washington Gas Light Co. (1891) 9 Mackey, 39.

So where the defendant contends that plaintiff might have prevented the damage by using a proper trap, a charge to the effect that while that might have been proper in guarding against sewer gas, it was for the jury to consider whether he ought to expect to find, or be bound to guard against, illuminating gas in a common sewer, and whether his not providing such a trap showed want of care on his part, is correct. Butcher v. Providence Gas Co. (1878) 12 R. I. 149, 34 Am. Rep. 626.

An instruction to the effect that whether the plaintiffs were made sick by the defendant's gas alone, or by the gas generated in the same drain through which it passed, if carried by the defendant's gas into the house, the defendants are equally liable, provided the jury should find the plaintiffs not guilty of negligence and that the defendants were guilty of negligence, is correct. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1864) 8 Allen, 199, 35 Am. Dec. 997.

Where the jury in the main part of the charge were told that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show affirmatively "that the injury was occasioned by the negligence of the servants of the defendant company; and that in no material degree did the negligence of the tenant of the plaintiff contribute to that injury;" that "the question was whether either of the parties were negligent, or not, if either, which;" that the plaintiff must satisfy "upon the whole evidence by a fair preponderance of the evidence that he was in the exercise of due care, of such care as a prudent man might reasonably be expected to exercise under the circumstances; that the explosion was caused by the negligence of the defendants;" the company being liable in damages "if the plaintiff's tenant was in the exercise of due care;" if the tenant "having discovered the presence of gas in unusual quantities in the house, or in a room of the house, did not take reasonable means and precautions to remove and exclude the gas, or, not knowing what such precautions were, did not inform the servants of the defendant that gas was escaping, or make some reasonable effort to notify them, and if he recklessly brought the flame of the candle into contact with gas and air of the room, his want of care will prevent recovery."—the court held such instructions were not erroneous. Bartlett v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1877) 122 Mass. 209.

Where the plaintiff's request for instructions to the jury had reference to the duty imposed upon the tenant in using a light while trying to find the escape of illuminating gas, and the tenant had testified that he supposed the gas to come from the furnace and therefore not liable to explode, and that he went into the cellar to examine the furnace, the whole question presented was as to the single act of going into the cellar with a light; whether that act was negligence depending on whether the tenant acted reasonably in supposing it was a kind of gas which would not ignite and explode from the flames of a candle, and therefore the judge in giving such instructions took nothing from the jury improperly. Ibid.

But if there is no evidence to prove negligence, it is not for the jury but for the court to decide, the case being a specific instruction to return a verdict for the defendant. Allegheny Heating Co. v. Bohan (1896) 118 Pa. 223, 228.

And in such a case it is error to instruct the jury that it is for them to consider and decide whether there is negligence or not. Ibid.

Therefore where there was no evidence to show that the plaintiff knew that gas was escaping, and omitted natural and necessary precautions, a refusal of the judge to present to the jury a question for which there is no foundation in the proof, will be sustained. Lee v. Troy Citizens Gas-Light Co. (1885) 98 N. Y. 115, 118.

On a charge to the jury to the effect that if the plaintiff had reason to believe that the gas was escaping, and knew the danger of escaping gas, and left his horse in the stable without providing for the danger, thinking the escape was not sufficient to do any damage, he could not recover, the court held that, as an absolute matter of law that could not properly be said because negligence was not an inevitable and necessary inference, and although there was reason to believe that gas was escaping, yet such reason was in that case balanced and neutralized by other reasons to the contrary, it being possible that gas may escape sufficiently to taint the air with its odor and yet not sufficiently to endanger animal life, so that the plaintiff's closing of the barn after the workmen who has been attending to the gas had left for a single night might not be absolutely and necessarily a negligent act. Ibid.

VI. Effect of contributing causes.

In an action against a gas company to recover damages for an escape of gas, the fact that other causes contribute to the plaintiff's damage is no bar to the action, but may affect the question of damages. Sherman v. Fall River Iron Works Co. (1862) 5 Allen, 213.

The mere fact that furnace gas co-operated in producing the injury will not excuse the defendant from liability for so much of the injury as the jury find due to the negligent escape of gas. Butcher v. Providence Gas Co. supra.

A gas company is not relieved from liability for personal injuries resulting from its negligence in not exercising a reasonable supervision over a gas box beneath a sidewalk, by the fact that its position had become dangerous by reason of the city's widening the sidewalk, as the more dangerous its location becomes by an authorized act of the city, the greater is its duty to keep it safely covered. District of Columbia v. Washington Gas Light Co. (1891) 9 Mackey, 39.

A lateral connection with a gas company's main pipes, including a gas box in the street, being in legal contemplation a part of the company's apparatus, where the company alone is authorized by engaged in searching for said defect, and, while so engaged, said natural gas, then being inflammable and liable to explode, did explode, with such violence as to produce the injuries complained of. It is also alleged that appellant was free from contributory negligence, and that the appellee knew of the dangerous character of said natural gas;

the legislature to make such connections, although in fact made and paid for by the lot owner under an authorized municipal ordinance, and the company is liable for personal injuries resulting from its failure. Ibid.

If gas pipes laid in a street are broken by heavy piles of bricks removed from old buildings through an unlawful use of the streets, and also by the carelessness of dumping heavy building materials, the gas company will not be liable, but if they are broken from the ordinary and customary use of the streets, the contrary is the case. Brown v. New York Gas Light Co. (1850) Anthony, N. P. 351, 355.

VII. Effect of negligence of third person.

Where a person employs a man to furnish materials, and another to do the work with those materials, if the second man is guilty of negligence, the first will not be relieved from liability where the primary cause of the injury sustained was the defective material so supplied. Burrows v. March Gas & Coke Co. (1873) L. R. 7 Exch. 96, 41 L. J. Exch. 44, 26 L. T. N. S. 818, 20 Week. Rep. 498.

Thus where the defendant's liability arises from a breach of contract in not supplying a proper service pipe, even if the person whose negligence is the immediate cause of the explosion had been in the plaintiff's service, the defendants are nevertheless liable. Burrows v. March Gas & Coke Co. (1870) L. R. 5 Exch. 67, 39 L. J. Exch. 33, 22 L. T. N. S. 24.

If the intervening misconduct of the occupant of the premises produced the explosion which was the immediate cause of the injury to plaintiff's building, the latter cannot charge the legal responsibility for that result upon the original negligent act or omission of the defendant company, the reason resting upon the relation that the tenant, as to the property, is having the present control and charge of it, and whose duty it therefore is to take reasonable care to prevent damage from such causes. Bartlett v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1876) 117 Mass. 533, 536, 19 Am. Rep. 421.

If the gas company has never assumed in fact to furnish or interfere with the pipes inside of the meters in the building to which it furnishes gas, or with furnishing the gas fixtures, but has uniformly permitted without objection the person who had been employed by gas consumers to furnish and put up such pipes and fixtures, to let on the gas after furnishing and putting them in, such permission will not constitute such person the agent of the company for whose acts it will be responsible, and an instruction to this effect in an action against a gas company for damages occasioned by an explosion of gas is pertinent and according to the particular question in hand essential as a proper explanation of the law upon the subject. Flint v. Gloucester Gas Light Co. (1862) 3 Allen, 343.

In Flint v. Gloucester Gas Light Co. (1865) 9 Allen, 552, the nonliability of the gas-light company for the act of the party in making the connection in the plaintiff's house, such person having ceased to be an employé of the company and merely permitted to continue to let on the gas at the request but there is no allegation as to the cause of such explosion, nor that the gas would have exploded without some intervening agency.

That it was negligence to omit to turn off the gas from said premises when so requested is not controverted, and we do not decide otherwise; but it is insisted that this alleged negligence was not the proximate cause of of consumers, was somewhat placed upon the question that the party injured had notice that his employment by the company had ceased.

In that case the facts showed that plaintiff's husband, the owner of property, employed and paid a certain person to put gas pipes therein connected with a service pipe laid for that purpose by the defendant, and also to put up and arrange the necessary fixtures and burners in some of the rooms, no fixtures being placed in the room and no cap kept over the end of the pipe which opened into it; that after adjusting the fixtures the party examined all the rooms except the one in question, and then turned on the gas, and lighting up the house went away and an explosion occurred later. Further facts disclosed that the party employed, then the only gas fitter in the town, had several years previously been the superintendent and agent of the company, and still continued as before to turn on the gas with the knowledge of and without any objection on the company's part, but not at the request of the superintendent or any other officer of the company, although within the superintendent's knowledge and without his objection, he afterwards collected the bills for the gas. It was the defendant's business to turn on the gas and no one except under its authority had such right such person making in advance a careful examination. Plaintiff contended that under the circumstances the party so employed was the agent of the defendant for turning on the gas in supplying it to consumers, and that he acted as such agent in turning on the gas in that case. The court held the facts not sufficient to constitute such person the company's agent so as to render it liable, the mere fact of it permitting or consenting to the party turning on the gas not being sufficient.

The New York Statutes of 1859, chap. 811, § 4, imposes no duty upon a gas company towards the protection of the occupants against the negligence of the use of the owner's or occupants' property, but merely gives them a right to inspect, for the purpose of protecting their rights, as to the quantity of gas consumed or supplied. Schmeer v. Gas-Light Co. of Syracuse (1892) 66 Hun, 373.

In Chartiers Valley Gas Co. v. Lynch (1888) 118 Pa. 363, a natural gas corporation having entered into a written contract for the laying of certain pipes upon a certain street, with a certain contractor, whose work was done in such a negligent manner as to cause an explosion, the court held that the company was not liable provided there was nothing to show an acceptance of the work with knowledge of the contractor's negligence.

And this even though the 10th section of the Pennsylvania Act of May 29, 1866, Pamphlet Laws, 29, makes provision that a company laying a pipe should be liable for all damages occasioned by the negligence of the company. Chartiers Valley Gas Co. v. Lynch, supra.

Where the contention was that the fault lay in the city officers not packing back the dirt properly in the sewer, whereby it settled and broke the defendant's pipe, the court charged that if the city was liable it did not follow that the defendant was excused, as, if others were at work around the pipes, a new duty was imposed upon the company to guard against the want of care in others, and to use proper care in remedying defects caused by such the injury, and that the specific facts pleaded disclose the negligence of the appellant contributing to the injury. That the injury complained of must appear from the facts alleged to have been the proximate result of the appellee's negligence is not questioned by the appellant, but it is argued that the injury resulted proximately from the failure to turn the gas from said premises. It is said that, "had not the appellee been guilty of the negligence alleged, the injuries to the appellant would not have happened." This argument is not tenable, since it can be said with equal propriety that the injury would not have been sustained if the appellant had not undertaken the known danger-want of care. Butcher v. Providence Gas Co. (1878) 12 R. I. 149, 34 Am. Rep. 626.

In Milwaukee Gas Light Co. v. Schooner Gamecock (1868) 23 Wis. 144, 99 Am. Dec. 138, the company sought to recover damages for injuries done to its gas pipes through the negligence of the defendant, caused by the towing of an anchor of a vessel up and down a river; the court held that if such act was done without negligence on the part of the manager of the vessel there was no liability, aliter if negligence were proved.

In Rapson v. Cubitt (1842) 6 Mees. & W. 716, Car. & M. 64, 6 Jur. 606, the defendant, a builder, was employed to execute alterations about the premises, including the preparation and fixing of gas fittings, and made a subcontract with a gas fitter to execute the latter work and an explosion occurred through the negligence of the gas fitter, whereby the plaintiff was injured, and it was held the defendant was not liable.

In Burrows v. March Gas & Coke Co. (1870) L. R. 5 Exch. 69, 39 L. J. Exch. 33, 22 L. T. N. S. 24, the defendants contracted to supply plaintiff with proper service pipe to convey gas from the main outside to a meter inside of his premises. The gas escaping from the pipe laid down under the contract, the servant of a gas fitter employed at the plaintiff's house at another job at the time, went into the shop to discover the leak, holding a lighted candle in his hand, when an explosion took place. The jury found that the escape was occasioned by a defect in the pipe which existed at the time it was supplied, and secondly negligence on the part of the gas fitter's servant in carrying the candle; and the court held the plaintiff entitled to recover, the negligence of the gas fitter's servant not relieving them from responsibility.

VIII. Act of fellow servant.

In an action brought by an employé against the gas company to recover damages occasioned by an explosion of gas caused through the negligence of another servant, if such servant was a fellow servant of the plaintiff, there can be no recovery. Allegheny Heating Co. v. Bohan (1893) 118 Pa. 223, 228.

In Hatfield v. St. John Gas Light Co. (1898) 32 N. B. 109, the facts showed that defendant's manager, engaged in laying a new main and connecting the service pipes to the house, finding their own men unable to make the connections as fast as desired, applied for the plaintiff to assist the company in making the connections, and while working the gas was allowed to escape through the main and became ignited by the fire from a salamander, used in carrying on the work, part of that in which the plaintiff was engaged being performed at the shop where he was previously employed, the connections of the main being made by him at places shown to him by its servant; his wages being paid by his former employer who charged defendant therewith. The jury found the plaintiff was acting under the directions of the defendant as a servant of his former employer and under his control, and the court held that he was not the servant of the defendant so as to become a fellow servant engaged in a common employment, and was therefore entitled to recover against the defendant for the negligence of its servants.

In the above case, however, there was a dissenting opinion by Justice Tuck in which he considered the 29 L. R. A.

plaintiff the servant of the gas company, and therefore a coemployé. Hatfield v. St. John Gas Light Co. supra.

IX. The question of notice.

It is the plaintiff's duty to use reasonable efforts to avoid or prevent the danger, and to give defendants notice of the injury to which he is subjected, and afford defendants an opportunity to remedy the difficulty. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1861) 1 Allen, 343.

If the defendants are notified, it is their duty to remedy the evil with all speed whatever may be the cause of the breakage, and having sufficient notice of the impending danger and failing in this, they are liable independent of every other consideration, provided the plaintiff has not been guilty of contributory negligence. Brown v. New York Gas Light Co. (1860) Anthon, N. P. 351, 355.

Notice or knowledge will be presumed where the circumstances are such that the authorities, by the exercise of proper and reasonable diligence, might have known of the defects which caused the damage complained of. Kibele v. Philadelphia (1884) 105 Pa. 41, 44.

It is competent for the plaintiff to prove that an inmate of his family communicated to the defendants the fact that gas was escaping from some leak in their pipes into the house, making its occupancy either unsafe, disagreeable or offensive. Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co. (1862) 3 Allen, 418.

A wife is competent to send a message to that effect by any person to whom she may think fit to entrust it. Ibid.

As it is immaterial how and by what means or through whom the company obtained information. Ibid.

It being sufficient that they have by any means been made acquainted with the fact that their pipes have become imperfect and leak, and that the gas is thereby emitted into the plaintiff's house, to make it their duty to attend immediately to it, and to use due diligence to stop the leak and exclude the gas from the premises. Ibid.

A gas company is bound to keep up such a reasonable inspection of its mains and pipes as will enable it to detect when there is such an escape by fracture or imperfection of the pipes, as may lead to danger of an explosion; and if an explosion takes place from a fracture or defect which has existed for several days, during which time it has also been discoverable by reason of the smell of escaping gas, and would have been discovered by proper inspection, the court held that there was evidence of negligence on the company's part and it was not enough to relieve them from liability that upon notice of the escape they sent a workman to repair the defect, who arrived too late. Mose v. Hastings & St. Leonard's Gas Co. (1864) 4 Fost. & F. 324.

X. As between landlord and tenant.

If the owner of property let to one on the first floor, and by reason of his negligent introduction of an insufficient fixture on the second, or any other floor, whether in the occupation of himself or a second tenant, the tenant below suffers damage, he may have recourse to the landlord. Kimmell v. Burfeind (1866) 2 Daly, 155. See also Bartlett v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1877) 123 Mass. 209, heads VI. and VII., supra. See also head XI., infra.

ous experiment of searching for the defect while the gas was flowing into the pipes of the tenement. But we can say as a matter of common knowledge that the injury was not due to spontaneous combustion, and that it was impossible without some agency acting upon the leaking gas. Therefore we can say, further, that but for such agency the injury had not been. We cannot say that the intervening agent was not a responsible agent,

XL. Rights of the owner of the reversion.

The conduct of a tenant will affect the landlord's right to recover for the injury in the same way as it affects the right of the tenant to recover for his own injuries, although no identity of interest is established in the subject-matter of either action, no mutual or successive relationship of the same right of property involved being shown, the landlord being in no sense surety for the conduct of the tenant, neither party representing the other in either action. Bartlett v. Boston Gas Light Co. (1877) 122 Mass. 209.

In Bartlett v. Boston Gas Light Co., supra, the action was brought to recover injuries to the plaintiff's reversionary interest and estate caused by an explosion of gas, the facts showing that the house wherein the explosion occurred was occupied by a tenant of the plaintiff under a written lease; that the gas escaped through a leak in the street pipe of which the company had notice, and worked through the soil into the house; that the tenant smelling gas took a candle, went through the house, and tried the gas fixtures without discovering the leak, but during the night the smell of the gas became stronger especially in a hot-air register in a closet in the sleeping room, by which the plaintiff thought that the smell came from the furnace; that he then took a lighted candle and descended to the cellar to examine the furnace when the explosion occurred, seriously injuring the tenant and causing damage to the house. The court held that although the tenant had himself recovered damages against the company for the injuries thus inflicted, it was no bar to the plaintiff's action for the injury to his reversionary interest, the plaintiff's right to recover for the destruction of his building being entirely independent of the tenant's claim for personal injury, the defendant not claiming through or under the tenant.

It is not enough that both actions were brought to recover damages for injuries from the same cause and were supported by the same evidence. Bartlett v. Boston Gas Light Co. supra.

XII. Effect of, upon insurance.

As to the liability of an insurer for loss caused by explosions, see note to Heuer v. Northwestern Nat. Ins. Co. (1893) (Ill.) 19 L. R. A. 594.

In Lindsay v. Bridgewater Gas Co. (1894) 24 Pittab. L. J. N. S. 276, 14 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 181, the defendants sought a new trial, upon the ground that the plaintiff's damages were covered by the amount of insurance money received by him from an insurance company. The court held the fact that the insurance company had paid the amount of insurance did not relieve the defendant company from damages occasioned by its negligence in the explosion of natural gas, the plaintiff's claim against the defendant company being for the wrong done him, while the money received from the insurance company was due upon a contract to which the defendant was in no way privy, and in respect to which his own wrongful act can give him no equities.

XIII. Gas generated by accident.

Where crude oil kept for fuel was negligently permitted to leak into the soil and escape into the sewer, where it generated gases which damaged the plaintiff's premises, the defendant was held liable. Brady v. Detroit Steel & Spring Co. (1894) 26 L. R. A. 175, 102 Mich. 277.

In Fuchs v. St. Louis (1895) (Mo.) 21 S. W. Rep. 115, the question was whether the facts tended to show a liability on the part of the defendants, the 29 L. R. A.

explosion occurring through the generated gases created by petroleum running into the sewer and having no ready means of escape. The court held with respect to the question whether or not the case should have gone to the jury on the question of negligence, or irrespective of any inquiry as to the capacity or construction of the sewer, in that state, the city was liable for any omission of reasonable or ordinary care in the management of such a property, the question of ordinary care depending upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case which were to be submitted to the jury.

XIV. Right of action over.

A municipal corporation against which a recovery has been had for personal injuries caused by an explosion of gas, is not deprived of its right to maintain an action over against one primarily liable, such as a gas company, by the fact that the injuries were caused in part by a defect in the street for which the city was primarily liable, where it is not shown that the city had any notice of such defect. District of Columbia v. Washington Gas Light Co. (1891) 9 Mackey, 39.

In Philadelphia v. Central Traction Co. (1895) 165 Pa. 456, where trespass was brought to recover money paid by the plaintiff for injuries caused by the negligence of the defendants, the facts showing that an explosion occurred from gas leaking through a broken pipe of the plaintiff company, against whom judgments had been recovered by the parties injured, appeals being taken in the cases which were subsequently compromised, the plaintiff seeking to recover from the defendants the damages they had sustained by reason of their negligence in excavating the street and causing the breakage of the pipe,—the court held the action maintainable.

The writer of this note in his search among the authorities has come across the following cases of which he has been unable to find any official report, the only reference thereto being the Gas Journal to which he has, after several attempts, been unable to obtain access. He therefore appends a list of them so that the practitioner may, should he be able to reach that journal, determine for himself the exact point decided in each. not conscious of the presence and dangerous character of the explosive, or an infant, or an insane person.

The facts essential to a consideration of this important question are wholly absent. The burden rested upon the appellant to allege facts showing that the injury was due to the appellee's negligence, and from the facts alleged we learn that the omission complained of supplied the condition upon which necessarily some agent acted in producing the injury. The omission was an antecedent to the explosion. If the omitted facts should disclose an agency for which the appellee was responsible, a different case would be made; and if such facts disclosed that the appellant sought the defect in the pipe carrying a lighted lamp, which caused the explosion, the question would then arise as to whether his own act was not the intervening agency, and whether the act so operating did not insulate the negligence of the appellee from the injury, and establish contributory negligence. The facts alleged do not disclose peril to the appellant, or any other person, urging him to hazard his life in searching for the defect before the gas was cut off, and thereby possibly excusing the intervention of such agency. The defective pipe is not charged to any negligence of the appellee, and the presence of the escaping gas and its dangerous character are not alleged to have been unknown to the appellant. The facts, as they are presented, raise the inquiry as to whether the alleged negligence of the company was the proximate cause of the injury, regardless of whatever agency intervened. If it can be said that the escaping gas was the direct and efficient or proximate cause of the injury, to the exclusion of every fact or circumstance that might have operated upon it, and that no agency could have taken it up, and employed it so as to have become the dominating and effective cause, then this complaint is sufficient so far as this question is concerned; otherwise it is not.

In Cuff v. Newark & N. Y. R. Co., 35 N. J. L. 17, 10 Am. Rep. 205, it was said, in considering the question of intervening agencies: "A. places a log in the highway, which B. casts into an adjoining close, or puts an obstruction upon the sidewalk, which passers-by throw into the roadway of the street, and a traveler is injured by coming in contact with it. A. cannot be held for the trespass in the one case, nor for the injury in the other."

Mercur, J., in Oil Creek & A. R. R. Co. v. Keighron, 74 Pa. 820, said: "Natural and proximate cause' I understand to be that the cause alleged produced the injury complained of, without any other cause intervening."

In Carter v. Towns, 108 Mass. 507, gunpowder had been sold to a boy, and subsequently came under the control of adults, who permitted the boy to fire it off. For the injury resulting to the boy from the explosion of the powder, it was held that the merchant was not liable, because of the intervening negligence of the adults in so permitting the use of the powder. The rule that an intervening responsible agent cuts off the line of causation from the original negligence has been many times recognized by this court, and is not questioned by the learned counsel for the appellant; and if we may indulge the ordinary presumptions against the pleading under consideration, in the absence of any allegation as to the agency necessary to have intervened, we will presume that it was a responsible agent. The presumption most favorable to the appellee must be indulged, and that is that the intervening agency was the appellant's own act in carrying a lighted lamp, which caused the explosion. Leaving out of view the doctrine of contributory negligence, the skill of the appellant in the business of plumbing, and his acquaintance necessarily with the explosive character of natural gas, gives emphasis to his responsibility for the explosion. See Bartlett v. Boston Gas Light Co. 117 Mass. 533, 19 Am. Rep. 421; Fitzgerald v. Connecticut River Paper Co. 155 Mass. 155.

The complaint was insufficient, and the circuit court committed no error in sustaining the appellee's demurrer.

The judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Luther KOUNTZE et al., Appts.,
v.

Edward S. T. KENNEDY, Exr., etc., of John P. Kennedy, Deceased, Resp't.

(147 N. Y. 124.)

1. A representation upon which an action for fraud can be based must be false.

NOTE.—In connection with the very valuable presentation in the above case of the law respecting liability to actions for fraud on account of misrepresentations honestly made attention is particularly called to the similarly valuable case of Nash v. Minnesota Title Ins. & T. Co. (Mass.) 28 L. R. A. 753, and references therewith.

material, and made knowing it was false, or recklessly made not knowing or caring whether it was true or false.

2. Intentional fraud as distinguished from mere breach of duty or omission to use due care, is an essential factor in an action for deceit.

3. A misrepresentation designed to influence the conduct of another and upon which he acts to his prejudice, if honestly made believing it to be true, cannot create liability to an action for deceit.

4. The omission of a claim then in litigation from a statement of the entire assets and liabilities of a corporation, which is made by the president of the company but not stated or understood to be made upon his personal knowledge, does not make him liable for fraud and deceit to a person purchasing bonds of the company on the faith of such statements, where the president believed and had reasonable cause to believe that the claim was not valid or enforceable against the company.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment entered in the office of the Clerk of New York County upon the report of the referee in favor of defendant in an action brought to hold decedent's estate liable for deceit alleged to have been practiced by him in inducing plaintiffs to buy certain corporate stock. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wheeler H. Peckham and George W. Van Slyck, for appellants:

The facts essential to maintain an action for deceit, are "representation, falsity, scienter, deception, and injury."

Arthur v. Griswold, 55 N. Y. 400; Brackett v. Griswold, 112 N. Y. 467.

Here we have representations of liabilities.....$500,000.00
Falsity—actual liabilities..... 656,788.98
Scienter, in that defendant knew of and defended against these liabilities and was president of the company.

Deception, in that plaintiffs did not know of these liabilities but relied on the statement as an exhibit of "the entire assets and liabilities."

Injury, in that plaintiffs purchased the bonds and stock of the company, which were substantially worthless.

Given the facts of falsity and scienter, the intent to deceive follows.

Pappenheim v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 25 Jones & S. 281; Welsh v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 25 Jones & S. 458.

Plaintiffs are entitled to select the findings most favorable to themselves, and to rely on them in aid of their exceptions.

Schwinger v. Raymond, 88 N. Y. 193, 88 Am. Rep. 418; Bonnell v. Griswold, 89 N. Y. 122.

When the defendant made representation as to the "entire assets and liabilities" of the company, he was bound to state all he knew.

1 Benjamin, Sales, p. 685, note 51; Gough v. Dennis, Hill & D. Supp. 55; Patterson v. Kirkland, 84 Miss. 423; Nickley v. Thomas, 23 Barb. 652.

As president and active director defendant is charged by law with knowledge of the financial condition of the company.

Huntington v. Attrill, 118 N. Y. 367.

His making representations as if he knew them to be true, when, in fact, he did not know them to be true, is deceit, and if they are false and injury follows, the cause of action is made out.

Bullitt v. Farrer, 6 L. R. A. 149, 43 Minn. 8; Stone v. Denny, 4 Met. 151; Chatham Furnace Co. v. Moffatt, 147 Mass. 408; 1 Bigelow, Fr. p. 512; Litchfield v. Hutchinson, 117 Mass. 195.

The person in a position to know, having all the outward indicia of knowledge, and speaking without limiting language, is presumed to be making a statement as within his own knowledge, and if he has not that knowledge and the thing turns out to be not true, he is liable therefor.

That rule has constantly been applied to the position of a president of a corporation.

Barnes v. Union Pac. R. Co. 12 U. S. App. 1, 54 Fed. Rep. 87.

There are cases in which the nondisclosure of a material fact may be equivalent to active misrepresentation; for withholding of that which is not stated may make that which is stated absolutely false.

Concede that the defendant thought that, if the plaintiffs did invest their money, and that if he invested his own money, the enterprise would be successful, and the question of his liability for not disclosing the facts as to its affairs at the time would never arise; for just that kind of a fraud the defendant is liable.

Cross v. Devine, 46 Hun. 421; Ward v. Wieman, 17 Wend. 198; Haight v. Hayt, 19 N. Y. 464.

Mr. William R. Bronk, for respondent:

The rule that general findings of a referee are controlled by special findings, and that an appellant is entitled to select and rely upon the findings most favorable to him, has been changed.

Redfield v. Redfield, 110 N. Y. 671; Green v. Roworth, 118 N. Y. 462; Traders Nat. Bank v. Parker, 130 N. Y. 415.

It cannot be inferred, as claimed by appellants, that because it was found that the company and Mr. Kennedy defended against the credit company claim, that, therefore, he must have known of it.

The effect of this would be for this court to make a finding which the referee has expressly refused to make, which this court has held it will not do.

Meyer v. Amidon, 45 N. Y. 169.

The findings of fact of the referee, affirmed as they are by the general term upon conflicting evidence, are binding and conclusive on this court.

McCarthy v. McCarthy, 143 N. Y. 235; Dibble v. Demick, Id. 549.

Assuming that the defendant made representations to the plaintiffs, and assuming further that he made them so as to convey to plaintiffs the impression that he had actual knowledge of their truth, and assuming still further that they were not in fact true, but that the defendant did not know they were not true, but believed and had reasonable cause to believe that they were true, he is not under the authorities liable for fraud.

Daly v. Wise, 16 L. R. A. 236, 132 N. Y. 306; Marsh v. Fulker, 40 N. Y. 563; Meyer v. Amidon, 45 N. Y. 169; Oberlander v. Spiess, 45 N. Y. 175; Chester v. Comstock, 40 N. Y. 576, note; McIntyre v. Buell, 132 N. Y. 192; Constant v. University of Rochester, 133 N. Y. 640; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 884; Cowley v. Smyth, 46 N. J. L. 380, 50 Am. Rep. 432.

The danger that might result from asserting a conclusive presumption of knowledge in directors or officers of a corporation is well stated in Wakeman v. Dalley, 51 N. Y. 27, 10 Am. Rep. 551.

Statements of value do not, even if false, vitiate a contract, for value is a matter as to which neither party is supposed to trust the other, but upon which each is bound to exercise his own judgment.

Smith v. Countryman, 80 N. Y. 681; Gordon v. Butler, 105 U. S. 553, 26 L. ed. 1166; Somar v. Canaday, 58 N. Y. 298, 13 Am. Rep. 623; Ellis v. Andrews, 55 N. Y. 83; Chrysler v. Canaday, 90 N. Y. 272, 43 Am. Rep. 186; Veasey v. Doton, 3 Allen, 380; Parker v. Moulton, 114 Mass. 100, 19 Am. Rep. 815; Holbrook v. Connor, 60 Me. 584, 11 Am. Rep. 212.

Plaintiffs did not rely upon the representations made by Mr. Kennedy, but made and had offered to them every facility for making their own independent examination as to every item of the statement.

Schumaker v. Mather, 183 N. Y. 590; Southern Development Co. of Nevada v. Silva, 125 U. S. 248, 31 L. ed. 679; Long v. Warren, 68 N. Y. 426; 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 822; Slaughter v. Gerson, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 379, 20 L. ed. 627; Cooper v. Harvey, 41 N. Y. 8, R. 594; Poland v. Brownell, 131 Mass. 138, 41 Am. Rep. 215; Nelson v. Luling, 62 N. Y. 545.

Under the form in which this action is brought it is immaterial whether the representations made were entirely and precisely true in every item and detail or not, unless it is also made to appear (as is not the fact), that the representations made an appreciable diminution of the value of the plaintiff's bonds.

A party who claims to have been defrauded has one of three courses open to him:

1. He can rescind the transaction, and on offering to restore what he has received can maintain an action to recover what he parted with; or

2. He can bring suit in equity to obtain a rescission and offer in his pleading to restore what he has received, and in that suit recover what he parted with; or,

3. He can keep what he has received and sue for damages for the fraud.

Gould v. Cayuga County Nat. Bank, 86 N. Y. 75, 99 N. Y. 838; Bowen v. Manderille, 95 N. Y. 287; Vail v. Reynolds, 118 N. Y. 297.

The effect of the election by a party of one or the other of these courses is important, and the rules which govern them and the kind and degree of proof necessary to sustain them widely different.

Rothmiller v. Stein, 143 N. Y. 581.

In the case at bar the plaintiffs have elected to keep what they have received and to sue for damages for the alleged fraud. In this form of action the plaintiffs must allege and prove that they have sustained damages by reason of the fraud, i. e., that the question of damages is part of the cause of action; and if no damages be shown to result from the identical fraudulent act complained of, plaintiff cannot recover.

Deobold v. Oppermann, 2 L. R. A. 644, 111 N. Y. 581; Hedden v. Griffin, 186 Mass. 229, 49 Am. Rep. 25; Dawe v. Morris, 4 L. R. A. 29 L. R. A.

158, 149 Mass. 192; McIntyre v. Buell, 132 N. Y. 192; Vail v. Reynolds, 118 N. Y. 297; Bigelow, Fr. 628, 629; Morse v. Hutchins, 103 Mass. 489; Williams v. McFadden, 23 Fla. 142.

Neither in the kind nor degree of their proof have the plaintiffs brought their case within the rigid requirements of an action for damages for fraud. Every presumption is in the defendant's favor.

Baird v. New York, 86 N. Y. 592; Morris v. Talcott, Id. 107; Kerr, Fr. p. 384; Constant v. University of Rochester, 183 N. Y. 640.

Plaintiff must establish five separate things to succeed, viz., representations, falsity, scienter, deception and injury. Each must be established separately and independently, and if any one of these be lacking their case fails.

Brackett v. Griswold, 112 N. Y. 467.

An intent to defraud is not proven by and is not necessarily to be inferred solely from the falsity of a representation. It must be clearly proven as a separate fact and defendant knew the falsity.

If a person believes that the representations he makes are true at the time he makes them, he is not guilty of fraud, however false they may be in fact.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs on this appeal are met by the serious difficulty that the finding of the referee, affirmed by the general term, exonerated the defendant's testator from the charge of fraud in making the representations upon which the plaintiffs relied in purchasing the bonds and stock of the Howe Machine Company. If this finding has support in the evidence it ends all controversy upon the merits here, because, although it was found that the statement of the liabilities of the company presented by Kennedy to the plaintiffs, upon the faith of which the purchase was made, was grossly inaccurate, and largely understated the actual liabilities of the company, nevertheless, if Kennedy believed the statement to be a true exhibit of the affairs of the company and was guilty of no dishonesty, the action must fail. The principle stated by Croke, J., in [Baily v. Merrell], 3 Bulst.

95, in respect to actions for damages for deceit, that "fraud without damage, or damage without fraud, gives no cause of action, but when these two concur an action lies," has ever since been recognized as the true rule governing the subject. The cases are numerous. The principle has been obscured by the use by judges of the phrase "legal fraud," which has sometimes been interpreted as meaning fraud by construction, and as indicating that something less than actual fraud may sustain an action for deceit. The gravamen of the action is actual fraud, and nothing less will sustain it. The representation upon which it is based must be shown not only to have been false and material, but that the defendant when he made it knew that it was false, or not knowing whether it was true or false and not caring what the fact might be, made it recklessly, paying no heed to the injury which might ensue. Misjudgment, however gross, or want of caution, however marked, is not fraud. Intentional fraud, as distinguished from a mere breach of duty or the omission to use due care, is an essential factor in an action for deceit. The man who intentionally deceives another to his injury should be legally responsible for the consequences. But if through inattention, want of judgment, reliance upon information which a wiser man might not credit, misconception of the facts or of his moral obligation to inquire, he makes a representation designed to influence the conduct of another, and upon which the other acts to his prejudice, yet, if the misrepresentation was honestly made, believing it to be true, whatever other liability he may incur he cannot be made liable in an action for deceit. The law affords remedies for the consequences of innocent misrepresentation. A contract induced thereby may, in many cases, be avoided, and the equitable powers of courts are frequently interposed for the rescission of contracts or transactions based upon mistake or innocent misrepresentation. While the common-law action of deceit furnishes a remedy for fraud which ought to be preserved, we think it should be kept within its ancient limits, and should not by construction be extended to embrace dealings which, however unfortunate they may have proved to one of the parties, were not induced by actual intentional fraud on the part of the other. We have referred to a representation made without knowing whether it was true or false, and where the party making it was indifferent whether it was true or false, as sufficient to sustain the action if the representation was in fact untrue. The making of a representation to influence the conduct of the person to whom it is made, carries with it an assurance, necessarily implied from the situation, of the belief of the party making it in the truth of the affirmation. As was said by Maule, J., in Evans v. Edmonds, 13 C. B. 777, "he takes upon himself to warrant his own belief of the truth of that he asserts, and a man who makes a representation which he neither knows nor cares whether it is true or not, can have no real belief in the truth of what he asserts, and is justly guilty of deception." So, also, it has been held that one who falsely asserts a material fact, susceptible of accurate knowledge to be true of his own knowledge, and thereby induces another to act upon the fact represented to his prejudice, commits a fraud which will sustain an action for deceit. This is not an exception to, but an application of, the principle that actual fraud must be shown to sustain such an action. The purpose of the party asserting his personal knowledge is to induce belief in the fact represented, and if he has no knowledge, and the fact is one upon which special knowledge can be predicated, the inference of fraudulent intent in the absence of explanation naturally results. We shall refer to the subject again when we come to consider one of the points made by the plaintiffs.

In the present case the plaintiffs invested more than $100,000 in the bonds and stock of the Howe Machine Company in April, 1884, and the company went into the hands of a receiver in the fall of 1885, and the plaintiffs practically lost their whole investment. They purchased upon the application of Kennedy, who was president of the corporation, and the statement of assets and liabilities furnished by Kennedy at their request after the application and before the purchase, showed that the assets, real and personal, as valued in the statement, exceeded one million dollars, and that the liabilities were five hundred thousand dollars. And the referee found that the statement was presented by Kennedy as a statement of the entire assets and liabilities. The voluminous record before us is taken up to a large extent with the evidence on the one side to show the untruthfulness of the statement both as respects the assets and liabilities, and of circumstances which as was claimed tended to establish that the defendant's testator knew of its falsity when he presented it to the plaintiffs, and on the other side with evidence in rebuttal and by way of explanation of the discrepancies between the value of the assets as given in the statement and what was realized therefrom, and between the actual liabilities and the liabilities as represented, and also evidence bearing upon the good faith of the defendant's testator in making the representation. The evidence was taken before an intelligent and able referee, and we are satisfied that his conclusion that the defendant's testator acted in good faith, and that the statement, although in material respects untrue, was believed by him to be true, is supported by evidence. The facts were fully considered in the opinion of the general term, and a recapitulation here to any considerable extent is unnecessary.

The learned counsel for the plaintiffs insists that the omission from the statement of liabilities of the claim against the Howe Machine Company in favor of the Credit Company, Limited, of England, was upon the undisputed facts a fraudulent concealment. The claim originated in or prior to 1878, and was based on acceptances alleged to have been made by the Howe Machine Company of drafts drawn by one Stockwell upon the company, accepted by his brother, the secretary and treasurer, in the name of the company. It seems to be conceded that the acceptances were made without authority of the company, and that the proceeds were used by the Stockwells in stock speculations in London on their own account. Suit was brought against the company on the drafts in the state of Connecticut in 1878, and as in all cases in that state were commenced by attachment. The company defended the action. In the fall of 1883 the facts were reported, and in 1886, two years after the plaintiffs had purchased their bonds, the court rendered judgment in the action against the Howe Machine Company for the sum of $62,475, the chief justice dissenting. The existence of this claim was not disclosed to the plaintiffs and was not embraced in the items of liabilities mentioned in the statement. It was claimed on the part of the defendant Kennedy that this item was omitted for the reason that the company was advised by counsel that the acceptances did not bind the company and that it could not be made liable in the action, and evidence was given that neither the company nor its counsel regarded the claim as a valid obligation of the company. The referee further found that the defendant Kennedy and the other officers and directors of the company "had reasonable cause to believe that said company was not liable on said claims," and he refused to find the request of the plaintiffs, "that the said defendant (Kennedy) knew of said claim and suit and concealed and intended to conceal the same from the plaintiffs." The defendant's testator was bound to include in the statement all liabilities of the company known to him. He was not required to include claims made which were not valid or enforceable obligations. The defendant omitted this claim from the schedule because he believed it was not a liability of the company. It may be admitted that he was blameworthy in not calling the matter to the attention of the plaintiffs, leaving them to determine whether it constituted a reason for declining the transaction. But if the non-disclosure was attributable to an honest belief that the claim was not valid and could not be enforced, the fraudulent intent is lacking and the charge of deceit fails. The recent case of Derry v. Peek, 14 App. Cas. 337, decided in the house of lords, contains a very full discussion of the principles governing the action for deceit and of the adjudged cases. The action was brought against directors of a company for damages for a false representation contained in a prospectus issued by them, to the effect that the company had authority to use steam-motor power on its tramway, whereby the plaintiff was induced to buy shares of the company. The judges who gave the opinion united in asserting that actual fraud, that is, fraud in intention, and not constructive or implied fraud, was necessary to be shown to uphold the action, and applying this general principle they held that if the defendant believed the representation made by him to be true, although without reasonable cause for such belief, the action would not lie. It is not necessary to go to this extent to uphold the present judgment, for the referee, as has been stated, found that the belief of Kennedy that the claim of the Credit Company, Limited, of London, was unfounded, was based upon reasonable grounds.

The plaintiffs requested the referee to find that the representations of Kennedy to the plaintiffs were so made as to convey the impression that he had actual knowledge of their truth and the referee refused to find as requested. This, it is urged was error requiring a reversal of the judgment. It must be assumed that the referee found that the representations contained in the statement presented by Kennedy were not made, or understood by the plaintiffs to have been made, by him upon his personal knowledge. The evidence and the circumstances support this conclusion. Kennedy testified that when the plaintiffs requested a statement of the assets and liabilities of the company, he informed them that he would request the secretary to prepare it, and after the statement was delivered to the plaintiffs, Luther Kountze, at Kennedy's request, went to Bridgeport to examine the property and while there the items of the statement were gone over between him and Mr. Parmly, the person having the principal management of the business, and the referee found that the inquiries of Mr. Kountze were truthfully answered. It cannot be assumed from the mere form of the statement that the assets and liabilities were given upon the personal knowledge of Kennedy. It related to the affairs of a large corporation, widely extended and having agencies in a great number of the large cities of the country. It would ordinarily be understood that a statement furnished by the president or director of the company of its assets and liabilities would be furnished upon information derived from the books and other sources. Certainly the mere presentation of such a statement, without more, would not amount to an affirmation that the statement was true to his knowledge. There was conflicting evidence upon the trial upon the point whether outside of the statement such an affirmation was made, but that issue was decided against the plaintiffs. Their claim, therefore, that Kennedy represented that the statement was true of his own knowledge, rests solely on the facts that he was president of the corporation, and that he furnished the statement as a statement of the entire assets and liabilities. The most that the plaintiffs could claim was that it became a question of fact, but we are of opinion that the evidence was wholly insufficient to have warranted a finding that Kennedy asserted the truth of the statement as of his own knowledge.

Upon a full examination of all the questions presented by the plaintiffs we have reached the conclusion that there was no material error committed on the trial and the judgment should, therefore, be affirmed.

All concur, except Bartlett, J., who dissents on the ground that it is not proper for an officer of a corporation making a written statement of its indebtedness to a proposed purchaser of its stock to omit therefrom the amount involved in a pending action against the company for the reason that he is of opin-tion that the company will not be held in final judgment; that it is the manifest duty of such officer to inform the proposed purchaser of stock of the existence of this contingent liability, and the failure to do so is a fraud. Peckham, J., not voting.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

COMMONWEALTH of Pennsylvania,

Appt.,

v.

JAMES B. FORREST.

1. Riding a bicycle on a sidewalk or footway incurs the penalty provided by Act May 7, 1890, against driving any horse or any other animal upon such walk, by virtue of the Act of April 23, 1890, declaring that bicycles and persons using them are entitled to the same rights and subject to the same restrictions as are prescribed in case of persons using carriages drawn by horses.
2. One who did not contribute to the construction or maintenance of a sidewalk which he has a right to use, may be an informer for unlawfully riding a bicycle on the sidewalk, the penalty for which is for the use of a school district.
3. The fact that a sidewalk was on land appropriated by a turnpike company, and had been constructed and kept up by the turnpike company aided by contributions from village residents, does not exempt it from the provisions of the Act of 1890 prohibiting the use of such walks by persons riding bicycles.
4. The consent of a turnpike company to the use by bicyclers, of a sidewalk established alongside the highway and on land appropriated by the company, cannot make such use lawful under the Act of 1890 prohibiting the use of bicycles on sidewalks.
5. The unlawful use of a sidewalk by bicyclers for a time without complaint cannot avail as a defense to the prosecution of a person for such offense.

A PPEAL by the Commonwealth from a judgment of the Quarter Sessions for Union County reversing a judgment of a justice of the peace imposing a fine upon defendant for unlawfully riding a bicycle upon the sidewalk. Reversed.

Prior to the hearing of the cause the appellee moved to quash the appeal because:

First: The commonwealth had no right of appeal.

(b) Because no writ of error (now appeal) lies upon a summary conviction.

(b) Because this is a case of summary conviction before a magistrate under a special statute, which provides for no appeal from the quarter sessions of the supreme court.

NOTE.—For regulation of bicycle riding in general, see Twilley v. Perkins (Md.) 19 L. R. A. 632, and note therewith. For a later case, see Geiser v. Perkiomen & R. Turnp. Road (Pa.) 28 L. R. A. 458, as to the right to tolls for bicycles, and Thompson v. Dodge (Minn.) 28 L. R. A. 608, as to the fright of a horse by a bicycle on a highway.

(c) Because the constitution and statute giving the right of appeal in cases of summary conviction, limit the appeal to the quarter sessions.

(d) Because the commonwealth has no right to a bill of exceptions in this case.

Second: Even if this case were within the act allowing exceptions to the commonwealth in cases of nuisance or forcible entry and detainer or forcible detainer, that act provides that the appeal must be specially allowed by this court or a judge thereof, and the record shows no such allowance.

Third: And if an appeal would lie, it must be taken in this court; whereas the record shows the appeal in this case was entered only in the quarter sessions.

Fourth: The record shows further that the appeal was entered in the quarter sessions on the 8th of December, 1894, to wit, after the writ of certiorari issued out of this court (dated 4th of December, 1894), had been lodged in the quarter sessions, to wit, on December 7, 1894.

Fifth: The appeal assigns error, not the final order and judgment of the quarter sessions, but an interlocutory order.

There was also a motion to quash the writ of certiorari because:

First: The writ was not specially allowed as required by statute and rule of court.

Second: Defendant having been acquitted and discharged cannot be again put in jeopardy for the same offense.

The facts upon which the decision of the case depended sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. William R. Follmer and Andrew A. Leiser, for appellee:

The Act of 1889 by its title shows that the prohibition of the third section extends only to sidewalks erected in accordance with said act, and such prohibition cannot be extended to any other sidewalk.

The sidewalk being wholly within the limits of the turnpike road, this act could not apply in any event, nor authorize the construction of such a sidewalk.

Riding a bicycle is not riding a horse, etc., within the meaning of this statute.

Riding a bicycle upon a sidewalk is not "willfully and maliciously riding or driving any horse or any other animal upon or into" such sidewalk and within the prohibition of said Act of May 7th, 1889.

Penal statutes are to be construed strictly.

Burgh v. State, 108 Ind. 182; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Wilson, 108 Ind. 308.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A turnpike road, chartered as early as 1812, extends from the borough of Lewisburg to the borough of Mifflinburg, with an authorized width of roadway of 60 feet. Outside the 20 L. R. A.

borough of Lewisburg, and in the township of East Buffalo, is the village of Linnville, which is built up on both sides of and along the turnpike for the distance of about a mile. Although most of the houses are along the turnpike, the village is regularly laid out, and to some extent built upon streets and squares. For a mile on the north side of the turnpike a smooth foot walk, about four feet wide, is constructed for the use of the residents of the village. This walk is within the limits of the 60 feet which the turnpike company had appropriated for its highway, but the walk had been put there by permission of the company. It had been constructed and kept up by contributions from the residents of the village and by the turnpike company, and had been in existence about ten years on July 9, 1894. On that day, Forrest, the defendant, rode a bicycle on this walk, and on information made before a justice by George Kling, an owner of property fronting on it, was arrested for violation of the Sidewalk Act of May 7, 1889. After hearing, judgment was given against him, and a fine of six dollars for the use of the school district, as directed by the act, imposed. From this judgment, the defendant appealed to the court of quarter sessions, which, after a rehearing, reversed and set aside the judgment; and from that the commonwealth appeals.

The controlling reason assigned for setting aside the judgment of the magistrate by the learned judge of the court below is that, a bicycle not being a horse or "other animal," as specified in the Act of May 7, 1889, no penalty can be imposed for propelling it upon a sidewalk. The third section of the act is as follows: "If any person or persons shall willfully and maliciously ride or drive any horse or any other animal upon or into any boardwalk or sidewalk or footway laid, erected, or being on and along the side of any road or highway in any township of this commonwealth, or shall otherwise willfully break, injure or destroy the same, the person or persons so offending shall upon conviction thereof before any magistrate," etc., "be sentenced," etc. Standing by itself, we think this act, being penal in its provisions, would not have embraced the bicycle rider; but read in connection with the Act of April 23, 1889, an opposite conclusion is clearly warranted. The last-named act is as follows: "Bicycles, tricycles, and all vehicles propelled by hand or foot, and all persons by whom bicycles, tricycles, and such other vehicles are used, ridden, or propelled upon the public highways of this state, shall be entitled to the same rights and subject to the same restrictions in the use thereof, as are prescribed by law in the cases of persons using carriages drawn by horses." The first-named act imposed a penalty upon the driver of a horse who should willfully drive him upon any sidewalk in any township within the commonwealth. The last-named act subjected the bicycle rider to the same restriction as the driver of the horse. The driver of the carriage and the bicycle have the same rights, and are subject to the same restrictions and penalties. The one by whip and lines drives his horse, with vehicle, upon the sidewalk. The other drives his vehicle upon it with his feet and legs. It will scarcely be disputed that a bicyclist is within the spirit of the act. It is wholly improbable the legislature intended to exempt him. The sidewalk is for foot travelers, men, women, and children. A very few years of observation and experience in the new mode of traveling by bicycle has resulted in the conclusion that this vehicle is fully as dangerous to those walking on the same road as the carriage drawn by a horse. A carriage, with rider, weighing together two to three hundred pounds, propelled with the speed of a trolley car on a sidewalk, is full of peril to the life and limb of the foot traveler. No bicyclist, with due regard to the safety and rights of his fellows, should demand the use, in common with foot travelers, of a walk, with such a vehicle; and the intention of the legislature to debar him from such use is manifest, not only from the terms of the two acts, when read together, but also from the reason and spirit that prompted their passage.

To the argument here that the Act of the 7th of May only specifies the driving of a horse not hitched to a wagon or carriage, and that, although a bicycle may be a carriage or vehicle, yet by no liberality of construction can it be called a horse, we can only answer that such a construction of the act is absurd. The legislature declared that "if any person or persons shall willfully or maliciously ride or drive any horse or other animal." By this, they meant the two and only known methods of using the horse,—riding astride of him, or driving him in a vehicle. To suppose they intended to prohibit that which no one had done or would do—drive a horse by following at his heels on foot—would be altogether an unreasonable interpretation. Where one of two constructions would lead to absurdity, the absurd construction ought not to be adopted. Philadelphia v. Ridge Ave. Pass. R. Co. 102 Pa. 190.

We do not think it material that the informer in this case had not contributed to the original construction of the sidewalk. Nor, although he aided in keeping it in repair, do we think that fact material. It was a sidewalk by design, construction, and use, alongside a highway in a township, and he, with his family, had the right to its use, to the exclusion of a dangerous vehicle; and this even though he had in no way aided in constructing or keeping it in repair.

Nor does the fact that the walk was on land appropriated by the turnpike company deprive it of its character as a sidewalk. The company was asserting no right. If it had been constructed and used as a sidewalk by its consent, it had none to assert. That it was so constructed and used clearly appears by the testimony of the company's manager. And the consent of the company to its use by bicyclists would not avail defendant. A law of the commonwealth cannot be repealed by the manager of a turnpike company. If this was an established sidewalk alongside a highway in a township, as it clearly was, then it is subject to the laws of the commonwealth regulating and restricting its use. It is not in the power of any individual or corporation to license a violation of law.

The further argument of appellee that he and all other bicyclists have used the sidewalk heretofore without complaint avails nothing as a defense, for it only demonstrates the extent of the grievance, which at last became unbearable. Such use in any considerable numbers by such vehicles of a four-foot sidewalk would soon result in foot passengers, men, women, and children, taking to the turnpike for safety. This would not continue long, until the law would be invoked to decide whether the sidewalk was for foot travelers or for vehicles; whether the bicyclist was in the exercise of a lawful right, or was a usurper of the rights of others. We have tried to answer this question in this opinion.

Therefore the judgment of the court below is reversed, and it is directed that judgment for the amount of the fine imposed by the magistrate—six dollars—be entered in favor of the commonwealth, and against defendant, with costs; appellee to pay the costs of proceedings on this appeal.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN & HARTFORD R. CO.

v.

BRIDGEPORT TRACTION CO., App't.

(.....Conn.....)

1. An injunction against constructing a trolley road across a steam railroad track at grade the effect of which will be dangerous to passengers cannot be defeated on the ground that it will be simply an injunction against trespassers or involves simply a claim for damages.

2. A special act permitting a grade crossing by an electric railway over the track of a steam railroad which is made subject to general laws "except as otherwise herein expressly provided" is not affected by a general law previously passed but which does not take effect until subsequently, which prohibits such grade crossings "except upon approval by the railroad commissioners."

NOTE.—As to compensation to a railroad company for intersection of its track by a street railway on a highway crossing, see also Chicago & C. Terminal R. Co. v. Whiting, H. & B. C. Street R. Co. (Ind.) 26 L. R. A. 337, and Chicago, B. & Q. R.

Co. v. West Chicago Street R. Co. (Ill.) post, —, and note thereto.

That a horse railroad is not a railroad within the meaning of a statute as to intersections, see Byrne v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 24 L. R. A. 633.

3. No presumption that grade crossings expressly authorized by a special statute were intended to be subject to the general law requiring approval of the railroad commissioners can arise from the mere fact that they are numerous while the general policy of the law has been to restrict such crossings if the act does not increase the total number and indicates that they will be temporary because of the possible elevation of the track.

4. Compensation to a railroad company for the inconvenience to it is not a necessary condition to the crossing of its tracks at grade by an electric street railway under legislative authority.

(January 8, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Fairfield County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin defendants from constructing electric railway tracks across plaintiff's railroad at grade. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Meers, Seymour & Knapp and Paige & Carroll, for appellant:

Injunctions to restrain repeated trespasses are not favored exercises of the power of a court of equity, where the defendant is peculiarly responsible. Even to avoid multiplicity of actions, courts will not favor such proceedings.

Diminution in value of property without irreparable mischief furnishes no ground for equitable relief.

Halsey v. Rapid Transit Street R. Co. 47 N. J. Eq. 880.

The provision of defendant's charter, "except as otherwise herein expressly provided, this charter shall be subject in all its parts to the general laws relating to street railways and street railway companies," clearly removes the charter of the defendant company from the operation of the general law wherever any provision exists differing from or inconsistent with it.

The enactment of a general law by the legislature, after having conferred such power on the corporation, regulating the same matter which had been before permitted to be regulated by such by-law, would, in the absence of the clearest evidence to the contrary, show most satisfactorily that the legislature intended to take the regulation of the matter out of the hands of the corporation.

The particular danger of crossings of this character is referred to by the court in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Braddock Electric R. Co. 153 Pa. 116.

The legislature, in passing the General Act of 1898, intended to so restrict the exercise of the power granted by the defendant's charter as to require application to and approval by the railroad commissioners.

Baldwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's complaint is in the nature of a pure injunction bill. It avers that it sends about 200 hundred regular trains of cars daily, some of which carry the mails of the United States, and the rest passengers and freight, across Fairfield avenue, in the city of Bridgeport, at grade; that the defendant threatens to obstruct the plaintiff's right of way by forcibly laying tracks for an electric railway over said crossing and upon the plaintiff's tracks; and that, if such new tracks are so laid and used, it will seriously impair the plaintiff's power to fulfill its chartered purposes, disarrange its train service, put it to great additional expense in the operation of its road, and greatly endanger the lives of the passengers and employees on all trains crossing such avenue. The defendant's answer admits the character and extent of the plaintiff's business, as alleged, but sets up a grant by the last general assembly of express authority to construct the crossing in question, at grade. It appears by an agreed statement of facts (made subject to the opinion of the court as to their relevancy) that Fairfield avenue was a public highway long before the plaintiff's railroad was constructed, and that the proposed crossing by the defendant's railway "impairs the property of the plaintiff, interferes with the accustomed and necessary operation of its road, and endangers the lives of its passengers and employes. But the defendant does not intend to injure the property of the plaintiff, or interfere with the accustomed and necessary operation of its road, or endanger the lives of its passengers, and will not, except such as naturally follows from the location and operation of its trolley road across the tracks of the plaintiff at grade." These facts are relevant and material to the issue. They show that the proposed crossing, if constructed, will interfere with the necessary operation of the plaintiff's road, and endanger the lives of all whom it transports across Fairfield avenue in the 200 trains which daily pass there. It would be difficult to make out a stronger case for the interposition of a court of equity, if it has the power to interpose. Only by an injunction can the defendant be prevented from setting up across the tracks of a steam railroad, in constant use, an obstruction of a continuing character, which would daily put in peril hundreds or thousands of human lives.

It is argued that the plaintiff's claim is, in substance, simply one for an injunction against threatened trespasses or repeated obstructions of a right of way, and that it is not claimed that the defendant is not peculiarly responsible for any damage it may do, nor that the plaintiff will be exposed to irreparable injury. But the plaintiff holds its right of way charged with the performance of a public trust for its continuous use for public accommodation. Gates v. Boston & N. Y. Air Line R. Co. 53 Conn. 333, 341, 348. Its railroad is a great avenue of communication between one part of the state and another and between this and other states. Any impediment to its safe and proper use is a matter of public concern, not to be measured by money, or dealt with on the footing of a claim for damages. If erected without authority from the state, it may be that the state's attorney might properly sue for an injunction; but the same remedy would be open to the plaintiff, for it suffers a special injury, and is charged by the state with a special duty of maintaining its road at this crossing in uninterrupted use under safe conditions. Stamford v. Stamford Horse R. Co. 56 Conn. 381, 395, 1 L. R. A. 875; Frink v. Lawrence, 20 Conn. 120, 50 Am. Dec. 274. As the plaintiff has stated a case sufficient to support its action, we are brought to the consideration of the merits of the defense founded on a legislative grant. In June, 1898, the East End Railway Company owned and operated a horse railroad in Bridgeport and Stratford, under a charter granted many years before, which railroad crossed the tracks of the plaintiff's railroad at grade, upon a highway known as "Seaview Avenue. By an amendment to this charter, approved June 28, 1898, it was authorized to extend its lines in each town by laying tracks through certain designated streets, "and also from Stratford avenue on and along Pembroke street, across the tracks of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Company at grade, until said tracks are elevated, to Old Mill Green; subject to such regulations and restrictions as to said railroad crossing as the board of railroad commissioners may at any time order upon the application of either of said companies; and from the lower bridge westerly, over and under the tracks of said railroad to the junction of Fairfield avenue and Water street; provided, however, that when said railway company shall abandon its present crossing with its tracks at grade with the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Company at Seaview avenue, in the city of Bridgeport, it may cross the tracks of said steam railroad at grade as or near the junction of Fairfield avenue and Stratford avenue, at the southerly end of the railroad station of said steam railroad in the city of Bridgeport; subject, however, to such regulations and restrictions as the railroad commissioners may at any time order upon the application of either of said companies; and from the junction of Fairfield avenue and Water street southerly along Water street, westerly to Main street; . . . also from the northerly terminus of the line of said horse railway on East Main street across the tracks of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Company at grade, until said tracks are elevated, to the north side of East Washington avenue; subject, however, to such regulations and restrictions as the railroad commissioners may at any time order, upon the application of either of said companies." Special Acts 1893, pp. 878, 879. This amendment also empowered the company to equip and operate its road with electric power, and to consolidate and make common stock with any other street-railway company having lines in Bridgeport, or to transfer to it its property and franchises. A horse railroad had been in operation in Bridgeport for many years, owned by the Bridgeport Horse-Railroad Company. By an amendment to its charter, approved June 28, this company was authorized to consolidate with any other street-railway company, to equip its lines with electric power, and to extend them through various streets, among which were Congress street, "across the railroad tracks of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Company at grade, until said grade crossing is abolished by the steam railroad company; . . . subject to such regulations and restrictions in the matter of crossing the tracks of said steam railroad at grade as the railroad commissioners may at any time make upon the application of either of said companies;" and also North avenue, Broad street, Lafayette street, South avenue, and "Fairfield avenue in the western section of said city,"—each of which five streets was crossed by the plaintiff's steam railroad at grade, and in respect to each of which the company was empowered to construct a grade crossing over such steam railroad, in the same words used regarding the Congress street crossing, and subject to the same restrictions. On the same day the Bridgeport Railway Company was chartered, with power to construct and operate an electric railway through certain streets in Bridgeport; to cross the tracks of any steam railroad at grade, under such regulations and restrictions as the railroad commissioners should establish for the safety of the public; to acquire all the rights and franchises of the East End Railway Company and of the Bridgeport Horse-Railroad Company, and to become consolidated with them by the name of the Bridgeport Traction Company. The concluding section of this charter ran thus: "Except as otherwise herein expressly provided, this charter shall be subject in all its parts to the general laws relating to street railways and street railway companies." Special Acts 1893, p. 877, § 19. The amendment to the charter of the Bridgeport Horse-Railroad Company also contained substantially the same provision. The consolidation and transfer of franchises thus authorized was duly made prior to August 16, 1893.

By a public act, which took effect on June 1, 1893 (Pub. Acts 1893, p. 307), it was enacted that no street-railway company already existing or thereafter incorporated should lay new tracks in any city until its plan of construction and operation had been approved by the mayor and court of common council. Soon after the consolidation, the defendant, as owner of the rights and franchises of each of the three companies so consolidated, presented its plan of construction and operation (which involved the abandonment of the Seaview avenue grade crossing, and the laying of a double track on Fairfield avenue, to cross the plaintiff's railroad at grade by means of electric power supplied to a trolley from overhead wires), to the mayor and court of common council of Bridgeport, and it was duly approved. On June 14, 1893, a public act was passed (Pub. Acts 1893, chap. 208, p. 361) amending chapter 168 of the Public Acts of 1893, so as to read as follows: "No electric, cable, or horse railroad shall hereafter be constructed across the tracks of a steam railroad at grade, except upon application to and approval by the railroad commissioners, nor shall any steam railroad cross any such electric, cable, or horse railroad at grade, except upon like application and approval." By another act, approved June 30, it was enacted that all the public acts of the session, unless otherwise provided, should take effect thirty days from the rising of the general assembly. The assembly rose on June 30. On August 16, the defendant, after having abandoned the grade crossing at Seaview avenue, applied to the railroad commissioners for permission to construct the tracks of its "horse railroad" at grade across the plaintiff's railroad on Fairfield avenue, under such regulations and restrictions as the commissioners might approve. The application was afterwards amended by adding a request that they would establish, pursuant to the charter of the Bridgeport Railway Company, such regulations relative to such crossing of the two railroads at grade as they should see fit for the safety and protection of the public. The commissioners decided that the general assembly had given the defendant the right to cross, and that they had no jurisdiction to approve or disapprove the proposed crossing; but proceeded to establish certain regulations as to the manner of its construction and operation. The main contention of the plaintiff is that the Public Act of June 14, which took effect July 30, repealed or modified those parts of the special grants made on June 28 (when the private acts took effect under the provisions of the general statutes), under which the defendant claims an absolute right to construct the crossing in question.

The doctrine that a later statute repeals by implication all provisions of former ones which are inconsistent with it rests on the ground that the last expression of the legislative will ought to control. It assumes that there have been successive and different expressions of such will in relation to the same subject; and the latest of these governs, precisely as the last word of a master governs his servants, however much it may vary from his previous directions. Such is presumed to be his intention; and the intent of a statute is determined by the same rule and the same reason. The general assembly, on June 14th, provided that no street railway should thereafter be constructed across a steam railroad at grade, except upon application to and approval by the railroad commissioners. By the general laws then existing (Pub. Acts 1889, chap. 29) this act would have taken effect on the 1st day of July following the rising of the assembly; but on June 30, the time when it went into operation was postponed to July 30. The Act of June 14 was designed either to change the general laws as to the crossing of steam railroads by street railways, or to make clear their meaning. In either case it was intended to remove impediments to the construction of such crossings. It declared it to be the general policy of the state that such crossings might be made with the approval of the railroad commissioners, and not otherwise. On June 28, the assembly granted permission for the construction of certain crossings of this kind in a particular city. These grants must have been based on petitions which sought permission to construct street railways on the streets in question, and were brought on due notice to the public and all parties adversely interested. Gen. Stat. §§ 388, 392, 393. The attention of the legislature was specially directed to the railroad problem in Bridgeport, and it decided to give the defendant and its predecessors in title power, after abandoning the Seaview avenue crossing, to lay tracks across those of the plaintiff on Fairfield avenue at grade, upon such plan of construction and operation as the city authorities should approve, subject only to such regulations and restrictions as the railroad commissioners might order on the application of either company.

There can be no question that the defendant could have proceeded to make this grade crossing after the fulfillment of the three preliminaries above mentioned, at any time between June 28, and July 30, notwithstanding the passage of the Public Act of June 14. Powers v. Shepard, 48 N. Y. 540, 545. To say that that act, on July 30, imposed the new restriction which is claimed upon the exercise of the defendant's franchises, is virtually to make it nullify the special grants obtained after its enactment, so far as they relate to grade crossings of steam railroads. On July 30, the defendant, had its charter contained no provision on the subject, other than the permission to extend its lines through Fairfield avenue, could have constructed the crossing in question, under the general law, upon obtaining the approval of a crossing at that place by the railroad commissioners, and of the method of constructing and operating it by the mayor and court of common council. By the general law (Pub. Acts 1898, p. 808, § 8), the city authorities have "exclusive direction over the placing or locating of any tracks, wires, conductors, fixtures," or structures by any electric railway company in the highways of the city, "including the power of designating the material, quality, and finish thereof," and "may make all orders necessary to the exercise of such power of direction and control." If, then, all these general laws affect the defendant, and it is also bound by the provisions of its charter, its construction of the crossing in question must, in any case, be subject to the regulations of the city and also of the railroad commissioners, as to methods of construction and operation. But other companies, laying tracks without any special privileges as to the mode of construction across a steam railroad at grade, would have nothing to do with the railroad commissioners, except to get their approval of the crossing; the regulation of the mode of constructing and using it being left to be determined by the municipal authorities exclusively. Unless, then, the defendant is exempted by its charter from recourse to the railroad commissioners for the approval of this crossing, it is in a worse condition than if its charter had been silent on the subject; for as to modes of construction it is subject to two masters, instead of one. "A special and local statute, providing for a particular case or class of cases, is not partially repealed or amended, as to some of its provisions, by a statute general in its terms, provisions, and application, unless the intention of the legislature to repeal or alter the particular law is manifest; although the terms of the general act would, taken strictly, and but for the special law, include the case or cases provided for by it." Re Central Park Comrs. 50 N. Y. 498, 497. Where a special charter is followed by general legislation on the same subject, which does not in terms or by necessary construction repeal the particular grant, "the two are to be deemed to stand together; one as the general law of the land, the other as the law of the particular case." State v. Stoll, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 425, 436, 21 L. ed. 654, 655. The defendant's charter expressly contemplates and regulates the effect of general legislation inconsistent with its provisions by the declaration with which it concludes, that it is to be subject to the general laws relating to street railways, "except as otherwise herein expressly provided." The "general laws intended" must have been both those then in force and those which might come into force thereafter. The Act of June 14 was one of the latter class. It required electric railway companies generally to obtain the approval of the railroad commissioners before constructing a grade crossing upon a steam railroad. But, as respects the grade crossing at Fairfield avenue, the charter of 29 L. R. A.

the defendant had expressly provided otherwise, for it had given explicit and full permission for the construction of this crossing whenever that at Seaview avenue should be abandoned. The general police power of the state resides in the general assembly. It can forbid grade crossings of highways by railroads, or of one railroad by another, at any particular place. Woodruff v. Oatlin, 64 Conn. 277, 295. It can, by the same authority, permit them at any particular place, conditionally or unconditionally. By an amendment to the charter of the State Street Horse-Railroad Company, approved June 23, that company was authorized (Special Acts 1898, p. 846) to equip its lines with electric power, and to extend them through certain streets in Fair Haven, "or said company at its option may lay its tracks and operate its cars across the tracks of the Shore Line Railroad on Ferry street until said tracks of the Shore Line Railroad are removed; provided, that during said time this company place a watchman at said railroad crossing at its own expense;" and it was declared that the act should be subject in all its parts to the general laws relating to street railways, "except as otherwise expressly provided herein." In this instance also, therefore, the legislature, in regard to a designated crossing, exercised its own judgment as to the expediency of allowing its construction at grade, and the mode of regulating its use, when constructed, so as to secure public safety; thus expressly providing for a course of proceeding, as to a particular locality, differing from that prescribed by the general laws.

The plaintiff contends that the number of grade crossings of steam railroads apparently authorized by the various charters and amendments of charters to which reference has been made is so great as to raise a necessary presumption that the general assembly must have intended them to be subject to the approval of the railroad commissioners, under the general law previously enacted and subsequently taking effect. It is true that grade crossings of highways by steam railroads have repeatedly been pronounced by this court to be dangerous to human life, and that the general policy of the legislature for a considerable period of years has been to secure their abolition as speedily as it can reasonably be effected. Dyson v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 57 Conn. 21; New York & N. E. R. Co.'s App. from Railroad Comrs. 63 Conn. 527, 540; New York & N. E. R. Co. v. Bristol, 151 U. S. 559, 38 L. ed. 269. But the special legislation now under consideration does not increase the number of such crossings. It increases, no doubt, the danger of their use; but if, notwithstanding this, the general assembly has seen fit to make the grants relied on, they must be construed, like every other statute, according to the intention which they express, rather than that which might perhaps have been anticipated in view of the course of previous legislation. The frequent references, indeed, to the temporary character of most of the proposed crossings, as that they are to continue until the steam-railroad tracks are removed or elevated, may be some indication that the legislature thought the very construction of the electric railway tracks across those of the steam railroad might be an incentive to the speedier removal of the latter from the surface of the highway.

The plaintiff urges that the state cannot bargain away its police power, and that any permission, however explicit and unqualified, to construct a dangerous crossing, may be modified or repealed as soon as it is given. This is undoubtedly true. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Braddock Electric R. Co. 153 Pa. 116. But the question before us is not whether there was a right of repeal, but whether such a right was exercised. We think that there is no sufficient ground for the contention that it was the intent of the legislature by the Public Act of June 14, to repeal the special and local grants not yet made, under which the defendant claims, and which were afterwards inserted in the Private Acts of June 28. The case falls within the rule, "Generalia specialibus non derogant."

It is further insisted that these special grants, if otherwise effectual, give the defendant no right to construct the crossing without first making compensation for the direct damage it will do to the plaintiff's property. The injunction was asked to prevent a threatened obstruction of the plaintiff's "right of way." It is not alleged or found that it owns the fee of the highway. It has only a right to cross it at grade. The defendant's tracks are laid upon the highway by the authority of the state, and as a mode of rendering it more serviceable as a highway for public travel. We are not called upon to consider whether electric car tracks impose any additional burden upon land occupied for a highway, for which the owner of such land can claim compensation. The plaintiff is not in a position to raise that question. It claims that the proposed crossing at Fairfield avenue will affect the safe and beneficial use of its right of way at that point, and thereby impair the general value of its franchises and property. But it holds these subject to the police power of the state, under which the use of highways for all purposes of public travel is fully within the control of the legislature. Elliott v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co. 83 Conn. 579, 582. The same authority which can make it lawful for electric railways to cross at grade any and every highway intersecting the street upon which their tracks are laid, can make it lawful for them to cross at grade any and every steam railroad intersecting that street. To raise or depress the street or the structure bearing the electric track, so as to carry it above or beneath the steam railroad, might, in a particular case, cause more inconvenience or even danger to the traveling public than it would avoid. The failure of a brake upon an electric car to act would naturally cause more peril to the passengers, and to those traveling on the street, if the car were, at the time, on an up or down grade. The difficulty of hauling heavy loads increases with every considerable ascent or descent in the highway. To divert the electric tracks from the street in order to effect a crossing of a steam railroad elsewhere necessarily leaves part of such street unsupplied with the facilities for quick communication which it might otherwise enjoy. To stop the electric cars on each side of the steam railroad for the transfer of their passengers on foot from one car to another involves them in personal inconvenience and delay, and without absolutely freeing them from the danger of being struck by a passing train. The approval given in behalf of the state to the location of the plaintiff's railroad across Fairfield avenue made it lawful to construct and use the crossing at grade; but it conferred no greater power to control the use of the highway by others than any individual traveler possesses. The company could not use the highway without legislative authority, but its rights of passage are not superior in kind to those of the individual, who needs no such authority, or to those of any other corporation which the state may authorize to use it for purposes of travel. The legislature has deemed it proper to allow the construction of electric railways in certain streets of the city of Bridgeport. It was bound to regard the safety and convenience of those who were to ride upon them, as well as the safety and convenience of those who were to ride over the steam railroads already laid upon those streets. In full view of the danger attending a grade crossing of the plaintiff's by the defendant's road on Fairfield avenue, it has deemed it for the public interest to permit its construction; and it was no more bound to provide for compensation to the plaintiff for the injury it may suffer than to provide for it in favor of any individual who may have occasion to cross the defendant's tracks at the hazard of a possible collision with its cars. Bridgeport v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 86 Conn. 255, 267, 268, 4 Am. Rep. 63; Massachusetts Cent. R. Co. v. Boston, O. & F. R. Co. 121 Mass. 124; Metropolitan R. Co. v. Highland Street R. Co. 118 Mass. 290; New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Waterbury, 60 Conn. 1.

The plaintiff took the risk of suffering such an inconvenience or peril when it elected to build its road over Fairfield avenue at grade. Such a crossing, in the center of a busy city, was a source of danger before the defendant's charter was granted. Had it been constructed above grade, no use of the street by the defendant could have impaired the value or safety of the plaintiff's road. The defendant's charter does not create a danger so much as increase a danger; and as it is one incident to the lawful use of the highway, the plaintiff suffers nothing which it should not have contemplated as possible when it made its original location, and nothing to which such a location did not necessarily make it subject. The impairment of its property, the interference with the accustomed and necessary operation of its road, and the danger to the lives of those whom it transports, present simply a case of damnum absque injuria.

It was claimed by the defendant that the grant to the East End Railway Company of permission to construct its crossing at grade when it should abandon the grade crossing then existing at Seaview avenue, the acceptance of this charter amendment, and the abandonment of that crossing, show an executed contract between the state and the defendant, as the successor to the original company, the obligation of which could not be impaired by subsequent legislation. It is unnecessary to inquire whether such a claim would be tenable, since it does not appear that the Seaview avenue crossing was abandoned before the Act of June 14 came into effect.

There is error, and the judgment of the superior court is reversed.

Torrance and Fenn, JJ., concurred.

Hamersley, J., dissenting:

It has become the settled policy of this state that the intersection of a railroad and highway at grade is a dangerous public nuisance that should be abated as rapidly as possible. Dyson v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 57 Conn. 21; New York & N. E. R. Co's App. from Railroad Comrs. 62 Conn. 540. If this is true of a railroad crossing a highway, how much more true is it of one railroad crossing another. The latter crossings were not sufficiently numerous to call for general legislation until 1882, when it was enacted that "no railroad shall cross any other railroad at grade without the consent and approval of the railroad commissioners." Pub. Acts 1882, p. 215. And in the following year it was enacted that such consent and approval should not be given unless the commissioners should find the avoidance of grade crossing to be impracticable. These laws are now in force. Until about 1889, horse-railroads were the only street railroads, and were mainly used in highways that did not cross railroads at grade, and were treated as a part of the highway, requiring no special legislation as to crossings; but when the electric railroad became an accomplished fact, and threatened to occupy highways, it became evident that the intersection at grade of an electric and steam railroad might be as dangerous as such intersection by two steam railroads, or even more dangerous. And so, in 1889, the legislature treated electric railroads (including also cable and horse railroads), in respect to grade crossings, substantially as steam railroads had been treated, and provided that there should be no intersection of such railroads without application to and approval by the railroad commissioners; and this law was re-enacted in 1893. It is thus apparent that the intersection at grade of the tracks of a steam railroad and an electric railroad is by law a nuisance highly dangerous to human life; and that any legislative permission to maintain such a nuisance must be exceptional and contrary to the general policy of the state as expressed by the legislative and judicial departments.

The defendant claims that its charter, granted at the session of 1893, gives it express permission to establish this nuisance, and to cross the tracks of the plaintiff at grade, without application to and approval by the railroad commissioners. Its charter does say that the defendant may cross the plaintiff's tracks at grade, but it does not in express terms authorize the defendant to construct such crossing without application to and approval by the railroad commissioners; and the question at issue is, Does the right given to cross at grade imply a permission to exercise such right in violation of the general law which declares that no such right shall be exercised without application to and approval by the railroad commissioners. In passing on the question it should be remembered that "charters of corporations which confer exclusive privileges for the particular advantage of the grantees are to be construed liberally for the benefit of the public, and strictly as against the corporation." Burritt v. New Haven, 42 Conn. 202. And this principle should be applied with the most strictness where an exception from the public law is claimed that is inconsistent with the settled policy of the state, and may prove a constant menace to the lives of thousands of its citizens. The Act of 1893 forbidding the construction of any intersecting tracks at grade, except on application to the railroad commissioners, went into effect after the rising of the general assembly of that year, and operated as the last expression of the legislative will on all antecedent laws relative to the same subject, and therefore upon the charter of the defendant. I do not deem it material whether this act did or did not alter the legal effect of the prior Act of 1889,—the question may be doubtful,—but in either case, in the view I take of the legislation of the session, the act was, and was intended to be, the last expression of the legislative will on that subject. The defendant, however, claims that it does not modify the exercise of any right granted by its charter, because such modification would be a repeal of its charter by implication, and such repeals are not favored by law. As to the soundness of this principle there can be no question, but it does not apply to this case. The principle is accurately stated in Goodman v. Jewett, 24 Conn. 589: "It [the later law] does not in terms repeal the Law of 1853, or any part of it; nor does it impliedly repeal the fifth section of it by force of the principle that later statutes abrogate prior contrary statutes. That maxim applies only when the later statute is couched in negative terms, or when its provisions are so clearly repugnant to the former act that it necessarily implies a negative. 1 Bl. Com. 89. If both statutes can be reconciled, they must stand, and have a concurrent operation." See also Norwich v. Story, 25 Conn. 47; Kallahau v. Osborne, 37 Conn. 490. In this case the later statute is couched in negative terms. "No electric railroad shall hereafter be constructed across the tracks of a steam railroad at grade." The two statutes cannot be reconciled. The repugnancy is direct, and does not depend upon any implied inconsistency. The maxim that a later statute abrogates a prior contrary statute applies, and the principle invoked by the defendant has no application.

Again, the defendant claims that a special and local statute, providing for a particular case, is not repealed by a statute general in its terms, provisions, and application, unless the intention to repeal the particular law is manifest, although the terms of the general act, taken strictly, and without reference to the special act, would include the case provided for by that act; and further claims that where a special charter is followed by general legislation on the same subject, which does not in terms or by necessary construction repeal the particular grant, the two are to be deemed to stand together,—one as the general law of the land, and the other as the law of the particular case. The principle here advanced, as a general rule of construction, is unquestionable. The difficulty lies in its application to the defendant's case. The special act says: "The defendant may cross the tracks of the plaintiff's steam railroad at grade at the junction of Fairfield and Stratford avenues." The general act says: "No electric railroad shall hereafter be constructed across the tracks of a steam railroad at grade, except upon application to and approval by the railroad commissioners." Can it fairly be said that the intention of the legislature to affect the particular law is not manifest? Can it fairly be said that this general legislation, following the special charters of the defendant and others neither in terms nor by necessary construction affects the particular grants, especially when it is remembered that every special charter is granted and accepted subject to such police regulations as to the exercise of granted powers as the legislature may establish? This general statute forbidding the construction of a grade crossing without application to the railroad commissioners cannot operate except where a particular statute has given the right to cross at grade; certainly not until a new legislature has enacted new particular laws granting new particular rights to cross at grade. It is aimed at nothing unless it is aimed at the particular rights claimed by the defendant and others under special charters. In this sense the law is not of general application. Its first range of operation is wholly confined to the particular cases specified in existing special charters. The rule of construction, that a particular grant, which may stand together with the provisions of a statute of general application, is not repealed by the enactment of such statute, unless the intention of the legislature to repeal the particular grant is manifest, cannot apply when the operation of the general statute is confined to such particular grants, and the maintenance of the grants unaffected by the statute must render the statute wholly inoperative. In such case, and in this case, the two statutes cannot stand together. They are wholly repugnant, unless these special charters are construed as granting the right to cross at grade subject to the police regulations of the state.

The defendant also seems to claim that the circumstances attending the passage of these laws, as shown by the record, and those facts of which the court has judicial knowledge, indicate an actual intent on the part of the legislature to permit the grade crossing in question without any application to the railroad commissioners, and without their approval, based upon a searching investigation as to the relation of the loss of human life to railroad profits and increased facilities for travel involved in the establishment of this crossing. It seems to me that a consideration of these circumstances fairly indicates an opposite actual intention. When the Legislature of 1893 met, it found a large number of applications for special charters for building electric railroads awaiting its action. Thirty-five or more such charters were finally granted, authorizing electric railroads in every portion of the state. Many of these charters contained, in terms more or less particular, the right to cross steam-railroad tracks at grade. All of them required special legislation as to the exercise of the franchises asked. The incorporation by the legislature into each one of these charters of the particular regulations demanded by public interest seemed impracticable, and they were provided for by public laws. One, relating to the detail of location and operation and to special regulations to be complied with before the work of construction should begin, was passed June 1, and given immediate effect; one, amending the Act of 1839 (which, as was claimed forbade all grade crossings) so that the various particular grants to cross steam railroads at grade could not be exercised without the approval of the railroad commissioners, was passed June 14, to take effect after the rising of the general assembly. Until June 14, none of these thirty-five special charters, applications for which had been pending since January, were passed. Between that date and the adjournment on June 30 they were all passed. It seems very clear that the legislature in fact understood that the passing of these charters with the right to cross steam railroads at grade might repeal the existing law, if that absolutely forbade such crossing; and so did not pass them until it had passed a general act, which, by taking effect after the rising of the general assembly, would thereby prevent the exercise of the various particular rights that might be granted without the approval of the railroad commissioners; and intended, in passing the defendant's charter, to couple the right to cross at grade at a point notoriously dangerous with the additional burden of being subject at all times to such regulations as the railroad commissioners, on application, might make, but did not intend that such crossing should be constructed unless its construction should be approved by the commissioners. But the actual intent of a legislature, as distinguished from the legal effect of its laws, is a thing impossible to ascertain, and has no existence for the purpose of judicial construction. During the session of a legislature its actual intent can operate at its will on legislation; but at the moment of adjournment its actual intent, as distinguished from its acts, ceases to exist. It is expressed only by the legal effect of its laws, and what that legal effect is becomes a judicial, and not a legislative, question. When obscure language has been used, when laws apparently conflicting have been passed, it is for the court to say what has legally been done. We speak of being guided by the intent of the legislature in reaching such judicial judgment, but such phrase is really a figure of speech. The court can see and give effect, if possible, to the patent purpose of the law, but it cannot, in fact, be guided by any supposititious legislative intent, actual or artificial. It can only ascertain, as accurately as possible, the most reasonable effect that can be given to uncertain legislation, in view of all the language used, and in accordance with those general principles of construction which experience has established as safe guides in reaching a just conclusion. Not infrequently the result reached is of necessity directly contrary to what we have every reason to suspect might prove to be the actual intent of the legislature, if such intent were susceptible of ascertainment. These general principles oftentimes conflict with each other when applied to a particular case, and the court is then obliged to weigh their relative importance, not always absolutely, but as applied to the case in hand. The question of construction now presented is in some respects a very peculiar one, and well-established rules of construction, if followed without reference to each other, might point to different results. But it seems to me that, giving due weight to all the considerations the court should entertain, the only reasonable effect that can be given to this conflicting legislation is that the special charters give particular rights to cross steam-railroad tracks at grade, and that the general act prohibits the exercise of such particular rights without the approval of the railroad commissioners. But, if this result were doubtful, if the true legal effect of this legislation were open to grave doubt,—and the able and plausible arguments which have been made on both sides of the question, as well as the fact that the court is divided in opinion, suggest strong reasons for holding that such a doubt really exists,—then it seems to me entirely clear that such doubt must be solved by the application of the well-established rule that, in case of serious doubt, the court ought not to give a construction which will make the law inconsistent, instead of consistent, with the settled policy of the state; especially when such construction will authorize, without the investigation heretofore required in such cases, the establishment of a public nuisance admittedly dangerous to human life, and apparently uncalled for by any adequate public necessity.

Concurring with the majority of the court in the views expressed on the other questions involved, I think there is no error in the judgment of the superior court.

(.....Me.....)

1. A city which has undertaken to furnish its inhabitants with water cannot, after accepting the rates and furnishing water to a consumer for a period beyond that for which a disputed unpaid claim against him exists, shut off the supply for the purpose of coercing payment of such claim.
2. A consumer may enjoin a city which has undertaken to furnish water to its inhabitants from shutting off his supply for the purpose of coercing payment of an old claim against him after it has accepted the rates and furnished water for subsequent periods.
3. The question of the validity of an old claim against a water consumer will not be investigated in an injunction proceeding by him against the city to prevent its shutting off his supply after it has accepted the rates and furnished water for periods subsequent to that covered by the disputed claim.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Androscoggin County for the opinion of the full court in a suit brought to enjoin defendants from shutting off the supply of water from several of complainant's tenement houses.
Judgment for complainant.

NOTE.—As to the right to shut off supply of water to compel payment of arrears in water rents, see also note to Rushville v. Rushville Natural Gas Co. (Ind.) 15 L. R. A. 381.

See also 30 L. R. A. 447; 32 L. R. A. 697; 33 L. R. A. 59; 37 L. R. A. 675; 40 L. R. A. 171.

Messrs. Savage & Oakes, for complainant:

The city assumed the right to shut off a citizen's water after offer of payment and tender, not for the purpose of enforcing payment of the current water rates, but to collect an old bill, a bill, too, which was not contracted with the city itself, but with its predecessor in title, and to which it has no claim except by assignment; a bill, also, to which the complainant claims to have a fair offset.

Stock v. Boston, 149 Mass. 410.

It was beyond the power of the city to make or attempt to enforce such a regulation.

Merrimac River Sav. Bank v. Lowell, 10 L. R. A. 122, 152 Mass. 556; Lumbard v. Stearns, 4 Cush. 60.

Mr. James A. Pulsifer, for respondent:

Even if there were any justice in this claim for set-off there would be no statute or rule of law to support this unliquidated claim for damages as a set-off against these water bills.

Hall v. Glidden, 39 Me. 445; Smith v. Ellis, 29 Me. 422.

It is only when the plaintiff has exercised due precaution to prevent an injury that he can be relieved by an injunction.

Russ v. Wilson, 22 Me. 207.

The complainant in this case could have prevented all injury and trouble by paying his water bills; nor do we see any legal impediment in the way of his having his rights in his claim for damages fully determined in an action at law.

Merrimac River Sav. Bank v. Lowell, 10 L. R. A. 122, 152 Mass. 556.

Emery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mr. Wood, the complainant, has been for some time the owner of dwelling houses in Auburn connected with the system of waterworks formerly owned by the Auburn Aqueduct Company, but now owned by the city of Auburn. For some time prior to November 1, 1892, the aqueduct company had supplied water to these houses, and had been paid the regular rates therefor six months in advance, on May and November 1st of each year, agreeably to the regulations of the company. When November 1, 1892, came round, Mr. Wood did not pay or tender the water rates for the ensuing six months as usual. He claimed that water was not being sufficiently supplied, and that in other respects the company was not fulfilling its duty to him. The company did not shut off the water, but allowed it to run into the complainant's houses during the whole period of that six months ending May 1, 1893.

In May, 1893, the aqueduct company transferred this system of waterworks, and all its bills against the water takers, to the city of Auburn. Immediately after the transfer, and in the same May, the complainant, Wood, tendered to the proper officer the regular water rates for the then ensuing six months, to end November 1, 1893. The city accepted the money, and supplied the water for that six months as usual. In November, 1893, Mr. Wood tendered, as before, the water rates for the then next ensuing six months. This time the city refused to receive the money, and notified Mr. Wood that the water would be shut off from his property unless he also paid the water bills of the old company for the six months between November 1, 1892, and May 1, 1893, which had not been paid, and which had been assigned to the city, as above stated. Mr. Wood remonstrated, claiming that nothing was due from him on old bills; but the city insisted, and thereupon he filed this bill to restrain the city from shutting off the water from him.

The complainant concedes that the rules of the old aqueduct company and of the present city water board are reasonable, so far as they require him to pay six months in advance. He contends, however, that when the city has taken his money for one six months, paid according to its rules, it has waived any right to use the summary remedy of shutting off water to collect a disputed bill for any prior six months; that the city has thereby elected to continue him as a water taker, and resort to the usual legal remedies for settling the prior dispute; that any rule of the water board of Auburn which assumes the power to receive the water taker's money from six months to six months, and then, at any time, deprive him of water because of an old and disputed bill, is unreasonable, and therefore void.

We think this contention must be sustained.

Water companies and municipalities undertaking to supply water to the people have an undeniable right, when not affected by legislation, to impose such reasonable rules as will husband the supply and economize the use of the water, as will protect the plant and keep up its efficiency, and as will insure a reasonable revenue and its prompt receipt. On the other hand, such companies and municipalities are bound to supply water at reasonable rates to every person within the range of the system of works. Their rules must be reasonable, and not oppressive or vexatious. The citizen should not be subject to any whims of the officials. He should have a secure right to the water so long as he promptly pays the current installments, and makes no waste or misuse of the water. So far as appears, Mr. Wood has fully complied with these conditions.

The only trouble is over an old and disputed bill. The aqueduct company could have insisted on payment of this bill in advance, but did not. It could have shut off the water during the time covered by the bill, but did not. It preferred to let the bill and the dispute stand. Its successors, the city, with presumed knowledge of all the facts, did not shut off the water. It accepted Mr. Wood's money for the next installment; furnished water for that six months to him, as one within his rights and its rules; allowed him to suppose that the old bill in dispute would be ignored, or would be adjusted as are disputes between other parties. After having resumed these relations with Mr. Wood, and taken his money therefor, the city now insists that he shall now be summarily deprived of an instant and constant necessity, in order to coerce him into a surrender of his position of defense against the old bill. Assuming that the rules of the old company and of the city contemplate this course, we think they are to that extent unreasonable, and therefore without legal force.

The parties are not upon equal ground. The city, as a water company, cannot do as it will with its water. It owes a duty to each consumer. The consumer, once taken on to the system, becomes dependent on that system for a prime necessity of business, comfort, health, and even life. He must have the pure water daily and hourly. To suddenly deprive him of this water, in order to force him to pay an old bill claimed to be unjust, puts him at an enormous disadvantage. He cannot wait for the water. He must surrender, and swallow his choking sense of injustice. Such a power in a water company or municipality places the consumer at its mercy. It can always claim that some old bill is unpaid. The receipt may have been lost, the collector may have embezzled the money; yet the consumer must pay it again, and perhaps still again. He cannot resist, lest he lose the water.

It is said, however, that the consumer can apply to the courts to recover back any sum he is thus compelled to pay, if it was not justly due from him, or, if he can show affirmatively that it is not a just claim against him, he can, by judicial process, restrain the company or municipality from shutting off the water. To oblige a person to follow such a course would be a violation of the fundamental juristic principle of procedure. That principle is that the claimant, not the defendant, shall resort to judicial process; that he who asserts something to be due him, not he who denies a debt, shall have the burden of judicial action and proof. It is only in the case of dues to the state that this principle is suspended.

It is said, again, that, Mr. Wood having resorted to this judicial proceeding, the city may now, in this same proceeding, show that there is no defense to the old bill, and thus justify its action, and have the prayer of Mr. Wood denied. The court cannot be required in this proceeding to investigate and determine whether there is anything due on that old water bill. The city, or its predecessor, at one time had the right to insist on its payment before furnishing water. That right, as to that bill, was waived fully and effectually. It cannot be resumed at the pleasure of the respondent. The water must be supplied to the complainant so long as he will promptly pay current installments, and otherwise conform to the reasonable rules governing the supply of water. The respondent must now, in its turn, resort to judicial process, if it desires to enforce any further payment.

Bill sustained, with costs. Injunction made permanent.

board of regents of the University of Kansas from the exercise of corporate powers in excess of those conferred on it by law. The board of regents is such a corporation as is subject to the control of this court in such an action.

2. Admission into the university is made free by statute, and the board of regents has no power to collect a fee of $3, or any other fee, for the use of the library, or to exclude students from the use of the library for the non-payment of such fee.

I. In general.

There is an important class of corporations represented by that considered in the above case as to which text-books and treatises are almost entirely silent. It is that of incorporated institutions belonging to and controlled by the state. The attempt is here made for the first time, so far as it appears, to collate all the decisions of the courts respecting the nature of this class of corporations. This is at much risk of failing to find some cases pertaining to the subject because of the wide and vague range of subjects under which the cases may have been placed in digests or other law books. The most frequent example of this class of corporations now existing is probably that of a state university which can be found in a large number of states, in some of which it is created or recognized by the constitution itself.

There is a clear distinction between this class of corporations and private corporations in the fact that the only property interests involved in the former belong to the state. Between this class of public corporations and municipal corporations the distinction is not so easy to state. But municipal corporations are generally understood to include only that class of public corporations, each of which represents in some respects and for some purposes a particular local portion of the public. That is to say, it is a local subdivision of the state. It also exercises a certain governmental function with respect to that portion of the public within its territory. On the other hand the class of public corporations here considered may be described with some approach to clearness as incorporated state agencies or institutions created to carry on certain special kinds of work for the benefit of the state or for the public interest, but not constituting any local or territorial division of the public for any governmental purposes.

This class of corporations is also distinguishable, but with some difficulty, from the large class of official boards, many of which possess powers very similar to those of a corporation, some of which might perhaps for some purposes be treated as corporations. Thus the power to hold property in trust for the state has been given in such a case to the board in charge of an asylum without expressly declaring the board to be a corporation. So boards of education not expressly declared to be corporations often have powers quite similar to those of corporations, and in this respect seem to belong to that class of quasi corporations which include the townships in many states. But in this note the intention is to present the law of incorporated institutions or agencies of the state as described above, keeping as clear a distinction as may be between them and municipal corporations as well as all classes of quasi corporations which represent either the whole or a part of the public.

a. Banks.

The relation to the state of a state bank not only created but owned by the state has been a subject on which the decisions are not entirely in harmony. But by the great weight of authority these institutions are held to be for most purposes equivalent to private corporations. In some early Illinois cases the contrary was held.

Thus in State Bank of Illinois v. Brown, 2 Ill. 108, an action by a state bank on a note was held to be exempt from the statute of limitations on the ground that the state was the real party.

So in Ernst v. State Bank of Illinois, 1 Ill. 81, Appendix, a release by the state of all debts due to the state was held to include the release of a note students from the library for the nonpayment thereof, is an unwarranted assumption of corporate powers, from the exercise of which they will be ousted by this court in a suit brought in the name of the state by the attorney-general.

APPPLICATION for a writ of quo warranto in reference to the imposition of fees for the use of the University library which was alleged to be in excess of their jurisdiction. Application granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John T. Little, Atty-Gen., and Morton & Clark, for plaintiff:

The object of this action is similar to that in State v. Topeka, 31 Kan. 454, viz.: to oust the board from the exercise of a power which is plainly forbidden by law.

The acts of the legislature are constitutional and effective to confer corporate powers.

Dill. Mun. Corp. § 22; Beach v. Leahy, 11 Kan. 28; Knowles v. Board of Education of Topeka, 33 Kan. 692.

The form of the action is proper.

Civil Code, § 653, cl. 4; Gen. Stat. 1889, p. 1578; State v. Topeka, supra.

Messrs. D. M. Valentine and J. W. Green, for defendants:

The supreme court has original jurisdiction in quo warranto only as it obtains the same from the State Constitution, art. 3, § 3.

This jurisdiction is of course only such as was understood and settled to be quo warranto jurisdiction prior to or at the time when the constitution was adopted.

State v. Wilson, 30 Kan. 661; State v. Allen, 5 Kan. 218.

Quo warranto cannot be maintained against any body of men simply because they are a body of men.

High. Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 618, 636.

Quo warranto has nothing to do with anything except with the illegal existence or illegal acts of regular corporations or assumed regular corporations or with the illegal holding or attempted illegal holding of an office.

The language used in the statute is similar to the language used in other statutes having reference to counties (Gen. Stat. 1889, par. 1611), townships (Id., par. 7061), and school districts (Id. par. 5577), yet the decisions of this court are uniform that counties, townships, and school districts are not corporations within the meaning of the constitution.

Rep. 198; State v. Sanders, 42 Kan. 228; Freeland v. Stillman, 49 Kan. 197; State v. Lewelling, 51 Kan. 562; Cleaver v.

and mortgage to the state bank. But it is shown that the act establishing the bank provides that notes and mortgages given to the bank shall be "for the use of the state." This seems to make the bank more directly an agency of the state than has been usually the case with state banks.

So in Moreland v. State Bank of Illinois, 1 Ill. 208, the failure of a board of directors of the state bank to protest a note and foreclose a mortgage as required by statute was held not to release the sureties on a note which was given for accommodation. The decision is based in part at least on the accommodation character of the note, but the court seems to regard the negligence of the board of directors as within the rule which denies that the state shall be prejudiced by an omission of duty on the part of its officers.

In Linn v. State, 2 Ill. 87, 25 Am. Dec. 71, overruling Snyder v. State Bank of Illinois, 1 Ill. 122, it was held in 1833 that bills of the state bank were bills of credit issued by the state within the prohibition of the United States Constitution. This decision is, in its result, contrary to decisions by other state courts and by the Supreme Court of the United States as shown in the cases hereafter following. But the state bank of Illinois was not only owned by the state and its cashiers gave bonds directly to the state, but its bills were by statute made receivable at all times for any debt due to the state, or to any county, as well as for debts due to the bank. Moreover all the revenues of the state were "pledged" for the redemption of the bills of the bank and the legislature "pledged" itself to redeem in gold and silver all the bills issued by the bank.

But the mere fact that the bills of a bank which was owned by the state were made receivable in all payments of debts due to the state was held in Woodruff v. Trapnall, 51 U. S. 10 How. 190, 13 L. ed. 383, insufficient to make them bills of credit issued by the state or on the faith of the state. That case may possibly be distinguished from the Illinois case by reason of the fact that the bank had a cash capital with resources and property of its own subject to judicial process, and it did not appear that the state had guaranteed the bills or in any way pledged its credit to secure them. Although the Illinois case is at first sight in conflict with the other decisions it is by no means clear that it is so in principle. The pledging of the credit of the state for the payment of the bills in addition to making them receivable for all debts to the state would seem to be very nearly an indirect way of emitting bills of credit by the state. This responsibility of the state of Illinois for the payment and redemption of the bills of the bank is an element which does not seem to have existed in the case of the state banks in other states.

That the notes of a state bank, which was the property of the state, are not bills of credit issued by the state within the meaning of constitutional prohibitions against the issuing of bills of credit by a state, is decided in Owen v. Branch Bank at Mobile, 3 Ala. 258; McFarland v. State Bank, 4 Ark. 44, 47 Am. Dec. 761; State v. Calvin, R. M. Charlton (Ga.) 151; Lampton v. Commonwealth's Ex. 2 Litt. (Ky.) 301; Bank of the Commonwealth v. Spilman, 8 Dana, 150; Bank of the Commonwealth v. Swindler, 2 Dana, 393; Jones v. Bank of Tennessee, 8 B. Mon. 122, 46 Am. Dec. 540; Bank of Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Clark, 4 Mo. 59; Griffith v. Commonwealth Bank of Kentucky, Id. 355; Craighead v. State Bank, Meigs, 199; Woodruff v. Trapnall, 51 U. S. 10 How. 190, 13 L. ed. 383, and Briscoe v. Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 257, 9 L. ed. 702, affirming 7 J. J. Marsh. 849; Darlington v. Branch Bank of Alabama, 54 U. S. 13 How. 12, 14 L. ed. 30.

In the leading case on this subject in the Supreme Court of the United States, that of Briscoe v. Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, supra, this decision was based on the ground that the funds of the bank and its property of every description were responsible for the payment of its debts and could be reached by legal or equitable process so that the bank in this respect could claim no exemption under the prerogatives of the state. The court said: "It is a simple corporation, acting within the sphere of its corporate powers, and can no more transcend them than any other banking institution. The state, as a stockholder, bears the same relation to the bank as any other stockholder." The court also said: "If a state may own a part of the stock of a bank, we know of no principle which prevents it from owning the whole."

The public cannot sue.

Quo warranto will not lie to determine disputed private rights or to determine any disputed rights where another plain and adequate remedy exists, or to oust a corporation from the exercise of assumed powers where such powers cannot technically be called franchises.

The same court in Darrington v. Branch Bank of Alabama, supra, in making a similar decision said: "The charter of the bank gave to it all the means of credit with the public, that banks usually have or could desire. That some reliance may have been placed on the guaranty, of the eventual payment of the notes of the bank by the state may be admitted. But this was a liability altogether different from that of a state on a bill of credit. It was remote and contingent. . . . No one received a bill of this bank with the expectation of its being paid by the state." As in the preceding case the court emphasizes the fact that the property of the bank was subject to judicial process by its creditors in which the state in its sovereign capacity could not interfere.

Another phase of the doctrine appears in Curran v. Arkansas, 56 U. S. 15 How. 304, 14 L. ed. 705, to the effect that a state which is the sole stockholder in a bank is not a creditor of the bank within the rule giving preference to the state over other creditors of an insolvent. It was held that the assets placed by the state in the hands of the bank constituted a fund upon the credit of which the bank issued its bills, and that when the bank became insolvent it had no longer any capital stock belonging to the state which the state could withdraw. Therefore it was held that the state could not cancel its bonds given for money borrowed of the bank, or withdraw any part of the specie or other property of the bank, as to do so would impair the obligation of contracts made with the owners of the bills issued by the bank.

This decision was expressly followed in Baring v. Dabney, 36 U. S. 19 Wall. 1, 23 L. ed. 90, where it was held that the assets of an insolvent bank although it was altogether owned by the state, could not be appropriated by legislative act or otherwise to pay the debts of the state as distinguished from the debts of the bank, but that its assets were a trust fund first applicable to the payment of the bank's debts.

The denial of any attribute of sovereignty to such a state bank is also made in Bank of State v. Gibson, 6 Ala. 314, where it was held that a bank owned by the state was subject to the same rule as other creditors of a decedent's estate in respect to presenting its claim within eighteen months after the grant of administration.

So in Bank of State v. Gibbs, 3 McCord, L. 377, the 29 L. R. A.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is prosecuted in the name of the state, on the relation of the attorney-general, against the regents of the university, the chancellor, and the treasurer, to oust them from the exercise of the power, which it is alleged they have usurped, of charging the students who are residents of the state an annual library fee of five dollars, and a graduating fee of five dollars, and of excluding such students who fail to pay the library fee from the use of the books. It is alleged that the university is a corporation, and that enforcing the payment of such fees by residents of the state is an assumption of unwarranted corporate powers by the regents; that the statute makes admission to the university free to all residents of the state. It rule that a state is entitled to priority over other creditors in enforcing payment of an obligation due to it is denied application in the case of a debt due to a bank which was owned entirely by the state. The court held that it was on the same level as other corporations.

That a state bank although owned entirely by the state has no priority over other creditors of a decedent's estate was also decided in Fields v. Wheatley, 1 Sneed, 351, on the ground that no part of the sovereignty of the state resides in the bank.

Likewise it is decided that a debt due the Bank of Tennessee is not due to the state, in Bank of Tennessee v. Dibrell, 3 Sneed, 379, holding that a statutory provision for deducting an indebtedness to the state from the salary of a public officer did not apply to a debt due to the bank because the bank was not an integral part of the state sovereignty.

That bills of the Bank of Tennessee shall be receivable at the treasury and in payment of taxes was held a statutory provision subject to repeal except as it affected bona fide holders who took the bills prior to the repeal. Furman v. Nichol, 3 Coldw. 423.

That the Bank of Tennessee chartered for the benefit of the state is a public corporation is decided in Bank of Tennessee v. Woodson, 5 Coldw. 178, which decides that the removal of the assets to a place not authorized by law was beyond the authority of the trustees of the bank.

The property of the bank is also so far recognized as the property of the state as to be exempt from taxation. Nashville v. Bank of Tennessee, 1 Swan. 209.

See other cases as to taxation of state institutions under heading as to Liabilities of such institutions, infra, II.

But the fact that the state is sole owner of the stock of a bank is held not to make a suit against the bank the same as a suit against the state so as to defeat the jurisdiction of the courts. Bank of Kentucky v. Wister, 37 U. S. 3 Pet. 313, 7 L. ed. 437.

The above case followed that of Bank of United States v. Planters Bank of Georgia, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 304, 6 L. ed. 244, in which case the state was a corporator as well as a proprietor of stock, but was not the sole proprietor.

In State Bank v. Clark, 8 N. C. 36, it was held that a so-called state bank was a private corporation so that its books were not admissible in evidence, but the facts as to the character of the bank are not discussed or stated.

b. Educational institutions.

Although this note relates only to institutions which are owned by the state and are also incor-is admitted that the regents have been collecting such library fee, and claim the right to do so, and also the right to exclude students who refuse to pay from the use of the library. But it is contended that the exercise of this assumed power cannot be inquired into by an action in the nature of quo warranto, for the reason that the state university is not a corporation, or, if a corporation in any sense, then only a quasi corporation, whose doings cannot be inquired into in an action of this kind. It is contended that the jurisdiction of this court of original proceedings in the nature of quo warranto is confined to such cases as were regarded as proper ones for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the courts by proceedings in quo warranto at the time of the adoption of the constitution; that the jurisdiction of the court cannot be extended by legislative enactment to cases of a different nature. It is claimed that quasi corporations are creatures of the law, established for the purposes of government, and while they have some of the attributes of corporations, yet that they are not such corporations as those over the actions of which the courts exercise their supervisory power by actions of this nature. In the fourth subdivision of section 653 of the Code it is provided that this action may be maintained "when any corporation do or admit acts which amount to a surrender or a forfeiture of their rights and privileges as a corporation, or when any corporation abuses its power or exercises powers not conferred by law." In State v. Topeka, 81 Kan. 452, it was held that, "whenever a municipal corporation usurps any power which might porated, it is proper to refer merely for the sake of distinction to similar institutions which receive state aid. On this point it is settled that the fact that an institution of learning receives aid from the state does not of itself make it a public corporation. Cleveland v. Stewart, 3 Ga. 233; Illinois Board of Education v. Greenebaum, 39 Ill. 610; Board of Education of the State v. Bakewell, 122 Ill. 339; Regents of University of Maryland v. Williams, 9 Gill & J. 365, 31 Am. Dec. 72.

In Cleveland v. Stewart, supra, it is said, "this bounty it can receive or not. It is the beneficiary of the state, but that gives the state no rights over it."

In Illinois Board of Education v. Greenebaum, supra, it is said that the fact that no appropriation has been made from the state treasury for the maintenance of an institution is one feature which distinguishes it from state institutions properly so called.

But in Board of Education of the State v. Bakewell, supra, it is held that appropriations for a university by the state do not change the private character in which it was established by private benefactions, and that a declaration by the legislature that a state normal university, which was in fact a private corporation, was a state institution and that its property belonged to the state, is a mere harmless declaration upon the statute book having no effect.

In Regents of University of Maryland v. Williams, supra, it was said of the University of Maryland that it had none of the characteristics of a public corporation because the state was not the founder of it but merely gave it capacity to acquire and hold property, and that its private character was not affected by subsequent endowment by the state.

That an incorporated state university although established by public law and endowed and supported by the state is not a public corporation, or is at most a quasi public corporation, is declared in State v. Carr, 111 Ind. 335. But the question really decided was that the university fund, which by a certain statute was to be loaned at seven per cent, was not a part of the "public funds" within the meaning of a later statute requiring eight per cent interest on a loan of public funds. Therefore while the declaration in the case that the corporation was not a public one is in conflict with the weight of authority respecting similar corporations, the decision on the point actually involved is in no respect opposed to the other authorities.

A later Indiana case decides that the State Board of Agriculture which is created a body corporate with perpetual succession, including as ex officio members the president of each county agricultural 30 L. R. A. society, and which is in a sense an educational institution required to hold meetings, receive reports from county societies, and make an annual report to the legislature, but receives its funds for the most part from other sources than the state, is not a public but is a private corporation, although no shares of stock are issued. Downing v. Indiana State Board of Agriculture, 13 L. R. A. 664, 129 Ind. 443. But in addition to the fact that its funds were chiefly derived from other sources than the state the court laid stress on the fact that the legislature had itself treated the corporation as a private one by making it a loan of state money and taking a mortgage upon its property. The question arose in this case in respect to the validity of a statute abolishing the board and transferring its property to another board, but the statute was held unconstitutional because of the private character of the corporation.

But neither of these Indiana cases refers to State v. White, 63 Ind. 273, 43 Am. Rep. 496, in which the court held that Purdue University being endowed by virtue of an act of congress donating public lands for agricultural colleges and kept in existence very largely by legislative appropriations, was "therefore an educational institution sustaining relations to the people at large analogous to those occupied by other public schools and colleges of the state maintained at public expense, and one in which all the inhabitants of the state have a common interest." Consequently the court by mandamus compelled the trustees and faculty of the institution to admit as a student a person who had been improperly refused admission because he would not promise to disconnect himself from active membership in a Greek letter fraternity or secret college society.

That a state university although recognized by the constitution of the state may not be a corporation is the decision in Weary v. State University, 43 Iowa, 235. In this case it was held that while the legislature had declared that school lands were granted to such university by the state and others were donated to it, this meant simply that such lands had been appropriated to its benefit when the lands were sold and patents were issued by the state. It was accordingly held that no action could be maintained against the university. But in many states incorporated state universities have been established, and in some cases this has been done by the constitution of the state.

The Agricultural & Mechanical College in Ohio is held not to be a corporation, therefore the constitutional provision as to special statutes conferring corporate powers is held not to apply to it. Nell v. Ohio Agricultural & Mechanical College Trustees, 31 Ohio St. 15.

In South Dakota the state was held liable in Jew-be conferred upon it by the sovereign power of the state, but which has not been so conferred, such corporation may be ousted from the exercise of such power by a civil action in the nature of quo warranto in the supreme court." In that case judgment was entered ousting the city from the assumed power of raising a revenue from the sale of intoxicating liquors by granting licenses or permits therefor.

Is the university such a corporation as is referred to in the statutory provision above quoted? The present state university is the successor of the Lawrence University of Kansas, incorporated under an act of the territorial legislature approved January 29, 1861. This act provided for the establishment of a private corporation. Under subsequent legislation the school was taken in charge by the state, and is now a public institution, established and maintained under the following provision of the Constitution (art. 6, § 7): "Provision shall be made by law for the establishment at some eligible and central point of a state university for the promotion of literature, and the arts and sciences, including a normal and an agricultural department. All funds arising from the sale, or rents of lands granted by the United States to the state for the support of a state university, and all other grants, donations, or bequests either by the state or individuals for such purpose, shall remain a perpetual fund, to be called the university fund, the interest of which shall be appropriated to the support of the state university." Article 6 of the Constitution treats of the subject of education. In the section quoted it not only au-ell Nursery Co. v. State, 4 S. Dak. 213, 59 N. W. Rep. 1025, for trees and shrubbery on the grounds of the state agricultural college, but it does not appear that the institution was a corporation.

Where incorporated universities exist which are founded and supported by the state they are generally treated by the courts as public rather than private corporations. The main case of STATE v. BOARD OF REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF KANSAS is in accord with other decisions on this point.

The University of Alabama is held in University of Alabama Trustees v. Winston, 5 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 17, to be a public corporation the charter of which is subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal at the pleasure of the general assembly. This is declared to be in every respect a public institution created by legislative enactment without the aid of private contributions. The court says: "It is true this instrumentality (of government) is confined to the disposition of a particular part of the public domain, the collection and appropriation of the proceeds in a particular way, the erection of college buildings and other duties attendant upon the establishment and support of an institution of learning." But it is regarded as an instrumentality of the state.

The California Statute of 1879, art. 9, § 9, declared that the University of California should be continued in the form and character prescribed in the acts then in force, subject to legislative control for certain specified purposes only. The Hastings College of Law having been made a part of the University, as decided in Foltz v. Hoge, 54 Cal. 28, it is decided in People v. Kewen, 69 Cal. 215, that the legislature could not therefore change the form of its government by creating a board of trustees to take the place of the board of directors provided for by the act creating the college.

The medical college of Virginia which is owned by the state and was incorporated by act of the legislature after a transfer to the state of the property of a previously existing medical school, is held in Lewis v. Whittle, 77 Va. 415, to be in every sense a public corporation holding its life and property at the pleasure of the legislature.

The University of Louisiana created and provided for by the constitution of the state is a public institution and property belonging to it is devoted to public use. Tulane Education Fund v. New Orleans Board of Assessors, 38 La. Ann. 392.

See further, infra II., as to taxation of property of state institutions.

An appropriation to the University of Louisiana, made under the requirement of the Constitution, article 230, is entitled to preference in payment over all other warrants drawn against the general fund except warrants in favor of the Mechanical & Agricultural College and of the University for the education of colored persons, which are concurrent in rank therewith, and warrants for salaries of constitutional officers which are entitled to preference over all others. State v. Burke, 35 La. Ann. 457.

The University of Michigan is a corporation capable of owning property and is a corporation of a public character, having been erected and supported by a public fund, and the corporators of which have no private interest whatever connected with their corporate character. The regents of the University of Michigan located at Ann Arbor, are the successors to the functions and property rights of the trustees of the University of Michigan located at Detroit. Regents of University of Michigan v. Detroit Board of Education, 4 Mich. 213.

They are entitled to maintain an action for the purchase price of lands lawfully sold by them. Regents of University of Michigan v. Detroit Young Men's Soc., 12 Mich. 138.

The board of regents of the University of Nebraska, being a body corporate with power to sue and be sued and to acquire property, is a public corporation within the control of the legislature. The whole interests and franchises of the corporation are the exclusive property and domain of the government itself and therefore it is in the strictest sense a public corporation. Regents of University of Nebraska v. McConnell, 5 Neb. 426.

The state treasurer being by statute the custodian of the funds of the University and the office of treasurer of the University having been abolished, the University has no longer any power to sue for moneys belonging to the regents' fund which a former treasurer has refused to turn over to the state treasurer. Ibid.

Since this institution is a public corporation and the funds are in the hands of the state treasurer an appropriation is necessary in order to permit warrants to be drawn on the regents' fund in his hands. State v. Babcock, 17 Neb. 612; State v. Liedtke, 9 Neb. 463.

The University of North Carolina is a public institution and body corporate and therefore subject to legislative control. The fact that it has received private donations does not affect its public character as it was originally and still is a creature of the legislature absolutely dependent on the legislature for its existence. Therefore the legislature has power to change the laws so that funds formerly payable to the institution will be diverted in other directions. University of North Carolina v. Maulsby, 43 N. C. 257.

In Oregon it is held that the number of directors of the State University constitute a corporation although the legislature has not expressly declared thorizes, but it requires, special legislation for the establishment of a university. The legislation must be special, because but one university is contemplated. It is claimed that section 1, article 12, of the Constitution, which treats of corporations, and provides that "the legislature shall pass no special act conferring corporate powers," would render void a special act conferring corporate powers on the university, and that the legislation with reference to the university can only be upheld on the ground that it is a quasi corporation, and not a corporation proper. It is conceded by the very learned counsel for the defendant that universities are generally corporations proper, but it is claimed that our state university, while a valid public institution, cannot be a valid corporation because of section 1, article 12.

We think this section has no application to legislation with reference to the university. It is in the article which treats of corporations in general. The section of the constitution first quoted, however, is in the article treating of the subject of education, and applies specifically to the establishment of a university. It directs the establishment of such an institution, leaving the legislature free in determining as to particulars. It is true that there is no express grant of authority to make it a corporation, but in view of the fact that such institutions are generally corporations, and of the difficulty, if not utter impracticability, of establishing a school authorized to receive donations, and to hold extensive properties intended for the use of each succeeding generation, without conferring corporate powers, we think it clear that them to be such, since some of the powers conferred could only be exercised by a corporation. Dunn v. University of Oregon, 9 Or. 387.

The University of Washington established by the Washington statutes is under the administration of the board of regents constituted by the Act of March 27, 1890, the sources of revenue being tuition fees and legislative appropriations. The board of land and building commissioners are held to have no power to draw on the university fund. State v. Lindsley, 3 Wash. 125.

The board of regents of the University of Wisconsin having been abolished and a new and different corporation established under the same name, it is held that a contract of the old board for the services of a professor is unaffected by the change. Butler v. Regents of the University, 32 Wis. 124.

Under Colorado Const., art. 8, § 5, making the University located at Boulder, the Agricultural College at Fort Collins, the School of Mines at Golden, the Institution for the Education of Mutes at Colorado Springs, institutions of the state, their location is held to be permanently fixed as thus designated and subject to change only by constitutional amendment. State Institutions, 9 Colo. 628.

The Florida Agricultural College having been founded by the state with public moneys derived in trust from the government of the United States, is a public corporation and the legislature has power to change the trustees thereof. State v. Knowles, 16 Fla. 577.

The State Agricultural Society in Oregon is a corporation capable of taking and holding title to a farm bought by subscription for the purpose of instruction in agriculture. Liggett v. Ladd, 23 Or. 26.

The State Agricultural Society of Vermont is treated in Selinas v. Vermont State Agr. Soc., 60 Vt. 249, as a private corporation, but without discussion of its character and without stating the facts bearing on this question.

c. Other state institutions.

Many institutions of the kind referred to in this subdivision are maintained by different states without any incorporation of them. Such are not within the scope of this subject since the corporate character of state institutions is all that is here considered.

The deaf and dumb institution is spoken of as a corporation, in Ellis v. North Carolina Inst. for Deaf, Dumb & Blind, 68 N. C. 425, which decides as to the validity of a de facto board.

The charity hospital founded in 1784 by Don Andrés Almonasteri Roxas was ceded to the public in 1811 and accepted by the Louisiana legislature and placed under the control of administrators, 29 L. R. A.

whose appointment was provided for and subsequently changed by statute. State v. Finley, 33 La. Ann. 114.

A state hospital for the insane in Illinois is a corporation founded by the state and supported by its funds. People v. Higgins, 15 Ill. 110.

Property appropriated by the state for the use of a state institution for the blind is held in St. Louis, J. & C. R. Co. v. Trustees of Illinois Inst. for Education of Blind, 43 Ill. 303, to be exempt from general provisions for the condemnation of property by a railroad company. This institution does not seem to have been incorporated, however, at this time, but was incorporated by the Illinois Act of 1887.

The Maryland Hospital for the Insane incorporated by the Maryland Act of 1878, chapter 341, and declared to be a public agency of the state, holds its property free from liability for assessments for benefits on the opening of a public road contiguous to the property. Baltimore County Comrs. v. Managers of Maryland Hospital for Insane, 62 Md. 127. The court says: "It is not material whether the state's property may be taken from it by a tax in the nature of an assessment for benefits, or in some other way. The danger exists of taking that which belongs to and is essential to the state; and it cannot be exposed to this danger without its direct sanction."

For the expense of keeping a person in the asylum for the insane a claim was presented by the state of Michigan in the case of State v. Dunbar's Estate, 90 Mich. 99, and the estate was held liable therefor. But it does not appear that the asylum was a distinct corporation owned by the state. The board in charge of it seems to have been merely an unincorporated agency of the state, although it had power by statute to take title to property "in trust for the state."

In Peck v. State, 137 N. Y. 372, a judgment in a mandamus proceeding against the board of managers of the Buffalo state asylum for the insane was relied upon as the basis of a claim against the state; but it was held that such judgment against the board of managers was not binding upon and did not estop the state. This institution does not seem to be a corporation.

In Sherman v. Bellows, 24 Or. 553, where an injunction was sought against locating the Oregon Soldier's Home at a certain place, the court held that conceding without deciding that the home was a public institution of the state plaintiff did not show any right to the injunction.

II. Liabilities of such institutions.

That an incorporated state agricultural society which is one of the agencies of the state and not a corporation for pecuniary profit, cannot be held the framers of the constitution meant to and did authorize the establishment of the university as a corporate body. We do not deem it necessary at this time to enter into a consideration of the question whether an action in the nature of quo warranto may be maintained against a quasi corporation, such as a county, township, or school district, for the purpose of ousting it from the exercise of powers it has unlawfully assumed. Section 6, chapter 258, Laws 1889, provides that "the board of regents shall be a body corporate under the name of 'The Regents of the University of Kansas,' and as such may sue, and be sued, make contracts, and hold and transfer property both real and personal for the university. They shall provide a seal with their corporate name, which shall be used to attest all contracts in writing obligating the university." It is only necessary for us to hold, and we do hold in this case, that this act makes the board of regents such a corporation as will be restrained and held within the bounds of its lawful authority by the exercise of the original jurisdiction of this court in quo warranto. We are unable to mention another corporation in whose keeping interests are confided which it is more appropriate to protect by the exercise of the powers of the court than those confided to the regents. The education of the youth by the public is, of all the powers exercised by the state, of the most certain and unalloyed benefit to the people. The university crowns the great public-school system.

A further objection is made to the prosecution of this action in the name of the state, on the ground that the imposition of a library fee on students in the university is in the nature of levying a tax; that it affects, not the state, but the individual students; that they have an adequate remedy, if the tax be unlawful, by injunction; and that the attorney-general may not use the name of the state merely for the purpose of protecting their private interests. The fee imposed is not a tax, within the ordinary meaning of the term. It cannot be collected in the ordinary manner of collecting taxes. It is not ex-liable for the willful and illegal acts of its agents is the decision in A'Hern v. Iowa State Agr. Soc. (Iowa) 24 L. R. A. 655. This is decided on the ground that the institution is an agency of the state organized to promote the public good.

In Williamson v. Louisville Industrial School of Reform, 23 L. R. A. 300, 95 Ky. 251, it is held that a reform school under the control and oversight of the legislature which is an agency of the state and maintained by taxation and state aid, is not liable for negligent or malicious injuries to an inmate by its servants or employes. This decision, however, seems to be based chiefly on authorities which relate to the exemption of charitable institutions from such liability and is not expressly based on the fact that the institution was a public corporation.

The exemption from taxation of the property of the State University of Michigan is sustained in Auditor General v. Regents of University of Michigan, 10 L. R. A. 376, 83 Mich. 497, on the ground that the institution is a part of the state and that its property is public property and not by virtue of a statutory provision as to the exemption of property of literary and scientific institutions.

Likewise the property belonging to the Tulane Fund which had been exclusively devoted by the administrators of the fund to the benefit of the University of Louisiana under an arrangement by which the legislature gave them control of the university, is held to be devoted to a public use and therefore not taxable. Tulane Education Fund v. New Orleans Board of Assessors, 38 La. Ann. 292.

So the Agricultural College of Kansas being wholly a state institution, although it is an incorporated body, its property is not taxable. State Agricultural College Board of Regents v. Hamilton, 23 Kan. 376.

Likewise it is held in Illinois Industrial University Trustees v. Champaign County Supra, 76 Ill. 184, that the property of the Illinois Industrial University, which is a body corporate, in reality belongs to the state, although some of it was received by donations from the county, and therefore such property is exempt from taxation.

The property of the Bank of Tennessee, which is an institution owned by the state, is held to be exempt by implication from liability for taxes. Nashville v. Bank of Tennessee, 1 Swan, 200.

Lands owned by the state and occupied by a state hospital are held in Williams v. Little White Lick Gravel Road Co., Wils. (Ind.) 7, to be free from assessment for benefit on the construction of a gravel road. Here again it does not appear that the institution was incorporated but the property seems to be regarded as belonging directly to the state.

The exemption from assessment for water rents of hospitals and other institutions named in Ohio Rev. Stat., § 2417, is sustained in case of a charge by city waterworks for water furnished to the Ohio Hospital for epileptics. But it does not appear that this is an incorporated state institution. Gallipolis v. Gallipolis Waterworks, 2 Ohio N. P. 161.

The exemption from seizure and sale under execution of property of a state institution maintained and administered by state authority is sustained in the case of a state charity hospital, by State v. Finlay, 33 La. Ann. 114, and an injunction granted against such a sale.

The board of education of the city of New York which is given by statute "the powers and privileges of a corporation," is held not liable for negligence of its employes or others in leaving an uncovered excavation in a school building, since the corporation has no treasurer and receives no corporate benefit from the functions and powers conferred upon it. Donovan v. New York Board of Education, 85 N. Y. 117. This case is cited here as analogous to the corporations included in this note, but it may be questioned whether this corporation is not rather an incorporated agency of the city than the state, though with reference to the question decided in the case the same rule would seem to be applicable in either case. No attempt is made in this note to follow out the question of the liability of school districts or local boards of education, most of which we believe belong to the class of quasi corporations rather than corporations technically so called.

III. Directors, trustees, and officers.

a. In general.

The trustees of the State Agricultural Society appointed by the board of regents of education under S. Dak. Const., art. 14, § 4, are held not to be state officers within the constitutional provisions as to impeachment and removal of state officers. State v. Hewitt, 16 L. R. A. 413, 38 S. Dak. 137.

pressly provided for by any law of the state. It is at least doubtful whether the students are so united in interest that they could join in an action to restrain the collection of the fee. Whether they could do so or not, however, we are clearly of the opinion that the conduct of the university is a matter of state concern; that the public maintains the institution, not for the special advantages conferred by it on particular individuals, but for the great advantage accruing to the state by reason of the maintenance of a great institution of learning within its borders, and the diffusion of knowledge and advancement of the people in literature and art. All its people gain through the instrumentality of this great institution. It is to attain these public ends that the state lavishes money, raised by taxation, on the institution. It is because of the interest of the state in the education of its youth that the university was created at all. Having created a university, the state is directly concerned in its being conducted in accordance with the provisions of law. It is directly concerned in the education of the students. It is directly concerned when the youth of the state are, for any unwarranted cause, excluded from it. The legislature has undertaken to open the way to a higher education to the poorest of the youth of the state. Whenever the board of regents places any unwarranted obstacle in the way of the accomplishment of that end, they affect and oppose the public interest.

This disposes of the objections to the form of the action. But little need be said on the merits of the case. Section 11, chapter 258, Laws 1890, which was in force at the time the action was brought, reads: "Admission into the university shall be free to all the inhabitants of the state, but a sufficient fee shall be required from nonresident applicants, to be fixed by the board of regents, and no person shall be debarred on account of age, race, or sex." Notwithstanding the apparently plain provisions of this section,

The trustees of the Utah Agricultural College and members of the board of construction to supervise the erection of the college buildings are held to be officers of the territory within the provisions as to the appointment of officers. McCormick v. Pratt, 17 L. R. A. 243, 8 Utah, 234.

The constitutionality of the appointment of trustees by the legislature for the Institution for the Blind in Nebraska is denied on the ground that they are public officers, in State v. Holcomb (Neb.) 64 N. W. Rep. 457, but it does not appear that this institution is a corporation.

Directors of constitutional state institutions who are expressly called officers must be regarded as such with respect to the power of appointment. People v. McKee, 68 N. C. 429.

The action of trustees of the deaf and dumb institution constituting a de facto board in making the appointment of a steward under by-laws is sustained in Ellis v. North Carolina Inst. for Deaf, Dumb & Blind, 68 N. C. 425.

Trustees of the university and directors of the penitentiary and lunatic asylum and institution for the deaf, etc., are also declared to be public officers, in the case of People v. Bledsoe, 68 N. C. 457.

Trustees of the Illinois State Hospital, which is a corporation, are held to have the power to remove its superintendent. People v. Higgins, 15 Ill. 110.

In Dullam v. Willson, 53 Mich. 392, 51 Am. Rep. 123, it was decided that the governor could not arbitrarily and without hearing remove a trustee of the Michigan Institution for Educating the Deaf and Blind, which is an incorporated institution. The trustee is treated throughout the opinions in this case as a state officer and the case decided on the ground that as a state officer he was entitled to a hearing before removal.

The visitors appointed by the governor of Virginia for the medical colleges of the state are held to be public officers, but the power of the governor under the statute of the state to remove them is denied although the statute authorizes him to fill vacancies. This is held to mean such vacancies as occur otherwise than by removal. Lewis v. Whittle, 77 Va. 415.

A professor employed by the board of regents of a state university is not a public officer but an employee by contract. Butler v. Regents of the University, 32 Wis. 124.

But the election of a professor in the University of Missouri for six years "subject to law" was held to mean that it was subject to any law the legislature might pass and the court declined to pass on the question whether or not the professor was a public officer. Head v. Curators of University of Missouri, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 526, 23 L. ed. 160, affirming 47 Mo. 220.

In State v. Wilson, 29 Ohio St. 347, it was held that a person must be eligible to hold office in order to be chosen as a medical superintendent of the insane in a hospital in Ohio, but it does not appear that this institution was a corporation.

b. Personal Liability.

A question which seems to have arisen in but one case as to the personal liability of directors, trustees, regents, or other officers of such corporations, is decided in a California case. It holds that regents of the University of California, who constitute a corporation and were expressly declared by statute not to be deemed public officers, cannot be held individually liable for damages on account of negligence respecting poles and wires of a telegraph and telephone line maintained by the corporation. Lundy v. Delmas, 26 L. R. A. 651, 104 Cal. 655.

When such institutions are directly controlled and owned by the state, but are not incorporated, their officers clearly rank with other public officers and boards. But these boards which are not incorporated are often given powers which suggest the idea of an incorporated body and illustrate the gradations between such public officers as a governor or secretary of state, and those who are trustees of an incorporated state institution, such as a state university.

It will be seen from the review of the cases in this note that corporations of the class here treated of are to be regarded as in the strict sense public institutions, although, as in the case of some of the state universities, they may possess in their own name large amounts of property and be governed by corporate officers in almost all particulars like corporations of similar kind which are founded and sustained by private benefactions. The officers of these public corporations are also regarded as public officers and their personal liability regarded as within the general rule applicable to other public officers. Since these corporations form a distinct class which is becoming quite numerous it is certain that the branch of the law of corporations applicable to them, although ignored hitherto, is to be an important one.

it is contended that the board of regents may yet collect a reasonable fee for the wear and tear of the books; that the word "free" must be taken with qualifications; that in the nature of things there must be rules and regulations; that each and every student cannot be permitted to occupy the chancellor's seat at his desk, or any other place in the university he may choose, at his own sweet will, but that the regents and the chancellor have a right to make proper regulations; and that the fee imposed is no more than is reasonable to preserve and protect the library. We fully agree with so much of the claim of the learned counsel as asserts the right of the regents and the chancellor to make all necessary and proper rules and regulations for the orderly management of the school, the preservation of discipline therein, and the protection of its property, but that it may require the payment of money as a condition precedent to the use of the property of the state is another and a different claim, with which we do not agree. If the regents may collect five dollars for the use of the library, why may they not collect also for the use of the rooms of the building and of its furniture? Why may they not impose fees for walking in the campus, or for the payment of instructors? All these things have cost money. There are expenses incurred by the state on behalf of the students in connection with every department of the school. If they may collect for one thing, it is not apparent why they may not collect for another. It is suggested that supplies are furnished in the laboratories for the use of students, which are destroyed, that vessels and implements may be broken, and that the students should certainly be required to pay for these things. No question of that kind, however, is now presented, and express provision therefor is made by chapter 226, Laws 1895. The library is provided for permanent use. Each volume with proper care may be used by a great number of students, and for a long term of years. The library as a whole is subjected to wear and tear, but only in the same manner as furniture and other properties furnished by the state. The buildings, furniture, library, and apparatus, as well as the services of the faculty, are furnished and paid for by the state. These, we hold, under the provisions of the statute quoted, are free to all residents of the state who are entitled to admission into the university. The regents have no power to raise a fund to be managed and disposed of at their discretion by charging fees for the use of the library, or under any other claim for any other purpose, unless expressly authorized to do so by law.

Judgment of ouster will be entered in accordance with the prayer of the petition.

Section 6563a, Revised Statutes, providing: "If the plaintiff in any action for wages recover the sum claimed by him in his bill of particulars, there shall be included in his costs such fee as the court may allow, but not in excess of five dollars, for his attorney. But no such attorney fee shall be taxed in the costs unless said wages have been demanded in writing, and not paid within three days after such demand. If the defendant appeal from any such judgment, and the plaintiff on appeal recover a like sum exclusive of interest from the rendition of the judgment before the justice, there shall be included in his costs such additional fee not in excess of fifteen dollars, for his attorney, as the court may allow,"—is unconstitutional and void.

NOTE.—For conflict of decisions as to the constitutionality of statutes providing for attorney's fees in actions against one class of defendants only, see last division of note as to equal privileges and protection, found in Louisville Safety Vault & Trust Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 14 L. R. A. 583. 29 L. R. A. judgment of the Court of Common Pleas which in turn affirmed a judgment of the Justice's Court in favor of plaintiff for wages and the statutory penalty for a failure to pay them when demanded. Reversed.

Statement by Bradbury, J.:

On August 22, 1893, the defendant in error commenced an action before a justice of the peace of Athens county, to recover against the plaintiff in error $6.62, upon a claim for work and labor, and also an attorney fee of five dollars, demanded by virtue of section 6563a, Revised Statutes, because the plaintiff in error failed to pay the sum claimed as wages within three days after payment thereof had been demanded in writing.

The defendant in error recovered judgment before the justice of the peace for the amount of his claim for wages, and also an attorney fee of $5, as he had demanded. The plaintiff in error appealed the cause to the court of common pleas, where the defendant in error again prevailed and was allowed by that court an additional attorney fee of $5.

This judgment was affirmed by the circuit court, whereupon the plaintiff in error instituted proceedings in this court to reverse the same.

Mr L. D. Vickers, for plaintiff in error:
This statute is unconstitutional:

1. Because it authorizes the taking of private property without just compensation.
2. Because it authorizes the taking of private property for private purposes without the owner's consent, and authorizes the transfer of one person's property to another without the consent of the owner.

Bradbury, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error on August 22, 1893, filed before R. R. Paterson, a justice of the peace in and for Athens county, Ohio, the following bill of particulars:

"Hiram Rosser, Plaintiff, v. The Hocking Valley Coal Company, Defendant.

"The defendant is a corporation, duly organized under the laws of Ohio, and doing business in Nelsonville, Ohio. Defendant is 29 L. R. A.

indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $6.82 for work and labor done and performed in and about the coal mines of said defendant during the months of July and August, 1893, and at the request of said defendant. Said sum is due and unpaid; frequent requests have been made for payment of the same. On the 18th day of August, 1893, plaintiff served upon defendant a notice in writing, demanding payment of said sum within three days thereafter. Said defendant has neglected and refused to pay said sum within three days thereafter in compliance with said demand.

"Therefore plaintiff prays judgment against said defendant for said sum of $6.82 and for his costs in this action, and for his attorney's fee of $5, and interest from August 10, 1893.

"Buckley & Pettit,

"Attorneys for Plaintiff."

The defendant below, plaintiff in error in this court, was duly served with summons, but did not appear before the justice at the time of trial nor make any defense against the claim of the plaintiff below.

Whereupon the justice of the peace, upon the testimony presented by the plaintiff below, rendered judgment for him and against the defendant below for $6.82, the exact amount claimed, together with costs of suit and an attorney fee of $5.

Plaintiff in error appealed the cause to the court of common pleas, where a petition was filed similar in all respects to the bill of particulars before quoted, except that an attorney fee of $15 was demanded instead of one of $5 as in the bill of particulars.

The plaintiff in error made no defense in the court of common pleas, and that court gave judgment against it for $7 and costs, including an attorney fee of $10, $5 of which was for services of an attorney in the court of common pleas, and $5 for such services rendered in the proceedings before the justice of the peace.

The plaintiff in error, objecting to that part of the judgment of the court of common pleas which required it to pay attorney fees for the benefit of its adversary, moved the court to retax costs by striking out the items relating to such fees. The court of common pleas overruled the motion, and exceptions were duly noted. This ruling of the court of common pleas having been sustained by the circuit court, the cause was brought to this court to reverse the action of those courts upon the ground that the statute upon the provisions of which rulings rest is unconstitutional and therefore void.

This Statute, 89 Ohio Laws, 59, § 6563a provides:

"If the plaintiff in any action for wages recover the sum claimed by him in his bill of particulars, there shall be included in his costs such fee as the court may allow, but not in excess of $5 for his attorney. But no such attorney fee shall be taxed unless said wages have been demanded in writing and not paid within three days after such demand. If the defendant appeal from any such judgment and the plaintiff on appeal recover alike sum exclusive of the interest from the rendition of the judgment before the justice, there shall be included in his costs such additional fee not in excess of $15 for his attorney as the court may allow."

By virtue of the provisions of this statute any claimant of wages may, in the first instance, determine the amount due him for wages from his employer, make written demand for its payment, which, if not complied with within three days, subjects the employer to the penalty of an attorney fee, if an action is afterwards brought to enforce the demand and the amount claimed is recovered therein. The amount due may, and often does, depend upon a numerous train of facts and circumstances, many of which may be in dispute between the parties. The most obvious of which is the number of days, weeks, or months, during which the service had been continued, the rate of wages agreed upon, or, if no rate had been fixed, the reasonable value of the services rendered; whether payments had been made from time to time on account, or whether a set-off or counterclaim existed between the parties by which the amount otherwise due would be reduced or entirely extinguished. Mutual accounts may have run between the employé and employer for years, become complicated, and of doubtful and difficult solution. Whether this condition of things exist, or whether the claim is simply for the wages of a single day or week at a fixed price is immaterial in the purview of this statute. In either case by its terms the employé may in the first instance fix the amount of his demand, and if he does this, and serves the written notice prescribed, the employer contests the claim at his peril.

The language of the statute is imperative. "If the plaintiff . . . recover the sum claimed by him in his bill of particulars there shall be included in his costs such fee as the court may allow," not to exceed $5, in the court of the justice of the peace, or should the defendant appeal the case a total of $15 by the court of common pleas. The language requiring that the fee be allowed is mandatory; the court or justice has no discretion in this respect; it must allow an attorney fee, the amount only is discretionary, within the limit prescribed; and that means that, within such limits, the tribunal by which the judgment is rendered, is bound to allow the value of the services rendered. Under the statute, to entitle the plaintiff to have an attorney fee taxed against the defendant, he is not required to show that the debtor had funds, which he willfully or arbitrarily or even carelessly refused to apply to pay his debts, nor that a vexatious or dilatory defense had been made to defeat or delay the judgment. No other misconduct by the defendant is required than such as may be implied from a failure to comply with the peremptory written demand made upon him.

Whether the debtor interposes or shows a vexatious defense, whether he makes an honest though unsuccessful one, or whether he makes none at all, but instead suffers judgment to be taken against him by default, are all equally immaterial; in either case the statute denounces against him a penalty called an attorney fee, if an action is brought on the claim and judgment recovered for the sum demanded. The debtor may even acknowledge the debt and be solicitous for its payment, but, owing to straightened circumstances, fails to pay within the prescribed time, nevertheless the penalty is incurred.

In the case under consideration it appears by the bill of particulars that the written demand prescribed by the statute was made, and that it was not complied with within the three days. No other ground was alleged as the basis of the penalty. The record does not show any denial of the debt, by the debtor, at the time the demand was made or afterwards, or that it had funds with which it could have paid the sum demanded. Afterwards, when an action was brought in the justice's court on the claim, no defense was made, or obstacle whatever interposed to delay or embarrass the proceedings. Under these circumstances no intent to vex or harass the claimant or delay the action can be imputed to the plaintiff in error. The questions submitted by it to the circuit court, and to this court, show that its object in taking an appeal from the judgment of the justice of the peace may be fairly attributed to its desire to be relieved from paying an attorney fee for the benefit of its antagonist, and thereby assert and vindicate an equal right to the protection of the courts of the state.

Upon what principle can a rule of law rest which permits one party, or class of people, to invoke the action of our tribunals of justice at will, while the other party, or another class of citizens, does so at the peril of being mulcted in an attorney fee, if an honest, but unsuccessful, defense should be interposed?

A statute that imposes this restriction upon one citizen, or class of citizens, only denies to him or them the equal protection of the law.

It is true that no provision of the Constitution of 1851 declares in direct and express terms that this may not be done, but, nevertheless, it violates the fundamental principles upon which our government rests as they are enunciated and declared by that instrument in the bill of rights. The first section of the Constitution declares that the right to acquire, possess, and protect property is inalienable, and the next section declares among other things that "government is instituted for the equal protection and benefit" of every person, while section 16 of article 1 provides that "all courts shall be open, and every person, for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation shall have remedy by due course of law, and justice shall be administered without denial or delay."

The right to protect property is declared, as well as that justice shall not be denied, and every one entitled to equal protection. Judicial tribunals are provided for the equal protection of every suitor. The right to retain property already in possession is as sacred as the right to recover it, when dispossessed. The right to defend against an action to recover money is as necessary as the right to defend one brought to recover specific real or personal property. An adverse result in either case deprives the defeated party of property.

If the general assembly has power to enact the statute in question, it could also enact one providing that lawyers, doctors, and grocers, or any other class of citizens might make out their accounts, and demand in writing their payment within a short time, which, if not complied with, would entitle the plaintiff to an attorney fee in addition to his claim if he recovered the amount demanded. We do not think the general assembly has power to discriminate between persons or classes respecting the right to invoke the arbitration of the courts in the adjustment of their respective right.

The legislative power to compel an unsuccessful party to an action—generally the defendant—to pay an attorney fee to his opponent has received the attention of a number of courts of last resort, as well as laws which impose as a penalty double damages or some similar penalty for some wrongful or negligent act injurious to another. Where the penalty has been imposed for some tortious or negligent act the statute has generally, though not always, been sustained, but, on the contrary, where no wrongful or negligent conduct was imputed to the defeated party, any attempt to charge him with a penalty has not prevailed. Millett v. People, 117 Ill. 294, 57 Am. Rep. 869; State v. Fire Creek Coal & Coke Co. 83 W. Va. 188, 6 L. R. A. 359; Durkes v. Janesville, 28 Wis. 464, 9 Am. Various phases of this subject have received attention in the foregoing cases, as well as in some others, to which we do not deem it necessary to refer. The general tendency of these authorities is towards the result which we have reached; but whether they do or do not support our conclusions, we are satisfied that the fundamental principles of government declared by our bill of rights clearly and unequivocally prohibit legislation of the character of that involved in this case.

Judgment allowing an attorney fee reversed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Iowa, Appt.,

v.

G. H. HAUG.

(.....Iowa.....)

A body of water having well-defined shores and no current, lying entirely in the state of Iowa, a quarter of a mile from the main channel of the Mississippi river and forming no part of that river for the purposes of navigation, is within the provisions of Acts, 23 Gen. Assem., chap. 34, against the use of seines in the waters of that state, and is not within the exception of boundary waters, over which the state has not exclusive jurisdiction.

The evil against which the penalties of the statute are directed nowhere stands out in such glaring proportions as here, where 25,000 to 50,000 pounds of fish are taken at a single haul. There can be no presumption that these important fisheries were to go unprotected and this wanton destruction unchecked, unless such intent is distinctly expressed.

There is good reason why the legislature should not seek to prohibit fishing in those streams which form the state boundaries, and should confine the law to waters over which the state has exclusive jurisdiction.

Duntlieth & D. Bridge Co. v. Dubuque County, 55 Iowa, 558.

Kinne, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

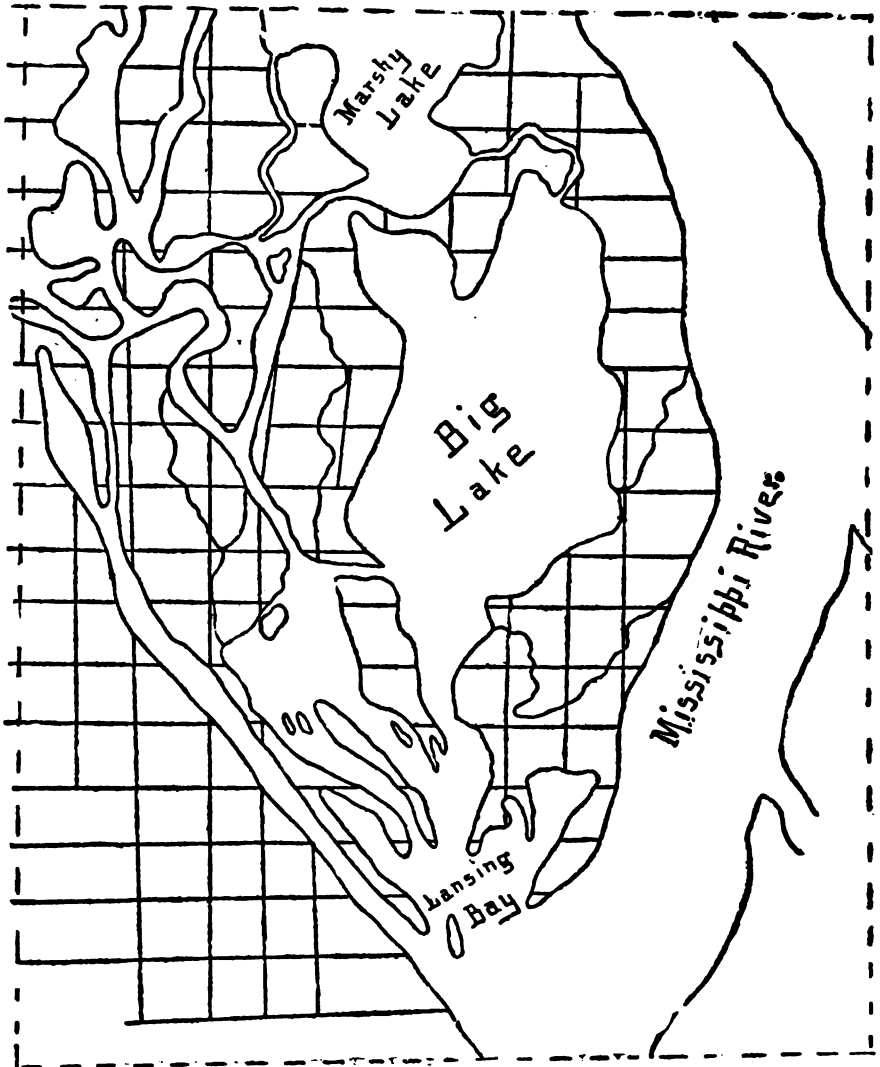

1. It is not disputed that the defendant in December, 1893, caught several thousand pounds of fish—sunfish, pike, bass, and pickerel—with a seine about 400 feet long, which was drawn under the ice, in Big lake, in Allamakee county, Iowa. For this act he was arrested, and brought before the mayor of the city of Lansing, on information filed by the fish commissioner of the state, charging the defendant with illegally seining fish, contrary to the laws of this state. He was convicted, and appealed to the district court. There was a jury trial, and at the close of the evidence the court directed a verdict for the defendant, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

2. There are a number of assignments of error in this case growing out of the rulings of the court upon the introduction of testimony, the refusal to give instructions asked by the state, the action of the court in directing a verdict for the defendant, and in other respects. Nearly all of these, however, in one way or another, relate to, and all are dependent on, the solution of the real question in controversy, viz., whether or not Big lake is a part of the Mississippi river, within the meaning of the statute which exempts the waters of said river from the operation of the laws of this state prohibiting the seining of fish.

To this question only shall we direct our attention.

The statute upon which the information against the defendant is based is found in the Acts of the 23d General Assembly (chap. 34), and is entitled "An act for the protection and preservation of fish," etc. It is provided by section 2 of the chapter that: "It shall be unlawful for any person to take from any of the waters of the state any fish in any manner except by hook and line; except that it shall be lawful for any person to take minnows for bait with a seine that does not exceed five yards in length. Also that it shall be lawful to take buffalo and suckers by spearing between the first day of November and the first day of March following. . . ." Section 6, under which the information was drawn, reads: "No person shall place, erect, or cause to be placed or erected, in or across any of the rivers, creeks, lakes, or ponds, or any outlets or inlets thereto, any trot line, seine, net, weir, trap, dam, or other obstruction in such manner as to hinder or obstruct the free passage of fish up, down, or through such watercourse for the purpose of taking or catching fish unless the same be done under the supervision of the fish commissioner, except minnows as provided in section 2 of this Act." Section 7 of the Act prohibits the placing of drugs, dynamite, powder, etc., "in any of the waters of the state," for the purpose of destroying or catching fish. In section 8 it is provided that any person found guilty of violating section 6 or 7 of the Act shall, upon conviction, be fined not less than $25, nor more than $100, and stand committed until such fine is paid. Section 11 of the Act provides that "nothing herein contained shall be held to apply to fishing in the Mississippi, the Missouri, or the Big Sioux rivers, nor so much of the Des Moines river as forms the boundary between the states of Missouri and Iowa." Defendant relies upon the provision of the section last quoted, and claims that Big lake constitutes a part of the Mississippi river, which is exempted from the operation of the act. It is not questioned that, if Big lake is not a part of the Mississippi river, within the meaning of the act, then defendant is guilty of having violated the law.

The plat below will aid in understanding the situation of Big lake, and its connection with the main channel of the Mississippi river. Big lake is about a mile and a half long, and three quarters of a mile wide. It rests in a shallow basin or depression, and has sloping banks. While there is a conflict in the testimony as to whether or not there is a current in this lake, we think the weight of the evidence is to the effect that at an ordinary stage of water there is no current. It appears that the water is clearer than that in the Mississippi river. The lake is from four to six feet deep. At an ordinary stage of water in the lake, the water in the outlet is about two feet deep, and from ten to twenty feet wide. The testimony tends to show that for two years prior to the trial of this case in the court below, viz. in 1892 and 1893, there had been no water running into this lake, though when the water is high there is a water connection at the north end of the lake. There are several sloughs between the lake and the main shore on the Iowa side, west of the lake. From the hills on the Iowa side of the river to the lake, it is a mile and a half. The land lying east of Big lake, and between it and the main channel of the river, is used for grazing and hay land, and on it are trees ranging in size from an inch or two in diameter up to three or four feet. It is admitted that Big lake and the slough lying west of it have not been used for purposes of navigation. Big lake, then, is a body of water having well-defined shores, and no current. It is from a quarter to a half a mile west of the main channel of the Mississippi river at the nearest point. It appears that there are times when the high water overflows all, or nearly all, of the land between the mainland on each side of the river. From the evidence it is clear that Big lake is not a part of the Mississippi river, so far as navigation is concerned. It is not disputed that it lies wholly within the state of Iowa. It follows, then, that Big lake, lying as it does wholly within the state of Iowa, does not constitute a part of the Mississippi river, for boundary purposes. Dunkleth & D. Bridge Co. v. Dubuque County, 55 Iowa, 558; Buttenuth v. St. Louis Bridge Co. 123 Ill. 535; Iowa v. Illinois, 147 U. S. 1, 37 L. ed. 55. We think it is quite clear that the intention of the law was to prohibit seining within water wholly within this state. Section 2 of the Act referred to uses the words, "from any of the waters of the state." In section 3 the words used are, "from any of the waters of the state." In section 7 the same words are used. These words very definitely cover all waters lying wholly within this state, and there can be no doubt they include Big lake, unless it is exempted from their operation by virtue of the provision of section 11 of the Act. Now, it is apparent that section 11 excepts from the operation of the act only the boundary waters of the state, over which the state has not exclusive jurisdiction. There is nothing in the section which suggests that it was the intent of the legislature to exempt from the operation of the act waters which lie entirely in our own state. Big lake being wholly within the state, we can discover no reason for saying that it was not the intention of the legislature that the provision of the act prohibiting seining in "any of the waters of the state" should not apply to it, the same as to any other body of water entirely within the state. We think that the Mississippi river, which is excluded from the provision of the act, includes only that body or stream of water which is popularly known as such river; that the wording of section 11 of the Act indicates that it was the Mississippi river which constitutes the boundary line of the state which the legislature had in mind. Again, we may look to the evil sought to be remedied by this legislation. The purpose was to prevent the wanton and unnecessary destruction of fish in the waters over which the state has exclusive jurisdiction; to preserve the fish in said waters for the use of the people of the state. If it be true that these lakes and streams, which, though connected with the main body of water known as the "Mississippi River," yet form no part of the river proper, are not waters in which seining is prohibited, then the legislation falls far short of remedying the evil which existed, and these waters of the state, which, we are justified from the evidence in this case in saying, constitute the most valuable fishing grounds in the state, may be despoiled in this wholesale way of their wealth of fish without let or hindrance. To be justified in reaching such a conclusion, it should appear clearly that such waters were intended to be exempted from the operation of the law. We find nothing in the law to warrant defendant's contention. We do not deem it necessary to discuss what constitutes the middle of the main channel of the river. The "Mississippi River" spoken of in the state is the river as usually referred to. It means that body of water which forms the eastern boundary of the state, and, from the wording of certain sections of the act, it is manifest that it was not intended to embrace within the words "Mississippi River" waters entirely within the state, though having connection with said boundary stream. Appellee relies upon the case of Dunlieth & D. Bridge Co. v. Dubuque County, supra. It is claimed that that case is decisive of this controversy. We do not think so. The question in that case was as to what part of plaintiff's bridge was properly assessable in Iowa. It was held that the word "channel," as used in the act of congress admitting Iowa into the Union, and in our state constitution in defining our eastern boundary as the middle of the main channel of the river, referred to the bed in which the main stream of the river flowed, and not to the deep water of the stream, as followed in navigation. Big lake is in no sense a channel of the Mississippi river, and no question is made that it is wholly within the state of Iowa. It is a part of the river in the sense only that it is connected with it, and in every other respect it is as distinct a body of water as any which may be found in the interior of the state. On the one hand, the legislature prohibits seining in any of the waters of the state. On the other hand, it says, in effect, that this prohibition shall not extend to boundary waters over which the state has not exclusive jurisdiction. Such, we think, is the fair and proper construction of the law. The court below therefore erred in holding that Big lake was a part of the Mississippi river, and exempted from the operation of the law. The defendant having been acquitted, the only effect of this opinion will be to settle the law of the case.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming an order of a Special Term for New York County quashing a writ of certiorari taken to review the action of the commissioners of taxes in assessing for taxation the property of the relator corporation.

Affirmed in part; reversed in part.

Messrs. Bowers & Sands, for appellant:

The sum invested in this state by the relator was the surplus of its assets in this state after deducting the indebtedness incurred by it in the acquisition of such assets.

Williams v. Wayne County Suprs. 78 N. Y. 561; People v. Barker, 28 L. R. A. 95, 141 N. Y. 118; People v. Barker, 145 N. Y. 239.

The acquisition of property, and the payment therefor by a mortgage, are regarded as one and the same transaction, and all that the purchaser acquires is the equity or right of redemption.

The courts below have decided in this case that the relator shall not only be assessed upon the sum invested in this state, but upon all property it has acquired therein, and shall not be allowed a deduction for the debts incurred in the purchase or acquisition of such property. This decision is a discrimination amounting to confiscation against the relator, and is in violation of three of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States: art. 1, § 8; art. 4, § 2; art. 14, § 1.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The above relator obtained two writs of certiorari under chapter 269 of the Laws of 1880, for the purpose of reviewing the action of the above defendants in assessing the relator for all sums invested in its business in this state in the years 1893 and 1894, a separate writ having issued for each assessment. The defendants were commissioners of taxes and composed the board of taxes and assessments of the city and county of New York, and they made an assessment in each of the above years against the relator which is a foreign corporation having money invested in this state, such assessment being based upon the provisions of the Act, chapter 37 of the Laws of 1855, one section of which reads as follows: "All persons and associations doing business in the state of New York as merchants, bankers, or otherwise, either as principals or partners, whether special or otherwise, and not residents of this state, shall be assessed and taxed on all sums invested in any manner in said business the same as if they were residents of this state, and said taxes shall be collected from the property of the firms, persons, or associations to which they severally belong." The relator disputes the validity of each assessment. The defendants, in 1893, assessed the relator at a certain sum, after deducting that portion of its indebtedness which they decided had been incurred in this state in the purchase of property herein, and in 1894 they made an assessment without deducting any of the indebtedness of the relator whatever. The relator claims that the defendants, in 1893, did not deduct all its indebtedness which had been incurred in the purchase of property within this state, and that if they had done so, there would have been no assessment made against it here. It also claims that the assessment of 1894 was void because of the refusal of the defendants to make any deduction whatever for any indebtedness. The reason for the difference in the two assessments is based by the defendants upon the decision of this court in People v. Barker, reported in 141 N. Y. 118, 28 L. R. A. 95.

That case was decided here subsequent to the assessment of 1898 and prior to that of 1894. The defendants were of opinion that the decision in question covered this case and obliged them to assess the relator without making any deduction for any indebtedness whatever, even though such indebtedness, or some portion thereof, were incurred in the purchase of the assets in this state, for which the assessment of 1894 was made.

Prior to the time for finally making the assessment for each of the two years 1898 and 1894 respectively, the relator rendered to the defendants a verified written statement of the condition of the company as of the second Monday of January in each of such years. The statement of 1898 shows that the total gross assets in all parts of the world then belonging to the relator amounted to $4,615,826.07, and from that sum it was claimed should be deducted the amount assessed against it for its real estate, being $451,800, and the sum of $2,500,000 for bonds issued by it, and also $2,567,000 for further indebtedness incurred by it in the course of its business, thus claiming a total deduction for indebtedness (including the assessment for real estate) of $5,518,800, or almost a million dollars of debts over assets, and reducing the assessment of course to nothing.

It does not appear that any receiver of the company has been appointed or applied for, or that any proceedings have been taken or were contemplated for the winding up of what by this statement would appear to be a hopelessly insolvent concern. The president of the company was examined in regard to the assessment of 1898, before the commissioners, and he testified that the company was organized August 27, 1892, less than seven months prior to the making of this statement. The president further testified that the nominal capital was five millions of dollars, two millions of preferred and three millions of common stock. That $2,000 in cash were paid into the treasury for twenty shares of its capital stock at par, and that sum was paid out for corporation expenses. He was unable to state whether in issuing the stock at the time the company was organized it acquired anything beyond the tangible assets of the firm or parties whose property was purchased. The first meeting of the directors was held August 27, 1892, and at that meeting its bonds secured by mortgage were issued, and eight hundred and twenty of them of one thousand dollars each were sold for cash at par, and the money brought into New York and deposited in the bank with which the company did business, and was subsequently used for the purchase of merchandise used by the company. The question was then asked of him: "And the rest of the capital stock and the balance of the bonds were issued in exchange for real and personal property?" and he answered "Yes."

From this statement of 1898, and from the examination of the president of the company, it appears that all but $2,000 of its capital stock of $5,000,000, and the $2,500,000 of its bonds had been issued in exchange for property, real and personal, between the 27th day of August, 1892, and the second Monday of January, 1894, the cash for the $820,000 of bonds issued having been used for the purchase of merchandise. Further than this it appears that $2,567,000 of further indebtedness had been incurred upon its notes for borrowed money, loans to it on collateral and on bills for merchandise. This would make about $10,000,000 invested by the relator within this short period and yet it makes a statement that its total gross assets existing on the second Monday of January, 1898, amounted to but $4,615,826.07. No explanation is vouchsafed for these seemingly most unfortunate investments. It might, perhaps, be thought there was a mistake in the record from which I have quoted, and that the stock had in fact never been issued to any such amount. The statement for 1894 would seem to show that there was no mistake of that nature, for it is there stated that the entire share capital, except the twenty shares already spoken of, and the entire issue of bonds, except the 820 sold for cash, were exchanged for property. Ten millions of investments in five months, and at the end thereof less than five millions left! In January, 1895, its relative condition was about the same; its gross assets had shrunk from $4,615,826.07 to $3,466,919, being considerably over a million of dollars, but its indebtedness was less by $1,046,600.

And yet this (seemingly) insolvent corporation is paying interest on its bonded indebtedness and dividends upon its stock. These facts call for explanation. There is no doubt that the astute and able counsel for the city would have made the effort to obtain it had not the defendants proceeded upon the theory as to the tax of 1894 that the amount of indebtedness was in any aspect immaterial and the amount of assets in this state was sufficient for an assessment for 1894, which would be fair if no deduction for indebtedness were allowed. As to the assessment for 1898, in which there was some allowance for indebtedness, the relator claims that the entire face value of three of the items entering into that assessment, viz., for machinery and tools, office furniture and horses and trucks, making a total of over $800,000, should have been deducted in addition to the amount already allowed by the defendants for indebtedness incurred for the purchase of assets in this state. The decision of the defendants in this regard as to what amount of indebtedness was actually incurred in the purchase of the assets in this state in 1898 was made upon a question of fact, in regard to which the evidence on the part of the relator was by no means of that clear and convincing character which could leave no doubt as to the fact. The assessment itself depended also upon the different kinds of property making up the assets of the relator in this state, and it was not made at all plain as to what the real and true value of such assets was. We do not feel called upon to review and reverse the determination of the defendants as to the true amount for which the relator should be assessed for the year 1893. There was some evidence to support their determination, and that is sufficient for us. It is not plain that any erroneous theory of assessment was adopted.

The orders of the special and general terms will, therefore, as to that assessment, be affirmed.

We are now brought to the consideration of the assessment for 1894, founded upon People v. Barker, above referred to.

We think an erroneous use has been made of the decision of this court in that case, and that the assessment now before us for 1894 must be set aside. Upon another examination of the subject, carried on by the defendants' commissioners, a more thorough investigation may be made, so far as it shall appear necessary, for an accurate assessment against the relator for all sums invested by it in this state.

The question is as to the true construction to be given those words of the statute which provide that all persons nonresidents of the state and doing business herein "shall be assessed and taxed on all sums invested in any manner in said business the same as if they were residents of this state," etc. What is meant by the words "sums invested in any manner in said business?" The inquiry must of course be confined to the meaning of the words as used in this statute and for the purpose of an assessment upon such sums for taxation.

The case of People v. Barker held that a foreign company having assets in a foreign state could not invest some of its capital here and rightfully claim a deduction from such sum invested of all its indebtedness. That company admitted an investment here of at least $750,000, and its total indebtedness was over $1,200,000, consisting of open accounts and of bills payable. There was no claim set up as to the right specially to deduct the specific indebtedness arising upon the purchase of the very assets in New York in regard to which the assessment had been made. Very possibly language was used in that case in the course of the opinion which might be capable of a construction broader than was called for by the facts appearing in that record. If so, it would be but another illustration of the truth and importance of the principle which makes it necessary to construe the language used in judicial opinions strictly with reference to the facts which exist in the case which is decided. It was stated in that case that the court was of opinion that the act did not contemplate the deduction of debts from the sum invested in this state by nonresidents. As then applied, the language was appropriate, although it might well have been more definite and precise. That company had assets at its home office enough to permit a deduc-tion of all indebtedness asserted, and there was no claim that was argued that any of it had been incurred in the purchase of property in this state which formed the basis of the assessment. Under such circumstances we held, and, as we think, properly held, that the place for the deduction of general indebtedness was the residence of the person or corporation, and that the sum invested here should not be diminished by a deduction of any part of such general indebtedness. The question we are now to decide is, What is the sum invested in this state by a foreign corporation which purchases property here, and pays cash for a portion of it, and promises to pay the balance at some future day?

This relator is engaged in the business of milling in this state. Suppose it brought $100,000 into this state, and bought $200,000 worth of wheat to be manufactured into flour, and paid for it with the $100,000 in cash, and gave its notes for the balance. The ownership of the wheat passes to the relator by the purchase, and in that sense it can be said it owns wheat to the amount or value of $200,000. Has it, however, under this statute, invested in this state any sum beyond the $100,000 which it paid in cash for the wheat? Is its promise or liability to pay the other $100,000, a sum invested in this state by it, and is it the same as cash for the purpose of taxation? Is the fact that the company has in its possession as ostensible owner the $200,000 in value of wheat conclusive evidence that the company has invested that sum in its business in this state, when in truth it has paid a sum amounting to but half its value, and has promised to pay the balance at some future time? It seems to us there can be but one answer to these questions. The sum invested is the sum paid and not the sum which is promised to be paid on a future occasion. It is true the purchaser has in its possession as nominal owner, wheat to the value of $200,000, but it cannot be said to have invested within the meaning of this statute $200,000 in the purchase of the wheat as long as it has in fact paid but one half that sum and has simply promised to pay the other half at a future day.

No part of the value of the wheat is lost to taxation by this holding; neither is the sum so lost which was brought into the state by the relator and invested in the wheat. The vendor of the wheat is taxed for the $100,000 he has received as part payment for the same, and he is also taxed for the $100,000 of notes he has received from the purchaser of the wheat on account of the balance due for the purchase money, and the relator is taxed the $100,000 cash it has brought into the state and invested in this wheat, and there is thus an assessment of $300,000 made between these two, the vendor and the vendee of the wheat, and that is all the property that is then subject to taxation. To tax the full value of the wheat in the hands of the purchaser is in reality to tax the purchaser on its own indebtedness. Its promise to pay in the future the other $100,000 is not a sum invested by it here until it has redeemed its promise and paid its notes. The transaction is in truth substantially the same whether the payment has been secured by a chattel mortgage on the wheat or not, although if the payment have been thus secured, the purchaser has not even obtained an unincumbered title to the wheat until the payment is made. And so long as the property purchased has not been paid for in full, then the amount still due upon it ought to be deducted as not representing any sum invested by the purchaser in this state. Otherwise it is to say that the relator has invested a sum in this state by merely promising to do so at some future day. If after the purchase the wheat should appreciate, the whole of such appreciation would of course go towards swelling the amount invested by the relator in this state, and the contrary would be the case if it should depreciate; the indebtedness being a fixed quantity in both cases it would not be altered or affected by either event.

The same thing would happen in case the relator purchased the wheat and paid nothing for it, but gave its notes even without a mortgage for the whole amount. In such case the relator could not be said to have invested any sum in its business, assuming of course that the wheat was worth no more than its purchase price. Instead of paying, it had simply promised to pay for it. The vendor in such case would be assessed on the notes he took for the price of the wheat instead of for the wheat itself and the relator would not be assessed at all. This would be right because no more property had been created by the sale than existed before its consummation, and there would be an assessment levied for the full amount that had been levied before or which would have been levied if no sale had been made. The relator would not have invested any sum in its business until it paid something on its notes or until the property purchased had appreciated beyond the purchase price thereof. A gift of the property would be different. In that case while the relator would not have actually taken money or brought it into the state for investment and invested it in the property, yet it would have received the property as absolute owner with no outstanding liabilities to pay for it, and being in such case the owner of the property it would answer the description of a sum invested in its business and thus be liable to assessment under the act.

This treatment of the question is not in fact to be regarded in the light of a strict deduction of debts from assets; it is construed

ing the meaning of the statute and determining what in reality is the sum invested by a nonresident individual or corporation under these circumstances, in the business in which he or it is engaged in this state. It is not adjusting the equities as spoken of in People v. Barker, which we then held should be done at the place where the corporation was a resident. It is a different thing from ascertaining the general and gross assets of a nonresident to be found within the state, and from that sum deducting all its debts whenever and upon whatever cause incurred. The nonresident corporation investing a sum of money in this state is to be assessed for the full sum it invests here, although it may owe debts enough outside of such investment to render it insolvent. The indebtedness it has incurred in the transaction from which the purchase of the property is the result, is no part of the sum it has invested in such purchase and no assessment can be made which includes the amount of that indebtedness. But the stock which a corporation issues in payment for property is not a debt incurred by it. The scrip for the stock is merely a certificate to the holder to certify as to his interest in the property of the corporation, which interest is his share of the property that remains to it after the payment of all its debts.

Construing the statute as we do, it follows that the assessment of 1894 cannot stand. Upon a rehearing of the case by the assessors it will be most appropriate to endeavor to learn what kind of property was obtained in exchange for the stock, bonds, and notes of the company amounting to ten millions of dollars, where it is situated, how much it is in fact worth or what has become of it and how it has to the extent claimed disappeared or shrunk in value. It is a case which indeed calls for rigid examination and investigation to learn if possible how a corporation seemingly by its prepared statements insolvent, can go on and pay interest on its mortgage debt, dividends on its stock and keep clear of all hostile steps from its other creditors.

Our conclusion is that the orders of the General and Special Terms in relation to the assessment of 1893 must be affirmed, with costs, and those in regard to the assessment of 1894 must be reversed and the defendants directed to make a new assessment in conformity to the facts and to the views set forth in this opinion.

All concur.

Ordered accordingly.

*In 1886, Iola, a city of the third class, granted to the Iola Gas & Coal Company, its successors and assigns, the right to lay gas pipes and mains in the streets and public grounds for the purpose of supplying the city and its inhabitants with gas. No rates were prescribed, except that the company should not charge the city more than one dollar per 1,000 cubic feet of gas for lighting the public buildings. On September 12, 1889, the company, with the assent of the city, assigned all its rights and interests to W. S. Pryor and Joseph Paullin, their heirs and assigns, one of the conditions being that said assignees would furnish private families with gas at a price not exceeding $2.50 per stove per month and 40 cents per month per burner, for illuminating purposes; and for some years past said assignees have been furnishing natural gas to the city and its inhabitants. On May 10, 1895, the city enacted an ordinance providing, among other things, that it should be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation furnishing gas in said city to charge anything in excess of the prices therein fixed, which were very much lower than those named in the assignment, and lower than those collected from consumers.

Held, that said ordinance is inoperative and void as to said Pryor & Paullin, their heirs and assigns, in so far as the same purports to establish prices for gas furnished by them to private consumers.

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain petitioner's release from the city prison to which he had been committed to compel payment of a fine for violation of an ordinance of the city of Iola. Granted.

Statement by Martin, Ch. J.:

Iola is, and at all times hereinafter mentioned was, a city of the third class in Allen county. On July 1, 1886, an ordinance of said city, being No. 268, went into effect, purporting to grant to the Iola Gas & Coal Company, its successors and assigns, the right and privilege of laying and maintaining gas pipes and mains in the streets, avenues, alleys, parks, and public grounds of the city, for the purpose of supplying and conveying gas or other volatile substances for manufacturing, heating, lighting, fuel, domestic, and other purposes. No rates were prescribed, except that the company should not charge the city more than one dollar per 1,000 cubic feet of gas for lighting the public buildings. It was provided that the gas and coal company should file its written acceptance with the clerk within ten days, after which said ordinance should become a contract between the city and said gas and coal company. Within the time limited the company duly filed its acceptance. It expended a considerable sum in sinking gas wells, laying pipes, etc., but with indifferent success, the supply of natural gas not being adequate. On September 12, 1889, the gas and coal company, with the assent of the city, assigned its rights and privileges under said ordinance to W. S. Pryor and Joseph Paullin upon certain terms and conditions, one of which was that said assignees should furnish private families with gas at a rate not exceeding $2.50 per stove per month and forty cents per month per burner for illuminating purposes. Pryor & Paullin proceeded to sink other wells, and improve and extend the plant, and at length obtained an adequate supply of natural gas, which they have been furnishing to the city and its inhabitants at contract rates. On May 10, 1895, Ordinance No. 328 took effect by publication, the same purporting to authorize corporations, firms, companies, or individuals to lay and maintain pipes in the streets, avenues, alleys, lanes, and public grounds for the purpose of supplying said city and its inhabitants with natural gas for heating and illuminating purposes, and regulating the manner of laying such pipes, the kind and quality of same, and fixing the maximum rates to be charged the consumers of gas therefor, and providing penalties for the violation of the provisions of the ordinance. It was declared unlawful for any person to make collections for gas furnished without filing a written acceptance of the conditions of the ordinance, and the rates fixed for gas for the use of families were very much lower than those named in said assignment to Pryor & Paullin, and lower than they had been collecting from consumers. Pryor & Paullin have never filed any written acceptance of the terms of the ordinance, and they have no competitor in the business as yet. Complaint was made before the police judge that W. S. Pryor had collected from S. Bevington $1.50 for each of the months of June and July, 1895, for supplying a No. 8 cook stove, in violation of said Ordinance No. 328, which allowed only $1 per month; and he was convicted, and fined in the sum of $30 and $18 costs, and was ordered to be committed to the city prison until the fine and costs should be paid. He claims that such imprisonment is unlawful, and asks to be discharged therefrom.

Messrs. Campbell & Hankins, with Mr. C. E. Benton, for petitioner:

A municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers and no others: First, those granted in express words; second, those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 89; Anderson v. Wellington, 2 L. R. A. 110, 40 Kan. 176.

The statutes do not empower a city of the third class to pass the ordinance in question.

Jersey City*, 52 N. J. L. 65; State v. Hammond, 40 Minn. 48; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 392, 397, 398, and authorities cited.

The city is expressly authorized to make contracts with any person, company, or association to erect gas works in the said city.

The power to make a contract carries with it the power to make a valid contract; to make one which cannot be rescinded or annulled by one of the parties without the consent of the other.

Quincy v. Bull, 106 Ill. 337.

The contract gave to said company and its assigns the right to sell natural gas in the city of Iowa. This necessarily carries with it as an inevitable incident the right to fix the price of the gas sold.

State v. Laclede Gas Light Co. 102 Mo. 472.

When expensive works have been erected under and pursuant to a valid contract with the city, it has no power to take away the rights acquired under said contract or to impose onerous duties or conditions not required by the contract under which the works were constructed.

All ordinances passed in virtue of the implied power, or passed under the general authority to enact all such as will be necessary, must be reasonable or they will be void.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 319, 320.

Whether an ordinance is reasonable and consistent with the law or not, is ordinarily a question for the court.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 327; Olson v. Milwaukee, 80 Wis. 316.

Even if the city had the power to reduce the price of gas it would be unreasonable to permit it to do so at this time.

Columbus Water Co. v. Columbus, 15 L. R. A. 354, 48 Kan. 99.

In the following cases ordinances have been declared unreasonable and therefore void.

Anderson v. Wellington, 2 L. R. A. 110, 40 Kan. 178; Meyers v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 57 Iowa, 555, 48 Am. Rep. 50; Re Frazee, 63 Mich. 396; Hayes v. Appleton, 24 Wis. 542; State Center v. Barenstein, 66 Iowa, 249; Chumper v. Greencastle, 24 L. R. A. 768, 188 Ind. 839.

Mr. H. A. Ewing, for defendant:

Laws regulating gas companies and other corporations of like character to supply their customers at prices to be fixed by municipal authorities are within the scope of legislative power, unless prohibited by constitutional limitation or valid contract obligation.

Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 118, 24 L. ed. 77; Spring Valley Water Works v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 847, 28 L. ed. 173; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Cutts, 94 U. S. 155, 24 L. ed. 94; *Peik v. The state and city alike are utterly without power to make a contract that would infringe upon or barter away their police power.

Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. ed. 1079; Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. v. Richmond, 96 U. S. 521, 24 L. ed. 784; *Butchers Union, S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City, I. S. L. & S. H. The fact that large expense has been incurred, and further large expense will be incurred, in conforming to a reasonable and just ordinance to protect life and property, does not render the ordinance invalid or unreasonable.

Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 24 L. ed. 1036; Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 989; Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 645, 24 L. ed. 302.

All rights are held subject to the police power of the state.

Boyd v. Alabama, supra; Com. v. Certain Intoxicating Liquors, 115 Mass. 153; State v. Columbus Gas Light & Coke Co. 84 Ohio St. 580, 32 Am. Rep. 390.

The rights of the public are never presumed to be surrendered to a corporation unless the intention to surrender clearly appears in the law.

The right to further regulate corporations and fix prices and compel large expenditures of money, and indeed to go out of business in the interest of the public after a franchise had been granted, is upheld directly or on principle in the following cases:

Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 989; Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 24 L. ed. 1036; Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. Martin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question arising upon the record is whether the city of Iola had authority to fix the rates to be charged for natural gas furnished to private consumers by Pryor & Paullin under the circumstances above stated. In this country, municipal corporations (except the city of Washington) are the creatures of the states in which they are located. They derive their powers from the constitution and the statutes. In Anderson v. Wellington, 40 Kan. 176, 2 L. R. A. 110, this court has said: "The power to pass a city ordinance must be vested in the governing body of the city by the legislature in express terms, or be necessarily or fairly implied in and incident to the powers expressly granted, and must be essential to the declared purposes of the corporation; not simply convenient, but indispensable. . . . Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of the power is resolved by the courts against the corporations, and the power is denied." See also 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 89. The act providing for the organization and government of cities of the third class contains no express grant or power to fix or regulate the prices of gas, water, or any other article of necessity or luxury. General authority is given to enact ordinances for the good government and welfare of the city (Gen. Stat. 1889, pars. 958, 991), and such cities may provide for and regulate the lighting of streets, and they have power to make contracts with any person, company, or association to erect gas works, with the privilege of furnishing gas to light the streets, lanes, and alleys of the city for any length of time not exceeding twenty-one years. Id. par. 964. The respondent relies principally upon a section of the Corporation Law of 1868 relating to gas and water corporations, and published as paragraph 1401, Gen. Stat. 1889, which reads as follows: "Any gas or water corporation shall have full power to manufacture and sell and to furnish such quantities of gas or water as may be required by the city, town, or village where located, for public or private buildings or for other purposes; and such corporations shall have power to lay pipes, mains, and conductors for conducting gas or water through the streets, lanes, alleys, and squares in such city, town, or village, with the consent of the municipal authorities thereof and under such regulations as they may prescribe." Certainly there is no express power conferred upon the municipal authorities by this section to regulate the price of gas or water. Whether they might, as a condition of their consent, provide that gas or water should be furnished to the city or to its inhabitants at not exceeding certain prescribed rates, we need not now inquire. Consent was granted by Ordinance No. 268 to the Iola Gas & Coal Company, its successors and assigns, without annexing any condition as to rates, except that no more than one dollar per 1,000 cubic feet of gas should be charged for lighting the public buildings. In certain cases the state may fix and regulate the prices of commodities and the compensation for services, but this is a sovereign power, which may not be delegated to cities or subordinate subdivisions of the state, except in express terms, or by necessary implication. No such power is expressly conferred upon cities of the third class, and we do not think the right can be implied from any express provision, unless possibly that in the grant of consent to any person or corporation to so use the streets and public grounds of the city a condition might be imposed as to the maximum rates to be charged.

In Lewisville Natural Gas Co. v. State, 135 Ind. 49, 21 L. R. A. 784, it was held that municipal corporations of Indiana have no power at common law to fix by ordinance the price at which natural gas shall be supplied to consumers, and that the Act of March 7, 1887, providing "that the boards of trustees of towns, and the common councils of cities, . . . shall have power to provide, by ordinance, reasonable regulations for the safe supply, distribution, and consumption of natural gas within the respective limits of such towns and cities," does not confer the power to regulate the price at which natural gas shall be furnished; overruling the case of Rushville v. Rushville Natural Gas Co., 132 Ind. 575, 15 L. R. A. 831. In the opinion the court says: "To secure the safe supply and use of natural gas is one thing, and to fix the price at which gas shall be supplied is another and quite a different thing." In St. Louis v. Bell Teleph. Co., 96 Mo. 623, 2 L. R. A. 278, it was held that neither under its authority to regulate the use of streets, nor the power to license, tax, and regulate various professions and businesses, nor the general welfare clause permitting the passage of all such ordinances not inconsistent with the provisions of the charter or the laws of the state as may be expedient in maintaining the peace, good government, health, and welfare of the city, its trade, commerce, and manufactures, can the city of St. Louis regulate by ordinance the tariff of charges of a telephone company. In the opinion the court says: "We are at a loss to see what this power to regulate the use of the streets has to do with the power to fix telephone charges. The power to regulate the charges for telephone service is neither included in nor incidental to the power to regulate the use of streets, and the ordinance cannot be upheld on any such ground."

Under the section of our statute hereinbefore fully quoted a gas or water company may lay its pipes and mains through the streets of a city only with the consent of the municipal authorities, and under such regulations as they may prescribe; but the regulations are only as to the laying of pipes and mains, and have nothing to do with the price of the gas or water passing through the pipes, and supplied to consumers. Counsel for the respondent cite the leading case of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77, and others of like character, to the effect that, where the owner of property devotes it to a use in which the public have an interest, he must, to the extent of the interest thus acquired by the public, submit to the control of such property by the public for the common good. But in these cases the control was exercised by the legislature either directly or through municipalities or agencies clothed by it with the power.

In the present case the legislative authority is wanting. We must therefore hold that said Ordinance No. 368 is inoperative and void as to said Pryor & Paullin, their heirs and assigns, in so far as the same purports to establish the price for gas furnished by them to private consumers.

The petitioner will be discharged from custody.

All the Justices concur.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

BARBER ASPHALT PAVING CO., Pff.
in Err.,
v.

City of HARRISBURG.

(64 Fed. Rep. 283.)

A city having the power to pave streets and pay therefor from its treasury is liable for the cost of paving under a contract providing that assessments shall be accepted by the contractor in payment, and that the city shall not be otherwise liable under the contract, whether the assessments are collectible or not, where the statute under which they are made is held invalid and the assessments are therefore without authority, as the contract contemplates valid charges on the property, and failure to make the required assessments renders the city in default upon the contract.

(November 13, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to compel payment of the contract price for paving a certain street in defendant city. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Before Acheson, Circuit Judge, and Butler and Wales, District Judges.

Messrs. Charles H. Bergner, George Frederick Keene, and A. S. Worthington, for plaintiff in error:

The true construction of the contract in question is that the city of Harrisburg was to make an assessment and assign the claims based thereon to the Barber Company, and that the contractor in stipulating that, upon receiving such claims, it would assume the risks of collecting the same, did not agree to bear the loss that might result from failure on the part

NOTE.—The effect of contract to take assessments as the mode of compensation for performance of a contract for a public improvement has become an important question, but the above case seems to be the first on the exact point there decided.

When this contract was made the city of Harrisburg was authorized by law to pave Market street at its own expense, and it is universally held that when in such a case a municipal corporation employs a contractor on public improvements, and he agrees to look solely to the proceeds of special assessments for his compensation, the city is liable if it turns out that it was without authority to make any valid assessment, unless it further appears that the city was required by law as a condition of its liability to comply with certain conditions precedent and has failed to do so.

Mr. William H. Middleton for defendant in error.

Butler, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, a citizen of West Virginia, and the defendant, of Pennsylvania, entered into a contract on August 13, 1887, which contained the following provisions:

"The said The Barber Asphalt Paving Company to furnish all tools, implements, materials, and labor, and complete to the satisfaction of the city engineer of the city of Harrisburg all such work as may be requisite to pave and curb Market street from the eastern curb line of Front street to the Pennsylvania Railroad; to begin the work under this contract upon five days' notice from the city engineer and complete the same within ninety days from the commencement of said work. The pavement to be laid as aforesaid under this contract to consist of a cement concrete base at least six inches thick, covered with a wearing surface of asphaltum at least two and a half inches thick; the curbing to be of granite; the materials to be of the very best kind obtainable, and the pavement to be laid and all the work to be done thereon in accordance with the plans and specifications prepared by the city engineer, and hereto attached, which plans and specifications are hereby made part of this contract.

"And the city of Harrisburg, on its part, will pay to the said the Barber Asphalt Paving Company in accordance with the specifications and out of the assessments made and levied for the purpose, the following prices: For each and every square yard of pavement laid under this contract, the sum of two dollars and seventy-five cents ($2.75), for each and every lineal foot of granite curbing the sum of one dollar and fifty cents ($1.50), but only upon the measurements of the city engineer, and at such intervals and in such installments as he may determine.

"It is also understood and agreed that the payments aforesaid provided for shall be paid as follows: First, out of the amount of the assessments paid into the city treasury by the property owners, and when that fund is exhausted, then the city of Harrisburg will assign to the said the Barber Asphalt Paving Company, the municipal claims assessed and levied upon the properties abutting on and along the said Market street between the points above mentioned, or mark the same of record to the use of the said company, and also permit the use of the corporate name of the said city in any legal proceedings necessary or proper to enforce the collection of the said assessments.

"It is also understood and agreed that the 29 L. R. A.

said company shall accept the said assessments in payment of the amount due it under this contract, and the city shall not be otherwise liable under this contract whether the said assessments are collectible or not."

The plaintiff performed its part of the contract, and received on account $18,470.59, paid from assessments, leaving $21,729.93 of the contract price unsatisfied.

At the date of the contract the defendant had authority to pave its streets, and pay for the same from its treasury. It believed it had authority also to assess the cost of such paving on abutting properties, and transfer the obligations thus created in payment for the work. The plaintiff had no reason to doubt the correctness of this belief. The legislature by an Act of May 24, 1887, had provided for such assessments. The supreme court of the state, however, after the work had been completed, declared the act invalid. Shoemaker v. Harrisburg, 122 Pa. 285; Berghaus v. Harrisburg, 122 Pa. 289; Ayers' App. 122 Pa. 266, 2 L. R. A. 577.

The defendant went through the form of making assessments; and the property holders paid $13,470.59, before the invalidity of the statute was discovered. They refused, however, to pay more; and, the defendant denying liability for the balance due under the contract, this suit was commenced to recover it.

On demurrer filed to the plaintiff's statement the circuit court rendered judgment for the defendant; whereupon the plaintiff appealed, and assigned this action of the court as error.

Is the defendant liable? The suit is on the contract, and the liability must be found in it, if at all.

As we have seen the defendant had power to contract for paving its streets, at the cost of its treasury. It did not, however, so contract in terms. Is it liable to pay from this source in consequence of the terms used and the facts stated? It undertook to pay the price specified by assessments, and the plaintiff agreed to accept these in discharge of its claim, adding that "the city shall not be otherwise liable whether the assessments be collectible or not." Omitting the language just quoted, there could be no doubt of the defendant's liability. The case would be identical, in all respects, with Hitchcock v. Galveston, 96 U. S. 341, 24 L. ed. 659. The language quoted does not however, we think, add anything to the force or effect of that which precedes it. It simply expresses what would be implied in its absence. The agreement to accept the assessments in payment relieved the city from liability to pay otherwise. By it the plaintiff assumed the risk of collecting. If the defendant, in such case, had made and transferred the contemplated assessments, it would have discharged its entire obligation; just as it would in the present case. This, however, it has not done. Its attempt to do it failed; its acts in this respect were a nullity. It is immaterial that the failure resulted from want of authority—as it would be if it resulted from any other cause beyond its control. It undertook, unconditionally, to make and transfer assessments, and its failure is a breach of the contract. To say its obligation is discharged by a vain attempt to make them; that the plaintiff is bound to accept useless forms of assessments, is unreasonable. The parties contemplated valid charges on the property. The term "assessment" clearly implies this; nothing short of a lawful assessment—one capable of enforcement, satisfies it. It was such assessments the plaintiff agreed to accept, and assumed the risk of collecting. The parties were mutually mistaken respecting the authority to pay in the special manner designated; but this does not relieve the defendant from its obligation to pay.

If anything is wanting to render this construction clearer, it may be found in the fact that the language involved is taken, word for word, from the statute, and must necessarily signify here what it does there. There the term "assessment" signifies, and can only signify, a proceeding which creates a charge on the property specified. The statute first provides for this proceeding and charge, and then for its transfer to the contractor. It is this charge which is to be transferred, and which the contractor is to assume the risk of collecting. There is always some risk attending such collections. Prior liens, or other causes, may render the property insufficient to pay. And this only is the risk the statute, and the contract made under it, contemplated.

The defendant having failed to make the required assessments is in default upon its contract, and must make reparation by paying the consequent loss. There is no hardship in it, and if there was it would afford no justification or excuse for shifting it to the plaintiff. The defendant has received full value for what he is required to pay; and if the contract admitted of another construction we would strongly incline to the one adopted, because it is not only consistent with the intention of the parties, but avoids the great injustice of allowing the defendant to hold and enjoy the plaintiff's property without paying for it.

There is abundant authority for this construction. Hitchcock v. Galveston, 96 U. S. 341, 24 L. ed. 659, is in point. The city contracted with Hitchcock to do certain work upon its streets, for which he was to accept its bonds in payment. It had, however, no authority to issue the bonds, and, discovering this while the work was in progress, stopped it and declined to pay for what was done, on the ground that the contractor had bound himself to depend upon this source of payment alone. The court, deciding that the contract contemplated and required valid bonds, and that the city had failed to furnish such, held the contract broken, and the city liable to pay from its treasury. In principle this case is not distinguishable from the one before us. The court says: "It is enough for them that the city council have power to enter into a contract for the improvement of the sidewalks; that such a contract was made with them; that under it they have proceeded to furnish materials and do work, as well as to assume liabilities; that the city has received and now enjoys the benefit of what they have done and furnished; that for these things the city promised to pay, and that after having received the benefit of the contract the city has broken it. It matters not that the promise was to pay in a manner not authorized by law. If payments cannot be made in bonds because their issue is ultra vires, it would be sanctioning rank injustice to hold that payment need not be made at all."

White v. Snell, 5 Pick. 425; Hussey v. Sibley, 66 Me. 192, 22 Am. Rep. 557; Miller v. Milwaukee, 14 Wis. 700; Bill v. Denver, 29 Fed. Rep. 344,—involved the same question, and were similarly decided. In Chicago v. People, 56 Ill. 327; Maher v. Chicago, 58 Ill. 272; Louisville v. Hyatt, 5 B. Mon. 200; Fisher v. St. Louis, 44 Mo. 482, and Scofield v. Council Bluffs, 68 Iowa, 695,—the contractor distinctly agreed to look to assessments alone for payment; and yet the municipalities, having no authority to make them, were held liable to pay otherwise.

The numerous authorities cited by the defendant are not inconsistent with this construction. Peake v. New Orleans, 139 U. S. 342, 35 L. ed. 181, is based upon an essentially different state of facts. The city was not a party to the contract sued on, and in no wise responsible for it. The work was done under a scheme devised by the state legislature, and under a contract with officers designated by it, for the drainage of swamp lands, (a part only of which was within the city limits) for the benefit, primarily, of its owners. A careful examination of this case will show that it rests exclusively on these facts—though the last paragraph of the syllabus, read alone, would justify a different conclusion.

Horter v. Philadelphia, 18 W. N. C. 40, and Dickinson v. Philadelphia, 14 W. N. C. 367, as we understand them, rest on the same principle. In the first the improvement was made under the State Statute of 1855, which provides that the cost of such work shall be borne by adjoining property holders. There was no authority, as it seems, to put it on the city. While the opinion of the court, and report of the case, are very brief, the decision appears to rest on this ground. If it were otherwise the case would be in direct conflict with Chicago v. People, 56 Ill. 327. In Dickinson v. Philadelphia, 14 W. N. C. 367, the city appears to have had no connection whatever with the work. The statute under which it was done designated an officer to do it, empowering him to make contracts and collect money to pay the cost. That he held the office of city commissioner of highways is immaterial; he was the agent of the state in discharging his duties under the statute. Here again the opinion of the court is very brief, and the report of the case so meager, that it was necessary to examine the records to understand what was decided—which we found to be no more than just stated.

The numerous other cases cited are equally inapplicable. In Bellevue Trustees v. Hohn, 82 Ky. 1, the municipality was without authority to pay except by assessments on adjoining properties. Saxton v. St. Joseph, 60 Mo. 153, rests on the city's want of power to contract as it did. Casey v. Leavenworth, 17 Kan. 189, was decided on the fact that the city had kept its contract, by collecting and applying the assessments named, with reasonable vigilance. Newman v. Sylvester, 42 Ind. 108, was a suit against individuals, and is inapplicable to the facts involved here. (Other cases cited may be distinguished as easily.)

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the case remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS

John H. SHORT, Appt.,

v.

STATE of Maryland.

A constitutional provision against a "levying of taxes by the poll" is not violated by a statute which was substantially in force when the constitution was adopted compelling able-bodied male residents between twenty and fifty years of age to labor two days at least annually in repairing the roads, with the privilege of furnishing a substitute or paying seventy-five cents per day instead.

I. What are poll taxes.

A capitation or poll tax is defined to be a tax on the poll without regard to property, business, or other circumstances, in Hylton v. United States (1796) 3 U. S. 3 Dall. 171, 1 L. ed. 556; Head Money Cases (1883) 18 Fed. Rep. 135; Leedy v. Bourbon (1895) (Ind.) 40 N. E. Rep. 640.

So in State v. Gazlay (1831) 5 Ohio, 14, poll or capitation taxes are defined to be taxes imposed numerically upon citizens without reference to their capacity of sustaining the burden.

And in Gardner v. Hall (1866) 61 N. C. 21, a capitation tax is defined to be one upon the person simply, without any reference to his property, real or personal, or to any business in which he may be engaged, or to any employment which he may follow.

A tax paid by a person in consequence of his ownership of property, of a license to follow a trade or profession, or of making profits by the use of money or other thing granted to him either in writing or orally by the state, or by the permission of the state, either expressed or implied, is not a capitation or poll tax. Dictum in Gardner v. Hall, supra.

There is a clear distinction between a tax on certain specified classes of business where the skill of the operator is a source of profit, or where the public is appealed to for patronage and protection of a fixed and regular business, and a tax covering all persons whatever may be their occupation. Dictum in Burch v. Savannah (1871) 42 Ga. 506.

Thus, in Williams' Case (1840) 2 Bland, Ch. 186, it was said that a tax of so much a head on every slave is properly a tax upon the profits of a certain species of stock employed in agriculture and not a capitation tax, and as a greater part of the slave owners are both cultivators and owners of land, the final payment of the tax would fall upon them in their quality of land owners without any retribution.

So a succession tax is not a capitation exaction. Scholey v. Hew (1874) 90 U. S. 22 Wall. 331, 23 L. ed. 99. 29 L. R. A.

And the tax on "dead heads" applied to persons other than the president, directors, officers, agents, or employes of a railroad company who are permitted to travel on the road without paying fare, imposed by North Carolina Act of 1860, chap. 31, § 12, is not a poll tax within the provisions of N. C. Const. 1868, art. 4, § 3, providing for their imposition, but a mere tax upon the privilege of a free ride. Gardner v. Hall (1866) 61 N. C. 21.

So a tax of a fixed sum upon all passengers leaving or carried out of the state is not a poll tax within the provision of Nevada Const., art. 2, § 7, limiting the right of the legislature to levy poll taxes as to amount and as to the persons upon whom imposed. Ex parte Crandall (1895) 1 Nev. 204.

And the duty of fifty cents for each passenger, not a citizen of the United States, who comes by steam or sail vessel from a foreign port to a port within the United States, required to be paid by the master, owner, agent, or consignee of every such vessel by the Act of Congress of August 3, 1882, is not a capitation tax, required by article 1, section 9, of the Federal Constitution to be laid in proportion to the census, but a tax upon the business of the carrier measured by the number of such passengers, though the presumption may be that he will make the passenger pay the tax. Head Money Cases (1868) 18 Fed. Rep. 136.

Nor does Ohio Act of March 31, 1864, providing that all persons subject to military duty, and who are not members of some volunteer organization, shall either become such or pay into the county treasury annually the sum of $4, which payment shall be a commutation for fines and penalties for neglect to perform military service, conflict with Ohio Const., art. 12, § 1, prohibiting the levying of poll taxes, as such commutation is not a tax but a mere instrumentality for the enforcement of military duty. Houston v. Wright (1864) 15 Ohio St. 318.

Neither are taxes upon professions and occupations of skill as taxes upon lawyers, doctors, photographers, auctioneers, bank agents, wholesale and retail dealers, peddlers, etc., poll taxes. Dictum in Burch v. Savannah (1871) 42 Ga. 506.

And taxes of a fixed amount imposed upon lawyers are designed to operate upon the profits of a lucrative profession, and are not poll or capitation taxes within the provision of the Ohio Constitution prohibiting their levy. State v. Gazlay (1831) 5 Ohio, 14.

So in State v. Hibbard (1837) 3 Ohio, 63, the action was for debt to recover a tax assessed upon a practicing attorney and counsellor at law, but as no APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Dorchester County imposing upon him a fine for refusal to comply with a notification of the supervisors of public roads to labor upon the roads in Fork district for the time required by statute. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George M. Russum and S. T. Milbourne for appellant.

Messrs. John Prentiss Poe, Atty-Gen., and P. L. Goldsborough, for respondent:

Every parish is bound of common right to keep the highroads that go through it in good and sufficient repair; unless by reason of the tenure of lands, or otherwise, this care is consigned to some particular private person. From this burthen no man was exempt by our ancient laws, whatever other immunities he might enjoy; this being part of the trinoda necessitas, to which every man's estate was subject.

1 Bl. Com. 358, 359.

The obligation to repair the public roads in Maryland rests upon the county commissioners.

Anne Arundel County Comrs. v. Duckett, 20 Md. 468, 88 Am. Dec. 557; Orlvert County Comrs. v. Gibson, 36 Md. 229; Baltimore County Comrs. v. Baker, 44 Md. 1.

The burden of improving and repairing the common highways of the country, except in the urban districts, is generally laid upon the people in the form of an assessment of labor.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. *629, 690; Cooley, Taxn. p. 14; Dill. Mun. Corp. 676, 760-argument was adduced on either side judgment was given for the recovery of the tax sub silentio.

But State v. Hibbard, supra, is referred to in State v. Gazlay, supra, as having been decided upon the same principle as that upon which the latter case turned.

So an assessment of road labor which may be commuted by payment of a specified rate per day is not a capitation tax, from the imposition of which persons over sixty years of age are exempted by Illinois Const., art. 1, § 9. Fox v. Rockford (1865) 88 Ill. 451.

And the highway labor required of men between twenty-one and fifty years of age, by Burns' Ind. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 6819, is not in the nature of a poll tax so that an exemption from poll taxes will apply thereto, but rather in the nature of a military or jury service. Leedy v. Bourbon (1896) (Ind.) 40 N. E. Rep. 640.

And road labor is not a tax so that a statute exempting a director of public schools from working on the roads will operate to exempt him from a road tax assessed upon his property. McDonald v. Madison County (1897) 43 Ill. 22.

Neither is the imposition of labor for road purposes on individuals irrespective of property a tax within the provision of Ill. Const., art. 9, § 5, that taxes levied for corporate purposes shall be uniform as to persons and property within the corporate limits. Pleasant v. Kost (1893) 29 Ill. 490.

And an assessment of a designated fixed number of days' road labor, which may be satisfied by the payment of a fixed sum in lieu thereof, is not a capitation tax within Ill. Const. 1848, art. 9, § 1, providing for the imposition of a capitation tax upon all able-bodied, free white male inhabitants of the state between the ages of twenty-one and sixty years of age who are entitled to the right of suffrage. Macomb v. Twaddle (1879) 4 Ill. App. 254.

Nor is the burden imposed on land owners by the Louisiana parochial road laws requiring them to repair at their own expense the roads in front of their property a tax within the meaning of a constitutional limitation upon municipal power to impose taxes. Barrow v. Hepler (1892) 34 La. Ann. 262.

And Ohio Rev. Stat., § 4717, providing that designated persons shall be liable annually to perform two days' labor on the highways under the direction of the road supervisor of the road district in which he resides, does not conflict with the provision of the Ohio constitution by which the general assembly is forbidden to levy a poll tax for county or state purposes. Dennis v. Simon (1894) 51 Ohio St. 233.

And the performance of labor on the highways by the person against whom it is assessed is not the payment of a tax within the meaning of the 29 L. R. A.

New York Act of 1801, chapter 184, providing that persons coming to inhabit a town or city, who shall have paid their share toward the public taxes thereof for two years, shall be adjudged to have obtained a legal settlement therein, the word "taxes" meaning contributions in money, not labor or personal services. Amenia Overseers of Poor v. Stanford Overseers (1810) 6 Johns. 92.

So in Starksborough v. Hinesburgh (1841) 13 Vt. 215, the question whether the assessment and payment of a highway tax in labor would be sufficient to give a settlement to the person taxed under Vermont Act of 1797 was raised but not decided. But the court said that had it been necessary to decide it perhaps the same construction would have been given the statute as that given in Amenia Overseers of Poor v. Stanford Overseers, supra.

And a commutation street tax of $3 in lieu of working on the streets is not a poll tax and is not obnoxious to a constitutional prohibition against levying poll taxes. Johnston v. Macon (1879) 69 Ga. 645.

And in Pleasant v. Kost (1893) 29 Ill. 490, it was said that an assessment for street and highway purposes is not a capitation tax.

And in Re Daesler (1896) 35 Kan. 678, it was said that a commutation of road labor in money, while in the nature of a tax, is not in common speech, or in customary revenue legislation, understood as embraced in the term.

In Faribault v. Misener (1874) 20 Minn. 396, however, it was said that the poll tax which is levied and collected in most of the cities of the state is closely analogous to, and seems to be to some extent a substitute for, the highway labor tax, or the highway poll tax as it may be called, which from the earliest times has been levied and assessed upon the inhabitants of townships under general laws.

And in Hassett v. Walls (1874) 9 Nev. 337, it was held that the annual road tax of $4 imposed upon designated persons by Nevada Highway Act of 1873 (Comp. Laws, § 3027), providing also that two days' labor shall be received in full satisfaction of such tax, is a capitation or poll tax within the meaning of the provision of the Nevada Constitution, art. 2, § 7, designating what poll taxes may be levied, whether regarded as a levy of money or services.

The court in Hassett v. Walls, supra, flatly refused to follow Sawyer v. Alton, infra; Pleasant v. Kost, supra, and Fox v. Rockford, supra, saying that were the law of Nevada like that of Illinois, which requires labor and allows it to be commuted into money, while Nevada levies a money tax but allows commutation in labor, the conclusion would be the same. Either is and both are capitation or poll taxes; one in money; the other in service.

762; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 7; Burroughs, Taxn. §§ 5, 9; 1 Minor, Inst. 2d ed. p. 115; State v. Halifax Comrs. 15 N. C. 847; Sawyer v. Alton, 4 Ill. 180; Pleasant v. Kost, 29 Ill. 494; Cooper v. Ash, 76 Ill. 11; Tipton v. Norman, 72 Mo. 890; Johnston v. Macon, 82 Ga. 645; Miller v. Gorman, 38 Pa. 811; Starksborough v. Hinesburgh, 18 Vt. 215; Amenia Overseers of Poor v. Stanford Overseers, 6 Johns. 92; Baltimore v. Green Mount Cemetery Props. 7 Md. 531.

Neither is taxation for a public purpose, however great, the taking of private property for public use in the sense of the constitution.

Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 708, 26 L. ed. 241; Moale v. Baltimore, 5 Md. 820, 61 Am. Dec. 276; Groff v. Frederick City, 44 Md. 77.

II. Power to impose.

In Gardner v. Hall (1886) 61 N. C. 21, it was said that poll taxes are rightfully imposed because of the protection which the government affords to the person, independently of the connection in relation of the person to anything else.

And statutes imposing them are usually upheld in the absence of direct constitutional prohibition.

Thus Mass. Stat. 1852, chap. 301, making persons having their domicile in Boston on the first day of January subject to taxation therein including poll taxes on the first day of May, although they may have removed therefrom before that time, is within the constitutional power of the legislature. Lee v. Boston (1854) 2 Gray, 484.

So Minn. Const., art. 9, § 1, providing that all taxes to be raised shall be as nearly equal as may be, does not prohibit taxation by the poll as it had always been practiced in that state. Faribault v. Misener (1874) 20 Minn. 306.

And a city charter exempting firemen from the payment of poll taxes and an ordinance directing the levy and assessment of a poll tax upon all qualified voters except such as are exempt by the provisions of the charter, are not repugnant to that provision of the Minnesota constitution. Ibid.

This ruling was placed in part upon the ground that the long-continued acquiescence of the people in the laws under which poll taxes have been collected throughout the states has established a legislative and popular construction of the constitutional provision in favor of their validity. Ibid.

So in East Portland v. Multnomah County (1876) 6 Or. 63, it was held that a city charter which exempts the inhabitants of the city from road taxes and assessment for road work, and vests authority in the trustees to assess and collect the annual sum of $4 from each male inhabitant of a designated age, does not violate Or. Const., art. 9, § 1, providing that the legislative assembly shall provide a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation; but nothing was said as to whether or not the impositions were poll taxes.

And this ruling was followed in Astoria v. Clatsop County (1877), cited in note to 6 Or. 63, and Multnomah County v. Shiker (1881) 10 Or. 65, both involving the same facts.

And in Ottawa County Comrs. v. Nelson (1877) 19 Kan. 224, 27 Am. Rep. 101, it was said that capitation taxes or poll taxes or requirements to work on the roads do not come within the constitutional provisions requiring a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation.

In Taylor v. Chandler (1872) 9 Heisk. 349, however, involving the question of the rights to impose local assessments for paving a street under the provision of the Tennessee constitution requiring taxes to be imposed on the principle of uniformity and equal-

Nor can it be justly treated as a poll tax within the meaning of the 15th article of the Bill of Rights.

Robinson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By the Public Local Laws for Dorchester county, all able-bodied male residents of the county, above twenty and under fifty years of age, are compelled to labor two days at least in every year in repairing the roads of

ity, it was said that the constitution does not include the exaction of services from an individual in the power to tax, and that the principle of uniformity and equality excludes the power to tax on any other principle either for general or local purposes.

So in Nance, a Girl of Color, v. Howard (1828) 1 Ill. 183, it was said that the provision of Ill. Const., art. 8, § 20, that the mode of levying a tax shall be by valuation, so that every person shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of the property in his possession, would seem to inhibit poll taxes.

But a different rule seems to have been adopted by the subsequent decisions.

Thus in Sawyer v. Alton (1841) 4 Ill. 127, it was held that the imposition of a poll or capitation tax is not prevented by that provision the requirement applying to property taxes and not preventing the imposition of other kinds.

And a charter provision that the common council shall have the exclusive right to call on all male persons between the ages of twenty-one and fifty years, residents of the city, to perform three days' labor on the roads and bridges annually or pay $1 for each day he shall refuse to labor, does not contravene that provision. Sawyer v. Alton, supra.

Nor does a similar charter provision conflict with article 9, section 2, of the Constitution of 1848, requiring the general assembly to provide for the levying taxes by valuation so that every person shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his property. Macomb v. Twaddle (1879) 4 Ill. App. 254.

So the provision of the Missouri constitution that taxation upon property shall be in proportion to its value, does not prohibit the imposition of poll taxes. Dictum in Glasgow v. Rowse (1890) 43 Mo. 430.

And New Jersey Law of 1883, providing that there shall not be assessed upon any inhabitant of this state any poll tax for any of the purposes provided for in any special or local law in excess of $1, is not a special or local law which cannot be passed without notice of the intention to apply for it under the provisions of the New Jersey constitution, where there had previously existed local laws authorizing counties, cities, and townships to assess special poll taxes in amounts ranging from $1 to $25 per head. State v. Essex County Board of Chosen Freeholders (1884) 45 N. J. L. 504.

So the performance of labor for the repair of highways and streets upon an assessment or levy payable in labor is not involuntary servitude within the prohibition against its imposition in the federal and state constitutions. Re Dasser (1866) 35 Kan. 678.

And road assessments or levies are not debts within the meaning of the constitutional provision abolishing imprisonment for debt. Ibid.

said county, with the privilege, however, of furnishing a substitute, or of paying to the road supervisor seventy-five cents for each day such person may be summoned to labor, the money thus paid to be expended in repairing the roads. And it further provides that any one neglecting or refusing to perform such labor, or to provide a substitute, or to pay seventy-five cents per day for each and every day he may be summoned to work, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon trial and conviction before a justice of the peace, shall be fined seventy-five cents for each day's delinquency and costs, and shall stand committed until the fine and costs are paid. Pub. Local Laws, art. 10, §§ 268-270, title 'Dorchester County.' And the act further provides that any one aggrieved by the judgment of the justice of the peace may appeal to the circuit court. The main question, and the only one it seems to us about which there can be any real contention, is whether this local law is in conflict with the constitution, which declares "that the levying of taxes by the poll is grievous and oppressive and ought to be prohibited." Const. 1867, Declaration of Rights, art. 15. And, in construing the meaning of this article, we must bear in mind that the same declaration is to be found in the Constitution of 1776, and in every constitution adopted in this state down to the Constitution of 1867. So the question comes to this: Is compulsory labor imposed upon persons residing in the several election districts of a county, for the purpose of keeping the roads in repair,

And the assessment payable in road labor on the highways and streets provided for by Kan. Stat. 1881, chap. 37, is not a tax or an embargo upon the right to vote, though the list of registration is used in ascertaining who are liable to work upon the streets. Ibid.

So in Loughborough v. Blake (1880) 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 317, 5 L. ed. 98, it was said that the power to levy and collect taxes, which includes direct taxes, is co-extensive with the power to levy and collect duties, imposts, and excises which extends throughout the United States including the District of Columbia and the territories. But there was nothing in this case to show whether the tax was or was not a poll tax.

The power of congress to levy direct taxes upon the District of Columbia does not depend solely upon the grant of exclusive legislation, and is not confined to district purposes only in like manner as the legislature of a state may tax the people of the state for state purposes. Loughborough v. Blake, supra.

And the principle of American jurisprudence that representation is inseparable from taxation does not prevent the imposition by congress of direct taxes upon the District of Columbia and the territories. Ibid.

III. Restrictions and limitations.

Poll taxes have not always been regarded with favor and the power to impose them has been frequently limited and restrained by constitutional provisions.

Thus a constitutional provision in Arkansas inhibits poll taxes except for county purposes. Dictum in Washington v. State (1858) 18 Ark. 752.

And Ga. Const., art. 1, § 29, prohibits poll taxes except for educational purposes, and limits them even for that purpose to $1 per poll. Burch v. Savannah (1871) 42 Ga. 506.

So Maryland Declaration of Rights, art. 13, declares that the levying taxes by the poll is grievous and oppressive and ought to be abolished. Williams' Case (1840) 3 Bland, Ch. 186.

And the bill of rights of Ohio provides that the levying taxes by the poll is grievous and oppressive; therefore the legislature shall never levy a poll tax for county or state purposes. Dictum in Faribault v. Misener (1874) 20 Minn. 390.

And Nev. Const., art. 2, § 7, directing the legislature to provide by law for the payment of an annual poll tax of not less than $2, nor exceeding $4, by each male person resident in the state between the ages of twenty-one and sixty years, one half to be applied for state and one half for county purposes, limits the power of the legislature to the imposition of the poll tax therein provided and precludes the imposition of any other. Hassett v. Walls (1874) 9 Nev. 387.

So the Federal Constitution provides that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census therein directed to be taken. Hylton v. United States (1796) 3 U. S. 8 Dall. 171, 1 L. ed. 558; Loughborough v. Blake (1880) 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 317, 5 L. ed. 98; Springer v. United States (1880) 102 U. S. 587, 26 L. ed. 258.

And that a capitation or poll tax is a direct tax within the Federal Constitution has been repeatedly asserted. Hylton v. United States, supra; Pacific Ins. Co. v. Soule (1868) 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 453, 25 L. ed. 96; Veazie Bank v. Fenno (1869) 78 U. S. 5 Wall. 533, 19 L. ed. 482; Springer v. United States, supra.

Indeed by the express words of the constitution they are direct taxes required to be laid according to the census therein required to be taken. Dictum in Scholey v. Rew (1874) 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 331, 23 L. ed. 90.

The census referred to in the provision of the Federal Constitution that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census therein provided for, is the one required in the provision of the constitution making numbers the standard by which both representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the states. Loughborough v. Blake, supra.

The Federal Constitution, art. 1, § 20, providing that representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states which may be included in the union according to their number, does not prevent the imposition of a direct tax according to such apportionment upon the District of Columbia or upon the territories. Ibid.

And though that provision makes it obligatory upon congress to lay a direct tax upon all of the states conformably with the rule thus provided, it creates no necessity for extending the tax to the District of Columbia or the territories. Ibid.

IV. The restriction and equation of the North Carolina constitution.

The North Carolina Constitution, arts. 5, 6, limit the right to impose capitation taxes for ordinary purposes, state and county, to $2 on the poll, and provide that counties cannot exceed the double of the state tax except for special purposes and with the special approval of the general assembly. Bladen County Board of Education v. Bladen County Comrs. (1892) 18 L. R. A. 360, 111 N. C. 578.

And section 1, article 5, thereof, providing that the capitation tax shall be equal to the tax on $300 worth of property, and that the state and county capitation taxes combined shall never exceed $2 on the head, creates a proportion which the capitation tax must bear to the tax on the value of property and makes the tax on the poll the standard by which the tax on property is to be levied. University R. Co. v. Holden (1899) 68 N. C. 410.

with the privilege of providing a substitute or the payment of a stipulated sum in lieu of such personal service, a "levying of taxes by the poll," within the meaning of the constitution? Such compulsory labor is, beyond question, a burden on the persons upon whom it is imposed, and though it assumes the form of labor, it may be fairly considered, we agree, in the nature of a tax. At the same time, when this article in the bill of rights is construed in the light of the legislation in regard to levying taxes by the poll in force when the Constitution of 1776 was adopted, and in the light of the legislation in regard to compulsory labor on the public roads, also in force at that time, and which has continued in force down to the present, it is clear, we think, that compulsory labor for the purpose of keeping the roads in repair has never been considered as a poll tax prohibited by the constitution. A brief reference to the legislation in force when the Constitution of 1776 was adopted will clearly show, we think, the nature and character of

This equation and limitation would seem to apply to all taxes other than for special purposes expressly excepted in the constitutional provision, except those imposed for some particular purpose the accomplishment of which is absolutely and imperatively required by the constitution.

Thus the equation of taxes between county and poll and limitation of the county taxes to double the state tax applies to taxes levied to meet the ordinary expenses of county government. Clifton v. Wynne (1879) 80 N. C. 145; Trull v. Madison County Comrs. (1876) 72 N. C. 388.

And both the equation between poll and property taxes and the limitation as to the amount provided by N. C. Const., art. 5, § 6, must be observed in levying taxes for the payment of new debts. Trull v. Madison County Comrs. supra; Mauney v. Montgomery County Comrs. (1874) 71 N. C. 486.

And taxation for state and county purposes combined, for the current and necessary expenses of the county government and new debts, cannot exceed the constitutional limitation. French v. New Hanover County Comrs. (1876) 74 N. C. 692.

And a tax levied by county commissioners more than double the state tax "for a special purpose with the approval of the general assembly," as provided in N. C. Const., art. 5, § 6, is a tax for an ordinary purpose which must be accompanied by a capitation tax within the equation required by art. 5, section 1, thereof, providing that the general assembly shall lay a capitation tax on every male of a designated age which shall be equal on each to the tax on property valued at $500 in cash, where it is to build a court-house, a public jail, or an important bridge as to which it may be deemed necessary to create a special fund. Jones v. Person County Comrs. (1880) 107 N. C. 248.

But this equation between poll and property taxes required by N. C. Const., art. 5, § 1, does not apply to taxes levied for the payment of a public debt existing at the time of the adoption of the constitution. Street v. Craven County Comrs. (1874) 70 N. C. 644; Clifton v. Wynne (1879) 80 N. C. 145; Trull v. Madison County Comrs. (1876) 72 N. C. 388.

Or for special county purposes. Street v. Craven County Comrs. supra.

And the limitation as to the amount of taxes that may be levied including poll taxes, fixed by N. C. Const., art. 5, § 6, does not apply to taxes levied for the payment of debts existing at the time of the adoption of the constitution. Haughton v. Jones County Comrs. (1874) 70 N. C. 466; Street v. Craven County Comrs., Clifton v. Wynne, French v. New Haven County Comrs., Trull v. Madison County Comrs., and Mauney v. Montgomery County Comrs. supra; Simmons v. Wilson (1872) 66 N. C. 386.

And the auditing and allowance by county commissioners of a debt contracted before the adoption of the constitution do not change its character so as to subject it to the restrictions therein contained with reference to the equation between poll and property taxes and as to the amount of tax which can be levied. Mauney v. Montgomery County Comrs. supra.

Nor will the procurement and rendition of a judgment upon an indebtedness of a county incurred before the adoption of the constitution place it upon the same footing as a new indebtedness so that the restrictions therein contained as to the equation and as to the amount would apply to taxation for its payment. Ibid.

And the equation of taxation required by N. C. Const., art. 5, § 1, and art. 7, § 2, applies to taxation for the purpose of raising revenue for ordinary purposes of state and municipal government only, and does not invalidate a law authorizing a township to vote railroad aid bonds to be paid by a tax on property without requiring a capitation tax. Jones v. Person County Comrs. (1880) 107 N. C. 248.

And in French v. Wilmington (1876) 75 N. C. 478, it was said that the constitution, while it requires taxation to be uniform on all property within the city, and requires the observance of a certain proportion between the tax on polls and on property, contains no limitation upon the amount of tax which cities and towns may impose.

The imposition of a tax according to the equation between poll and property taxes, required by N. C. Const., art. 5, § 1, however, for the payment of an indebtedness incurred before the adoption of the constitution, is illegal as previous to its adoption all subjects of taxation were liable for the debt. Brothers v. Currituck County Comrs. (1874) 70 N. C. 728.

So in University R. Co. v. Holden (1880) 68 N. C. 410, the cause was disposed of by the decision of a majority of the court that no incorporation was created by the act in question designed to create a railroad company and authorize it to construct a railroad and require the issue of bonds to be paid by taxation to provide means for such construction, but owing to its importance the court considered the question raised as to the constitutionality of the act and the constitutional limit as to the power of the state to tax, and the several judges delivered their opinions thereon.

They were unanimous in the opinion that the equation of taxation required by N. C. Const., art. 5, § 1, providing that the capitation tax shall be equal to the tax on $300 worth of property, and that the state and county capitation taxes combined shall never exceed $2 on the head, does not apply to taxes laid for the purpose of paying either the interest or the principal of the public debt as it existed at the time of the adoption thereof for the payment of which the general assembly is absolutely required to make provision by article 1, section 4, thereof.

And the equation and limitation were held by Settle, Reade, and Dick, JJ., to apply only to the ordinary expenses of state government and not to the public debt whether incurred before or after the adoption of that provision placing the ruling upon the ground that article 1, section 4, thereof, absolutely requires the general assembly to make provision for the payment of the public debt.

And Rodman, J., held that except as to the public debt existing at the time of the adoption of the constitution for the payment of which the general poll taxes the levying of which was declared to be grievous and oppressive and ought to be abolished. If we turn to Act 1715, chapter 15, we find that all persons, males and females, free and slave, above the age of sixteen years, are declared to be "taxables," and upon each person thus declared to be a taxable the commissioners of the several county courts were directed to levy a specific sum, to be paid in money or tobacco, for the support of the government; and this act providing for the levying of taxes by the poll continued in force down to the Revolution. And, in addition to the poll taxes thus levied for public purposes, Act 1702, chap. 1, declaring the Church of England to be the established church of the colony, also provided that a tax of forty pounds of tobacco per poll should be levied each and every year for the support of the clergy, and this act continued in force down to the Revolution; and, strange as it may seem nowadays, the poll taxes to which we have referred were the only direct taxes levied for public purposes during the assembly is imperatively required to make provision, by N. C. Const., art. 1, § 4, the equation applies to all state taxes whatever, being imperative as to all matters except taxation to supply casual deficits and suppress invasions and insurrections, for the ordinary and legitimate purposes of government and to and in the completion of railroads which were begun but unfinished at the time of the adoption of the constitution for which article 1, section 5, thereof, permits the legislature to contract new debts, as to which it is directory only, leaving the legislature a discretion to act in premises which cannot be reviewed by the judiciary.

And it was held by Pearson, Ch. J., that it applies to all cases of state or county taxation except provisions for the public debt as it existed at the time of the adoption of the constitution, for casual deficits, insurrection, or invasion, for which new debts are permitted to be contracted, by N. C. Const., art. 1, § 5, and for county taxation for special purposes, which under article 1, § 7, thereof may be imposed with the special approval of the general assembly.

So in the dissenting opinion by Merrimon, J., in Barksdale v. Sampson County Comrs. (1889) 93 N. C. 472, it is argued that N. C. Const., art. 5, § 1, providing that the state and county capitation tax combined shall never exceed $2 on the head, applies to taxes levied for the ordinary and current expenditures of the state, and not to such special purposes as the constitution designated specially and required to be accomplished at all events, and that as it is provided by article 9, section 8, thereof that one or more public schools shall be maintained in each district at least four months in each year, the limitation does not apply to taxation for that purpose.

But it was held in this case that North Carolina Act of 1836, chap. 174, § 28, providing that if the tax levied by the state for the support of public schools shall be insufficient to maintain one or more schools in each school district for the period of four months then the board of commissioners of each county shall levy annually a special tax to supply the deficiency, is in conflict with N. C. Const., art. 5, § 1, providing that the general assembly shall levy a capitation tax on every male inhabitant over twenty-one and under fifty years of age which shall be equal on each to the tax on property valued at $300 in cash, but that the state and county capitation tax combined shall never exceed $2 on the head, and cannot be carried into effect where the additional sum required to maintain the public schools for the prescribed period, added to the state tax for that purpose, would make the aggregate capitation tax estimated according to the equation thereby required more than $2, so far as the excess is concerned. Ibid.

And that a special tax levied by county commissioners to supply a deficiency when the tax levied by the state for the support of the public schools is insufficient as authorized by that act, is not a tax for a special purpose which may be levied with the special approval of the general assembly within the provisions of N. C. Const., art. 5, § 6. Ibid.

The courts have no power to enforce the equation provided for by N. C. Const., art. 5, §§ 1, 6, or to correct and enforce in part an act providing for taxation in disregard of such equation or the limitation therein prescribed, but must declare it void in toto. Discussion by Rodman, J. (1872) 66 N. C. 689.

But when a tax is levied for the payment of debts contracted both before and after the adoption of the constitution, the court on application for an injunction against its collection on the ground that it does not conform to the equation and is not within the limit prescribed by N. C. Const., art. 5, §§ 1, 6, should ascertain how much of the tax levied on property is necessary to pay old debts and allow that to be collected and then allow one third of the poll tax on the hundred dollars worth of property to be collected for county purposes and restrain the excess. Trull v. Madison County Comrs. (1875) 72 N. C. 388.

V. Upon whom imposed.

The question as to who are subject to poll taxes depends upon the statutes authorizing their imposition, such statutes usually providing for their levy upon male residents between the ages of twenty-one and sixty years. See generally cases in this note setting forth statutory provisions, and particularly those set forth in this and the next subdivisions.

It is within legislative power in the absence of constitutional prohibition to make the polls of aliens ratable, where no political rights are thereby conferred to the diminution of the rights of citizens. Opinion of the Justices (1811) 7 Mass. 523.

And where the polls of male aliens over sixteen years of age are by law made liable to be rated for public taxes they are ratable polls within the intent and meaning of the Massachusetts constitutional provision making the number of representatives which each town may have, depend upon the number of ratable polls in the town, and may be included in estimating the number of ratable polls for the purpose of determining the number of representatives to which a town is entitled. Ibid.

So the provisions of the constitution of Tennessee, that all male citizens with certain exceptions shall be liable to a poll tax and requiring each voter to give judges of election satisfactory evidence that he has paid his poll taxes when he offers his vote, do not restrict the power of the legislature over inhabitants of the state who are not citizens or prevent it from laying poll taxes on aliens. Kunts v. Davidson County (1880) 6 Lea, 65.

And a man who is ordinarily physically able to perform the labor usually performed by able-bodied men on the public roads is an "able-bodied man" within section 60 of the Illinois Road & Bridge Law of 1897, and not exempt from the poll tax provided thereby. Sherrick v. Houston (1898) 29 Ill. App. 381.

Nor does a city charter providing that all persons who shall perform the road labor therein authorized, or shall commute the same by paying $1 for each day required, shall be exempt from any other taxation by the county authorities under the general road law, commute county taxes for road colonial period. Such taxes thus levied, without reference to the ability or the means of the "taxable" to pay, must necessarily have been in many cases burdensome and oppressive, and it was such levying of taxes by the poll that the Constitution of 1776 denounced as being "grievous and oppressive," and which ought to be "abolished." And, while poll taxes were levied for public purposes, the public roads were made and kept in repair by compulsory road labor, and with this article in the Constitution of 1776, prohibiting poll taxes, statutes compelling persons to labor on the roads for the purpose of keeping them in repair have been in force down to the present time, and this is the first time the constitutionality of such laws has been questioned. As early as Act 1704, chapter 21, all laborers and servants were required to work on the public roads; and upon the refusal of such laborers to perform the services thus required, or the master to furnish his servants, the master and laborers were liable to indictment and punishment.

and bridge purposes within the city. Cooper v. Ash (1875) 76 Ill. 11.

An ordinance imposing a capitation tax upon free male negroes or free persons of color, whether a descendant of an Indian or otherwise, applies to slave Indians, and does not include an East Indian, though a person of color. Ex parte Ferret (1817) 1 Mill, Const. 194.

Previous to Maryland declaration of rights a poll tax for forty pounds of tobacco was laid on male residents and female slaves, and free female negroes and, mulattoes above sixteen years of age, except slaves adjudged to be past labor for the support of the clergy of the established church, and a poll tax was imposed upon all the same description of inhabitants and at times upon bachelors to raise a revenue for the state. Dictum in Williams' Case (1840) Bland, Ch. 186.

VI. Place of taxation.

The place of the imposition of poll taxes is universally held to depend upon the domicile of the person upon whom they are imposed.

Thus, Chinese laborers coming into the state to engage in labor on public works who on the first day of April were in a certain road district at work on the construction of a railway where they remained a few months passing through and beyond the district as the road was completed without any purpose to remain or intent to return were not residing in such district on April 15 of that year, within the meaning of a statute making designated persons residing in a road district on that date liable to perform two days' work on the roads therein, or in default thereof, after being duly warned, for the payment of $2 for each day's work. On Yuen Hai Co. v. Ross (1882) 8 Sawy. 384.

And where after the inhabitants of a school district have voted to raise money for building a schoolhouse, and before it is assessed the town sets off certain of the inhabitants and forms them into a separate district, the persons so set off are not liable to be assessed upon their polls and estate for the money so voted. Richards v. Dagget (1808) 4 Mass. 584.

And residence upon lands purchased by or ceded to the United States for navy yards, forts, and arsenals, over which there is no reservation of jurisdiction to the state other than the right to serve civil and criminal process thereon, for any length of time, does not render the persons residing thereon liable to be assessed for their polls and estate for state, county, and town taxes, in the towns in which such lands are situated. Opinion of the Justices (1841) 1 Met. 580.

So one's place of domicile for the purpose of the imposition of poll taxes is that of his permanent residence and not that at which he happens to be at the time of the levy of the tax.

Thus the term "inhabitant" as used in the New Jersey statute providing that a poll tax of fifty cents shall be assessed upon every white male inhabitant of the state of the age of twenty-one years and upwards imports citizenship and municipal relations, and requires the domicile to be 29 L. R. A.

within the state, and does not apply to mere temporary residence. State v. Ross (1862) 23 N. J. L. 517.

And a person who has a fixed domicile in one state does not, by going into another state for part of the year with his family and servants to reside at a house owned by him therein, thereby change his domicile and become an inhabitant of the latter state so as to be subject to a poll tax therein under a statute providing that a poll tax shall be assessed upon every white male inhabitant thereof of a designated age. Ibid.

And Mass. Stat. 1852, chap. 80, making any one having his residence in Boston on the first of January subject to taxation including poll taxes on the first of May following, though he may have removed therefrom before that time, applies to persons having their domicile in Boston on the first of January only, and not to one in that place at that time and who habitually spent five months of the year there including the winter months, but who spent seven months of the year in his own house in another place where for twenty years he had been taxed for his poll and personal property and exercised the rights of citizenship. Lee v. Boston (1854) 2 Gray, 484.

Nor can one who, having a house in Brookline and another in Boston, usually residing in Brookline from some time in April to November of each year, when he closed the house and removed to Boston till the following April, after making preparation to return to Brookline was prevented from going personally until some time in May by illness, be rightfully taxed on his poll and personality in Boston for that year though actually in that place on May 1, where he notified the assessors that he desired to continue a citizen of Brookline and taxable there where for many years he had been taxed and exercised all municipal rights and privileges. Cabot v. Boston (1853) 12 Cush. 52.

So the question as to whether a removal from one place to another will effect a change of domicile for the purpose of the imposition of the tax depends upon the intent with which the removal was made.

Thus an inhabitant of Boston who departs therefrom and goes to France where he is followed by his family about three months afterward, leaving his dwelling and furniture in Boston for a year and hiring one in Paris for that period, intending at the time of his departure to return and resume his residence in Boston, but not having fixed upon the time of return, but who actually does return in about sixteen months followed by his family about nine months afterwards, is subject to taxation in Boston upon his poll and personality during such absence. Sears v. Boston (1840) 1 Met. 250.

But a citizen of Boston who removes with his family to Edinburgh declaring at the time that he intended to reside abroad and that if he should return it would not be to Boston, and takes a lease in Edinburgh for a term of years and tries to engage an American instructor for his children for two years, changes his domicile and is not liable to taxation in Boston upon his poll and personality for the year following that of his departure, though

This law was substantially in force when the Constitution of 1776 was adopted, and continued in force for years after its adoption. And instead of being repealed, or being considered as repugnant to the article in the Bill of Rights of 1776, Act 1795, chapter 87, recites "that whereas doubts have arisen, what description of persons are intended to work on the public roads under the existing laws to which this is a supplement, therefore be it enacted, that every able-bodied male person shall be and is hereby made subject to like personal service." And this act further provides for the payment of money in commutation of such personal service. And though this act has been amended from time to time, and most of the counties have been exempted from its operation, the main features of the act—the compulsory service, with the privilege of furnishing a substitute or paying a stipulated sum in lieu thereof—have been part of the local law of Dorchester, Somerset, and other counties down to the present time. In construing this article in the Bill he annulled a contract for the sale of his dwelling and retained it in the hands of a tenant, giving as a reason that if he should die his wife might wish to return to Boston. Thorndike v. Boston (1840) 1 Met. 242.

And a ship master who, intending to abandon his house in one place and to make his home in another, starts upon a voyage intending to return to the latter place, which he does about six months later and marries a resident of the latter place remaining there three days, when he again goes to sea taking his wife with him but leaving her at the latter place after that voyage, acquires a domicile at the latter place upon his return from the first voyage so as to be no longer taxable on his poll and estate at the former place. Stockton v. Staples (1877) 66 Me. 197.

So one who, having previously disposed of most of his furniture and personal property, settles his board bill at the place where he had been boarding with his wife for some time and leaves the city on the 30th of March, arriving at a city in another state on the first of April, where it was arranged that his wife was to subsequently follow him, engaging a boarding place there and going into business pursuant to an arrangement previously made, is not domiciled in the former city on April 1, so as to be liable to taxation therein upon his poll and estate on that day. Parsons v. Banger (1878) 61 Me. 457.

And one who moves with his family from his own farm in one school district to the town farm in an adjoining district under a contract to carry on the latter farm for one year intending to make it his home for that time, but remaining there for two years under a renewal of the contract, thereby becomes a resident of and subject to taxation upon his poll in the latter district. Woodward v. Isham (1870) 43 Vt. 123.

And a letter written by a person formerly residing in Boston but who had gone abroad, to his agent at that place, expressing an intention to reside abroad permanently, is admissible in evidence upon the question of his liability to be taxed for his poll and personality at the place of his former residence after his departure though written after the assessment, where the writer did not know it had been made. Thorndike v. Boston (1840) 1 Met. 242.

A mere election by a taxpayer to be taxed on his poll and estate in one town, rather than another, however, is only one circumstance bearing upon the question of actual habitation, and is to be taken in connection with the other circumstances of the case in determining his liability to such taxation. Lyman v. Fiske (1885) 17 Pick. 231, 28 Am. Dec. 293.

Neither can a person have two domicils and be taxed upon his poll and estate in two towns or districts. Richards v. Dagget (1806) 4 Mass. 534.

Nor can one legally liable to taxation upon his poll and personality in one town be assessed thereon in another town, and he cannot be compelled to pay a tax assessed thereon in the latter town even though the assessment was thus made with his consent. Preston v. Boston (1831) 12 Pick. 7.

And a domicile cannot be abandoned, surrendered, or lost for the purpose of taxation either upon the poll or the estate until another is acquired. Borland v. Boston (1883) 132 Mass. 89, 42 Am. Rep. 434.

Thus one who leaves his domicile and goes to Europe to reside there for an indefinite period with his family with the intent never to return to his former home but to make his home at some other place when he did return, subsequently fixing upon a place of residence in another state but remaining in Europe some time longer, retains his original domicile for the purposes of a tax imposed upon his poll and estate after his place of residence was fixed upon but before his return from Europe. Ibid.

And one who gave up his business and removed to another town on account of his health, intending to remain during the summer and return in autumn, but not finding satisfactory business in his native town upon the recovery of his health in autumn, remained until the following March when he entered into business elsewhere, intending, as soon as he could make arrangements, to remove to a third town to reside, contracting for and taking steps toward the removal of his furniture, which on the first day of May was placed on board a vessel for that purpose, is subject to a poll tax imposed on that day at the place where he then remained though he personally removed to such place within a few days afterwards. Carnoe v. Freetown (1837) 9 Gray, 357.

In Colton v. Longmeadow (1866) 12 Allen, 598, however, it was held that one who determines to abandon his domicile in one state and take up a permanent residence in another, and actually leaves the state before the first of May, and proceeds to the state where he intends to reside a few days after that date, is not taxable on his poll and estate in the state of his former residence on the first of May.

But Borland v. Boston, supra, distinguishes Colton v. Longmeadow, supra, upon the ground that in that case the plaintiff had lost his domicile in Massachusetts because he had actually left the commonwealth and was actually in itinere to his new domicile which he had left the commonwealth for the purpose of obtaining and which in fact he did obtain; but it was said that if that case is to be deemed authority it should be limited to its exact facts and that the wiser rule would be to make taxation to depend upon domicile.

The question of the liability of a person to taxation upon his poll and estate in one place rather than another is one of fact for the jury to be determined from all the circumstances of the case. Lyman v. Fiske (1885) 17 Pick. 231, 28 Am. Dec. 293.

And the fact that students in college paid a road tax in labor while in attendance has no weight in determining the question of their residence for the purpose of voting where the statute did not require residence as a ground of liability to road labor, but simple inhabitancy. Dale v. Irwin (1875) 78 Ill. 170.

In State v. Grizzard (1883) 89 N. C. 115, however, the payment of poll taxes was treated as evidence of Rights of the Constitution of 1867, being identical with the article in the Constitution of 1776, it is but fair to presume that the framers of the Constitution of 1867, and the people who adopted it, understood this limitation on the power to levy taxes by the poll in the sense in which it had been construed and acquiesced in for nearly one hundred years. Similar statutes in other states have been in operation for years, and their validity, when questioned, has been fully sustained; and, referring to these statutes, Judge

Cooley says: "Though the public burden assumes the form of labor, it is still taxation, and must therefore be levied on some principle of uniformity. But it is a peculiar species of taxation, and the general terms 'tax' or 'taxation,' as employed in the state constitutions, would not generally be understood to include it." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 629; Cooley, Taxa. 14.

And then, as to the objection that this local law is repugnant to that clause in the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution of residence, giving the taxpayer a right to vote and hold office under the North Carolina constitution, but its admissibility for that purpose was not questioned.

The remedy of a person owning real estate in a town in which he does not reside, who is assessed thereon upon his poll and personalty as well as upon his realty, is not confined to an appeal as for overtaxation, but if he is compelled to pay such poll and personalty tax he may recover the amount paid in an action of assumpsit against the town. Preston v. Boston (1881) 12 Pick. 7.

VII. The levy and collection.

Poll taxes are of statutory creation and their levy and collection depend entirely upon the statutes providing therefor. This note is confined to poll tax cases and the decisions with reference to this subject are too meagre to permit the formulation of any general rules therefrom, but it is thought that rules with relation to taxes in general would apply in the absence of special provision though the peculiar nature of poll taxes would sometimes require their modification or their modified application.

Poll taxes may be directly imposed by constitutional provision and sometimes the statute itself constitutes the levy, but as a general rule they are imposed under legislative authority by officers (usually those of municipal subdivisions) upon whom the power is expressly conferred.

Thus S. C. Const., art. 9, § 8, limiting the payment of a deficiency in the estimated expenses of any year to a deficiency tax levied under that section on the following year, does not apply to poll taxes provided for by article 10, section 5, thereof directing the imposition thereof and providing for its use for educational purposes, as they are imposed by the constitution itself, thus making it the duty of the officers making the assessment to insert therein the sum charged against each who thereupon becomes liable therefor, without further legislation, the former section applying only to taxes imposed by the general assembly. State v. Cobb (1877) 8 S. C. N. S. 123.

So where a county poll tax is levied by the legislature there is no necessity for a levy of the tax by the county court even if it had authority to make it. Labadie v. Dean (1877) 47 Tex. 90.

And a statute requiring that a poll tax shall be assessed upon designated persons without saying in terms for what purposes, and an ordinance enacted by a council authorized to direct the manner of the assessment and collection of a tax, directing the assessor to make a true account and lists of the persons, articles, and things made rateable by the laws of the state and assess the tax upon all persons and property, etc., requires the separate assessment of two poll taxes, one for the city and one for the county where the tax assessed is both for county and township and for city purposes. State v. Brannin (1883) 23 N. J. L. 464.

The city council of a city, authorized to levy poll taxes for the improvement of streets, has power by ordinance to require the keepers of boarding houses, restaurants, and hotels, to furnish the street commissioner with the names of persons liable to poll tax boarding or lodging in their houses, and to impose a fine for refusal to do so. Topeka v. Boutwell (1894) 37 L. R. A. 568, 53 Kan. 20.

In Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108 (1883) 111 U. S. 708, 28 L. ed. 871, involving the question of the right of the taxpayer to notice of the imposition of an assessment for a local improvement, it was said that there is a vast number of different kinds of taxes which the state may impose, of which from their nature no notice can be given to the taxpayer, nor would notice be of any possible advantage to him, such as poll taxes.

So as to collection, an action cannot be maintained for the recovery of a poll tax when the statute providing for its levy provides a remedy, though such remedy may be impracticable or insufficient. Faribault v. Miesner (1874) 20 Minn. 305.

And the exclusion of a pension certificate offered in evidence in an action for the recovery of a poll tax to establish that the defendant was not physically able to perform the labor usually performed by able-bodied men on the public roads, if erroneous, is a harmless error where proof of the wound for which the pension had been given had been introduced and was not disputed. Sherrick v. Houston (1888) 29 Ill. App. 381.

So the amount of a poll tax assessed against a taxpayer and the penalty thereon is properly included in a treasurer's warrant directing a seizure and sale under 19 S. C. Stat. at L., p. 884, § 10, providing that if delinquent taxes, assessments, and penalties charged against any property or party shall not be paid at a designated time they shall be treated as delinquent and shall be collected by sale according to law, and the deed of a purchaser at a sale thereunder is not thereby rendered void though the statute providing for the tax sale does not specifically mention poll taxes, and it is made a misdemeanor to fail to pay them. Wilson v. Cantrell (1888) 40 S. C. 114.

And a demand for a delinquent tax imposed in default of performance of road labor authorized by Oregon Laws, pp. 726, 737, §§ 21, 22, pp. 730, 771, §§ 101, 102, made of a third person, is not valid under the provisions thereof that in case of failure to perform such labor the supervisor may deliver a statement of the delinquency with the amount necessary to discharge it to the sheriff, who shall thereupon collect it by seizure and sale of the personal property of the delinquent, and if such property cannot be found he shall demand the same from any person indebted to the delinquent and collect the same out of his estate, unless he makes oath that he is not thus indebted and that he is entitled for his services, beside his lawful fees, a sum equal to one fourth the delinquent tax, to be collected with the tax, unless the inability to collect out of the delinquent's personality, and a statement of the statutory requirement as to collection unless oath is made, and that the whole sum demanded is not greater than that authorized by the statute, appears in the demand. On Yuen Hai Co. v. Ross (1888) 3 Sawy. 354.

And payment of an illegal tax upon the poll and personalty of the taxpayer to prevent the issuing which declares that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of the citizens of the United States," it is sufficient to say that the interpretation of that clause by the Supreme Court in the Slaughter-House Cases, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 894, is a complete answer to this objection. There is a distinction, says Mr. Justice Miller, between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a state. To become a citizen of the United States, it is only necessary that one should be born or naturalized in the United States; but to be a citizen of a state, he must reside within the state. Further he says: "It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection to the citizen of a state against the legislative power of his own state, that the words 'citizen of the state' should be left out where it is so carefully used, and used in contradiction to 'citizens of the United States,' in the very sentence which precedes it;" and the Supreme Court held that this clause merely protected the of a warrant of distress, which would issue of course unless the tax was paid, is a compulsory and not a voluntary payment, which would preclude the taxpayer from reclaiming the sum paid. Preston v. Boston (1831) 12 Pick. 7.

The provision of Ala. Const. 1868, 1875, that the general assembly may levy a poll tax not to exceed $1.50 on each poll, which shall be applied exclusively in aid of the public school fund, does not contemplate that the poll-tax fund shall be relieved of the expense of its own assessment and collection or render it incompetent for the legislature to charge such expenses thereon. Shaver v. Robinson (1877) 59 Ala. 195.

But an auditor authorized to settle with the tax assessor and collector and decide as to the amount of commissions due him for the assessment and collection of poll taxes embraced in the settlement has no power, in the absence of a statute authorizing it, to authorize the collector to retain out of the poll-tax fund to be collected for one year the commissions due him and the assessor for assessing and collecting the poll taxes of preceding years. Ibid.

The auditor has authority, under Ala. Code 1876, § 424, providing that the tax collector shall be allowed by the auditor five per cent for collecting the poll tax, to decide upon the amount of commissions due the collector, though by section 1112 thereof the money does not pass through the hands of the auditor but is required to be paid directly to the county superintendent of education. Ibid.

VIII. Disposition.

It would appear to be within legislative power to apply poll taxes to any of the purposes to which ordinary taxes may be applied; but their application is frequently restricted to particular purposes.

Thus N. C. Const., art. 5, § 2, providing that the proceeds of the state and county capitation tax shall be applied to the purposes of education and the support of the poor, but in no one year shall more than twenty-five per cent thereof be appropriated to the latter purpose, requires that three-fourths of the entire sum derived from such a tax must at all events be paid over to the educational board, and that whatever portion thereof not to exceed one fourth is directly appropriated by the legislature to any given class of the poor to be distributed by some other agency than the various boards of county commissioners must be deducted by the county authorities from the twenty-five per cent thereof, subject to appropriation by them for the support of the indigent. Bladen County Board of Education v. Bladen Comrs. (1898) 113 N. C. 379.

And an appropriation of nine cents of the proceeds of a capitation tax from the amount levied upon each poll for the payment of pensions, and of one fourth of the remainder thereof to the support of the county poor, is improper and erroneous under that provision of the constitution. The amount appropriated for pensions should have been deducted from the twenty-five per cent of the whole tax authorized to be appropriated to the support of the poor. Ibid.

But N. C. Laws 1891, chap. 223, § 2, imposing a capitation tax of seventy-five cents on every male person, devoting nine cents thereof to the support of the poor, is valid within that constitutional provision. Ibid.

And old confederate soldiers who are poor as well as disabled, and their indigent and unmarried widows, are included in the term "poor" as used therein. Ibid.

But no recovery can be had by a board of education against the county commissioners either as individuals or as a corporation for the misappropriation of a sum in excess of one fourth of the capitation tax to be applied to the support of the poor in violation of N. C. Const., art. 5, § 2, requiring the appropriation of three-fourths of such tax to the purposes of education, where the commissioners acted in good faith and mistook the law, as in ordering the division thereof they acted judicially under the general power delegated to them, and the only remedy of the board of education is by mandamus to the county treasurer to compel proper application of the unexpended portion of the fund required to be appropriated for the purpose of education. Ibid.

So a board of supervisors has no authority, under the California County Government Act, § 25, subsec. 20, authorizing it to transfer moneys from one fund to another as the public interest may require, to order the transfer of a surplus remaining in the general county fund for the purpose of paying the claim of a road overseer for labor done and money expended by him for his district, when it is not alleged that any part of the claim is for the construction of bridges, as all the money which can be used for road purposes must, under Cal. Pol. Code, § 2652, providing for levying an annual poll tax part of which shall be apportioned to the general road fund, and section 2659 thereof providing for the levy of a property tax for highway purposes not to exceed a certain per cent, come from such poll tax and such property tax, except in case of the construction of bridges provided by section 2713 thereof. Potter v. Fowler (1889) 78 Cal. 403.

And New Mexico Act of 1872 (Prince's Stat. p. 512, § 6, 7), providing for the assessment of an annual poll tax of $1 each upon certain citizens of the territory, which shall be applied to school purposes exclusively, is not repealed so as to render a poll tax subsequently collected payable into the public treasury, by the Act of 1883 (Prince's Stat. pp. 668, 698, 707, 712, 713), making a similar provision for the assessment of a poll tax, and supplying other sources of revenue for the public schools, and prescribing the duties of the collector in paying over tax moneys collected, and repealing all acts inconsistent therewith, but making no provision as to the disposition of moneys collected as a poll tax. Territory v. Luna (1884) 3 N. M. 146.

But N. C. Const., art. 9, § 2, providing that the general assembly shall provide for an annual tax sufficient to defray the estimated expenses of the state for each year, and providing for the levying of a deficiency tax on the succeeding year where the ordinary expenses exceed the income, does not confine the payment of past-due school claims to

"privileges and immunities" of citizens of the United States, and was not intended to control the power of the state governments over the rights of their own citizens; and, as to the privileges and immunities belonging to the citizens of a state, "the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested,"—that is, with the state in which the citizen resides. And again, in Bradwell v. Illinois, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 180, 21 L. ed. 442, referring to the same clause in the Fourteenth Amendment, Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the court, says: "The protection designed by that clause, as has been repeatedly held, has no application to a citizen of the state whose laws are complained of." The appellant is a citizen of this state, and the law of which he complained as having abridged and interfered with his privileges and immunities is a law of his own state, and, this being so, the clause in the Fourteenth Amendment on a deficiency tax levied under that section, or prevent the legislature from providing for their payment by the application of the current poll-tax fund thereto. State v. Cobb (1877) 8 S. C. N. S. 123.

And South Carolina Act of March 8, 1874, providing for the payment of past-due school claims authorizing their payment in part from the poll tax fund and preferring in the order of payment out of that fund such claims as matured before a certain date, is not in conflict with the provision of S. C. Const., art. 9, § 2, that poll taxes shall be applied exclusively to the public school fund, as payment of past claims is no less an application to educational purposes than of current demands, Ibid.

Nor does Pennsylvania Act of April 15, 1878, § 9, which is not retrospective in its operation, repealing the Militia Act of April 7, 1870, and its supplements, providing for the payment of a per capita tax by designated persons to the collector of taxes to be paid by him to the county treasurer to be disbursed as a military fund upon the order of the commanding and other officers of the brigade, affect orders drawn before the date of such repealing act. Wyoming County v. Bardwell (1877) 84 Pa. 104.

And the Militia Act of April 7, 1870, and its supplements create no liability on the part of the county in its corporate capacity to holders of such orders, whose only remedy is against the treasurer to compel payment. Ibid.

So a teacher, who contracts with respect to the fund established by the Alabama statutes providing that certain taxes shall be apportioned among the school districts, and that the poll tax shall be apportioned upon that of the previous year, does so knowing that the fund may fall short of the amount for the previous year and that he may have to suffer his pro rata share of the loss; as to such deficiency there is no personal or official liability upon the part of the county superintendent, who is required to make such apportionment. Gay v. Bankston (1893) 100 Ala. 280.

IX. Payment of poll taxes as a qualification of electors.

Some of the states have made the payment or the assessment and payment of poll or capitation taxes a condition precedent to the right to exercise the elective franchise.

And such provisions have been held not to contravene constitutional provisions.

Thus the legislature has power under Fla. Const., art. 9, § 5, and art. 8, § 6, authorizing capitation taxes not to exceed $1 each year, and empowering it to make the payment of the capitation tax a prerequisite for voting, to require the payment of all annual capitation taxes remaining unpaid not exceeding $1 for each year as a qualification to vote. State v. Dillon (1898) 22 L. R. A. 124, 32 Fla. 545.

And Fla. Laws of 1898, chap. 4301, § 3, requiring as a qualification to vote the payment by the elector of the poll taxes of previous years, where he was entitled to qualify himself as an elector at the last state election by registration and the payment of such taxes, but failed to do so, is not in contravention of those provisions of the Florida Constitution as requiring the payment of more than one capitation tax as a qualification, where payment of not more than $1 for each year is required. Ibid.

And the requirement of that act of payment of delinquent poll taxes more than two weeks before an election as a qualification to vote thereat is not void as being unreasonable, unnecessary, and tending to impair and subvert the right to vote, there being no constitutional limitation upon the right of the legislature applicable thereto. Ibid.

So the exclusion of a person from the assessment list for twelve months, for failure to pay his county poll tax, in consequence of which he may be precluded from being qualified to vote during that year, is not a violation of Del. Const., art. 4, § 1, providing that a citizen otherwise qualified, who has within two years next before the election paid a county tax which shall have been assessed at least six months before the election, shall enjoy the right of an elector, or of article 1, section 3, thereof, providing that all elections shall be free and equal. Friezeleben v. Shallcross (1890) (Del.) 8 L. R. A. 337.

And Kentucky Act of 1840, making the payment of poll taxes of the preceding year a qualification for voting for certain municipal officers, does not contravene Ky. Const., art. 2, § 8, providing that every free white male citizen of the age of twenty-one years, etc., shall be a voter, as article 6, section 6, thereof, providing that officers of towns and cities shall be elected in such manner and with such qualifications as may be prescribed by law, shows the intention of the framers of the constitution that their former provision should not apply to municipal officers, but that they should be left to the legislative will. Buckner v. Gordon (1884) 31 Ky. 635.

Such provisions, being in derogation of common right, have usually been strictly construed.

Thus the payment of the poll or capitation tax authorized by Fla. Const., art. 8, § 8, and required by Florida Act of May 23, 1890, chap. 3350, as a qualification of electors at any general, special, or municipal election, is not a qualification for voting at an election as to issuing county bonds for the improvement of the navigation of St. John's river, under Florida Act of June 11, 1891, §§ 1, 5, authorizing registered voters to vote for or against the issue of such bonds, and providing that every person whose name shall appear on the registration books, and every person holding a certificate of registration showing that he is a registered voter, and who has not lost the right to vote for any cause as provided by law, shall have the right to vote at such election. Stockton v. Powell (1892) 15 L. R. A. 42, 29 Fla. 1.

And Fla. Laws 1898, chap. 4301, § 3, prescribing the qualification of voters at certain city elections, providing that there shall be given to each person who was entitled to qualify himself as an elector at the last state election by registration and the payment of his poll taxes for the years 1890 and 1891, and failed to do so, an opportunity to qualify by registering and paying his own poll taxes for such years, has reference to the poll taxes due under the general revenue law for those years, and if he which he relies has no application. The law of which he complains merely imposes upon him the same duty and obligation which it requires of all other persons within the ages designated by the statute, without making any distinction whatever on account of color or race. And there is no ground on which it can be assailed as being repugnant to any of the provisions of the state or Federal Constitutions. For a breach of the duty imposed on the appellant and all others, it provides for a fair and impartial trial according to the law of the land, and upon conviction it provides that the offender shall be fined, and stand committed until fine and costs are paid. No one can question the power of the state thus to provide for the enforcement of its law and the punishment of all who violate it. As to the policy and wisdom of the law in question, it is quite sufficient to say that that is a matter resting with the legislature, and not with the courts. Cooley, Taxn. 487; Appleton v. Hopkins, 5 Gray, 580.

poll taxes were due under the requirement of that law, none could be insisted upon. State v. Dillon (1893) 22 L. R. A. 124, 33 Fla. 545.

And that provision is not void as requiring a person seeking to qualify himself to vote, to pay such poll taxes in person, and does not deprive him of the right to pay them through an authorized agent, such a payment being a payment by the voter himself. Ibid.

Nor is it material, under Florida Act of June 12, 1892, providing that no person shall be permitted to vote at an election who shall have failed to pay his poll taxes for two years next preceding such election, whether or not the collector withholds the tax receipts upon the payment of poll taxes by unauthorized third persons, as under Fla. Rev. Stat., § 342, collectors are required, at least thirty days before any election, to furnish the supervisors of registration with a list of all persons who have paid their capitation taxes for two years next preceding the year of the election which renders the receipt immaterial to the voter. State v. Johnson (1892) 30 Fla. 499.

And an elector has the right to pay his poll taxes on Saturday, the third day of September, to qualify him to vote at an election held on October 4 of the same year, under Fla. Rev. Stat., § 154, subsec. 6, providing that no one shall be permitted to vote at an election who shall have failed to pay, at least thirty days before the day of such election, his poll taxes for two years next preceding such election. Ibid.

So a person from whom a poll tax is due may under that act adopt and ratify the act of another in paying such taxes though he had not been authorized to make such payment. Ibid.

And application for a tax receipt by a person against whom poll taxes were assessed, as well as voting, constitutes a ratification of the payment thereof by an unauthorized third person. Ibid.

And a tax collector has no right under that act to refuse to receive such taxes when tendered by some party in behalf of others from whom they are due, though the person making the tender is not authorized by the person from whom they are due to pay them. Ibid.

And the governor has power under Fla. Const., art. 4, § 15, authorizing him, to suspend all officers not liable to impeachment who shall have been appointed or elected, for neglect of duty in office, to suspend a tax collector for refusal to receive poll taxes assessed under Fla. Rev. Stat., § 341, because tendered by some party in behalf of others from whom they were due where the party making the tender was not authorized by the persons from whom they were due to pay them. State v. Johnson (1892) 30 Fla. 499.

In Catlin v. Smith (1816) 2 Serg. & R. 207, however, it was held that a tax must have been not only laid, but also assessed individually upon a taxpayer, at least six months before the election, in order to entitle him to vote under the provision of the Pennsylvania constitution making the payment of a tax which had been assessed at least six months before the election a qualification of an elector.

And persons over seventy years of age having the requisite qualifications of residence, but who had been exempted from taxation on account of their poverty for two successive years before arriving at that age, though not liable to be taxed for their polls under the Massachusetts statute, are not thereby exempted from taxation so as to be entitled to vote, under the third article of the amendments to the constitution conferring the right as to certain designated elections upon those who have paid a state or county tax assessed upon them within two years preceding only, unless they shall have been exempted from taxation. Opinion of the Justices (1844) 5 Met. 591.

It is a question for the governor's decision, under Fla. Const., art. 4, § 15, authorizing him to suspend all officers not liable to impeachment who shall have been appointed or elected, for neglect of duty in office, whether or not a collector was guilty of neglect of duty in not receiving poll taxes tendered Saturday, September 3, where an election occurred October 4, of that year, the statute providing that no one shall be permitted to vote at an election who shall have failed to pay, at least thirty days before the day of such election, his poll taxes for two years next preceding such election. State v. Johnson (1892) 18 L. R. A. 410, 30 Fla. 493.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

DUVAL COUNTY COMMISSIONERS,
Pffa. in Err.,

City of JACKSONVILLE

(.....Fla.....)

- *1. Under section 5 of article 9 of the Constitution, the legislature cannot authorize counties to levy taxes for any other than county purposes; nor can counties be authorized to devote money so raised to any other than such purposes.
2. The authorities have formulated no generally accepted definition of a county purpose, but leave each case involving the question to be decided as it may arise.
3. The legislature exercises plenary control over public highways, whether they be public country roads or streets in cities and towns.
4. If the courts entertain a well-founded or reasonable doubt as to the constitutionality of an act, it should, in deference to the legislative judgment, be upheld.
5. The proviso to section 17 of chapter 4014, Laws of 1891, directing that one half of the amount of the special road tax authorized by the act to be levied by the county commissioners and realized from the taxable property in incorporated cities and towns, be turned over to the municipal authorities, to be used in repairing, working, improving, and laying out the streets thereof, as may be prescribed by the ordinances of said cities and towns, is not in conflict with section 5, article 9, of the Constitution, as being a diversion of county revenues to other than county purposes.
6. Neither is said proviso in conflict with section 16, article 3, of the Constitution, as not being expressed in the title of said chapter 4014, Laws of 1891.
7. When a matter is so closely connected with the subject of the act as to create a doubt whether it is not included within it, the courts will not consider the question whether the legislative action upon it violates the constitutional prohibition relating to the titles of laws.
8. A street is a public road or way in a city, town, or village. All streets are highways, but all highways are not necessarily streets.
9. It is not required that the title of an act should give a synopsis of all the means by which the object of a law is to be accomplished in the provisions in its body. The title may be general, and so long as the generality of the subject expressed therein is not employed as a guise to conceal the real object of the law, or some provision therein, it will not be objectionable.
10. The turning over of one half of the money raised from the taxable property in incorporated cities and towns, under section 17, chapter 4014, Laws of 1891, does not destroy the equality or uniformity of the county assessment made by the county commissioners.

11. By the 17th section of chapter 4014 the public road tax when collected is required to be paid into the county treasury as a special fund to be expended under the direction of the county commissioners solely for the purpose mentioned in the act; and under sections 584 and 585, Rev. Stat., no money can be drawn from the county treasury except upon warrant drawn by order of the county commissioners. Under the statutory provisions mentioned it is clearly the duty of the county commissioners to turn over to municipalities their proportional part of the road tax when collected and paid into the county treasury, by issuing a warrant for the payment of the same.
12. Mandamus is a remedy resting in the judicial discretion of the court, and the peremptory writ will not ordinarily be awarded commanding an officer to do what is not within his power to do; and although he may have put it out of his power to perform his duty, and may be liable in damages therefor, still where he cannot perform the act, and this is clear to the court, the peremptory writ will not ordinarily be issued against him.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Duval County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in a mandamus proceeding brought to compel defendants to turn over to plaintiff the proportion of the amount realized from a special tax for road purposes which was designated by the terms of a statute. Reversed.

Statement by MABRY, Ch. J.:

This is a proceeding by mandamus, instituted by the city of Jacksonville against the county commissioners of Duval county, to require them to turn over to the municipal authorities of said city one half of the amount realized from a special tax for public roads and bridges levied and collected on the property within the corporate limits of said city, under section 17, chapter 4014, Laws of 1891.

It is alleged in the alternative writ that the board of county commissioners of Duval county deemed it advisable and for the public good, and at the times for levying taxes, for county purposes for the years 1891, 1892, 1893, and 1894, respectively, levied, by virtue of section 17, chapter 4014, Laws of Florida, a special tax for public roads and bridges on all the real and personal property in Duval county subject to taxation, and which was assessed and collected as other taxes of the county and paid into the county treasury as a special fund as required by the law. That a large amount of said special tax levied for NOTE.—While a division between a county and township of the expense of maintaining certain roads and bridges has been somewhat frequently made on the ground that such roads and bridges were maintained in part for the benefit of a larger portion of the public than was represented by the town, the above case seems to be the first to present the constitutional question therein involved of the 29 L. R. A.

power of a county under statutory direction to turn over to the highway or street authorities of a municipal corporation situated in the county a part of the funds raised by taxation "for county purposes."

For many authorities on the general subject of highway taxes, see Brannon v. Kanawha County 64 (W. Va.) 8 L. R. A. 304.

the years mentioned, and collected and paid into the county treasury, amounting to more than $19,000, was assessed, levied, and collected on property in the city of Jacksonville, exactly how much was so realized the city was not able to say, because of the fact that all books and papers containing such information were in the custody and control of the county officials of said county, but the city shows that there had been realized from such source for the years mentioned the sum of $18,050.76, as appeared by a sworn abstract made from the tax collector's books by the tax collector, and attached as an exhibit. It is further averred that the exact amount realized from such special tax on the property in the city of Jacksonville and required by the act mentioned to be turned over to her municipal authorities was, or should be, known by the county commissioners, and they could ascertain correctly from books and papers in their possession the exact amount so realized. That of the amount of money realized from said special tax on property in the city of Jacksonville, the sum of $2,709.05 was, by warrant dated June 1, 1892, turned over to the city by order of the board of county commissioners of said county, and no other of said moneys so realized had been turned over to said city as required by law. That the municipal authorities had caused the matter to be called to the attention of the said county commissioners, and had demanded that the money due the city from the said taxes be turned over to the municipal authorities, and that the commissioners account to the city for one half of the amount so realized from property in the city, but that they had refused to do so. It was also alleged that the city was in urgent need of the moneys so due, to be used in the repairing, working, improving and laying out the streets of the city, as prescribed by ordinances.

A motion was made to quash the alternative writ on the ground, among others, that it was not the duty of respondents to turn over to relator any portion of the taxes collected for public roads and bridges. Relator's claim was an unliquidated demand. That it did not appear that respondents had ever been furnished with, or were in possession of, information as to the amount of alleged taxes collected for roads and bridges, so as to enable them to turn over any amount to relator. The writ was otherwise uncertain, evasive, and insufficient. That section 17 of chapter 4014 is in violation of section 5 of article 9 of the Constitution. That section 17 of chapter 4014 is in violation of the Constitution. That the proviso to section 17 of chapter 4014 was inoperative and void under the constitution.

The motion was overruled, and respondents answered, admitting that the board of county commissioners for said county levied a tax for the years mentioned for public roads and bridges on the property of the county subject to taxation, under section 17 of chapter 4014, Laws of Florida, but it is denied that the statement in the alternative writ as to the amount of the taxes collected on the property within the city was correct, and the amount collected for the years 1891, 1892, and 1893 is stated to be $16,911.58, and deducting from this amount what had been paid left $5,746.74. Respondents had made every effort to get the amount collected for the year 1894, but had been unable to do so, on account of the usurpation of the office of tax collector by a party named, and the delay in paying taxes, and the confusion in reference to the same in consequence of the usurpation of said office. Respondents further aver that no demand was made upon them for any proportion of the taxes collected for public roads and bridges, except that at a meeting of the board in January, 1895, the city recorder sent to the board a statement claiming the amount of the levy for roads and bridges on property within the city limits for the years 1891, 1892, and 1893, and requested payment of one half of such sum to the city; that such statement failed to show the amount of such taxes collected, and was returned to the recorder for correction, and no demand except as stated having been made upon respondents, and the whole amount collected for roads and bridges being required for the purpose of keeping the roads and bridges of the county in good repair, especially by reason of the damage done to them by the severe storms of 1893 and 1894, said funds were used by the county for that purpose, except $758.91 then in the hands of the treasurer to the credit of the road and bridge fund of the county.

As a plea to so much of the writ as involves the taxes for 1892, it is alleged that the claim was not presented to the board of county commissioners within one year from the time the same became due. It is also alleged that the provision for the payment of any portion of the tax collected for roads and bridges to the city is unconstitutional and void.

On motion of relator for peremptory writ, the same was awarded, and respondents commanded to turn over to the municipal authorities of the city of Jacksonville the sum of $5,746.74, being one half of the amount admitted by the return to have been realized from the special tax for public roads and bridges, levied by virtue of section 17 of chapter 4014, Laws of Florida, on property in the city of Jacksonville, after deducting the sum of $2,709.05, the amount paid in June, 1892. Respondents were also commanded to render an account and pay over to the city authorities the balance of one half the exact amount realized and paid into the county treasury of Duval county from said special tax for the years 1891, 1892, 1893, and 1894.

The errors assigned are the overruling the motion to quash, and in granting the peremptory writ.

Messrs. Fleming & Fleming, for plaintiffs in error:

2 Spelling, Extraordinary Relief, § 1458.

Mabry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended for plaintiffs in error that the proviso of section 17 of the Act of 1891, chapter 4014, the basis for this suit, is in conflict with the constitution in two particulars. The first one is, that the subject-matter of the proviso is not expressed in the title of the act, as required by section 16 of article 3 of the Constitution; and the second is, that it is an attempt to divert money raised by taxation for county purposes to other and unauthorized uses, in violation of section 5 of article 9 of the Constitution. The title of the act in question is: "An act to provide for establishing, working, repairing, and maintaining the public roads and bridges of the several counties of this state, and to provide penalties for failure thereof." Provision is made in the act for working, repairing, and maintaining the public roads of the counties of the state by means of manual labor by the residents of the several counties subject to road duty, aided for building and repairing bridges by a one mill tax on the dollar, in case such roads and bridges are not worked, repaired, and maintained by a special tax as provided in the 17th section of the Act. After defining the powers and duties of the county commissioners of the county over and in reference to the public roads and bridges, directing the division of the counties into road districts and providing the manner of compelling those subject to road duty to work the roads, it is provided in the 18th section that "no person residing in and paying municipal taxes to any incorporated town or city shall be required to work on the public roads under this law." The 17th section authorizes the county commissioners of any county, whenever deemed advisable and for the public good, to levy a special tax for public roads and bridges, not to exceed three mills on the dollar, and on all the real and personal property in the county subject to taxation, which tax shall be assessed and collected as other taxes of the county, and the money arising therefrom to be paid into the county treasury as a special fund to be expended under the direction of the county commissioners solely for the purpose of maintaining, working, and keeping in good condition the public roads and bridges of the county and in purchasing tools and materials for that purpose. The proviso to this section reads: "Provided, however, that one half of the amount realized from said special tax on property in incorporated cities or towns shall be turned over to the municipal authorities of said cities or towns, to be used in the repairing, working, and improving and laying out the streets thereof, as may be prescribed by the ordinances of said cities or towns." When the special tax for working and maintaining the public roads and bridges is levied, no person residing in the county shall be required to work on the public roads of the county.

We will first consider the contention that the provision for turning over one half of the money raised for the public roads and bridges of the county to the municipal authorities to be used by them in laying out and maintaining the streets thereof is a devotion of it to other than county purposes. It is beyond question that, under section 5 of article 9 of the Constitution, the legislature cannot authorize counties to levy taxes for any other than county purposes, nor can counties be authorized to devote money so raised to any other than such purposes. Skinner v. Henderson, 26 Fla. 131, 8 L. R. A. 55; Stockton v. Powell, 29 Fla. 1, 15 L. R. A. 42; Nashville v. Towns, 5 Sneed, 186. In the case of State v. Putnam County Comrs., 28 Fla. 632, the question presented was whether the county commissioners had been deprived of jurisdiction over that part of a public road of the county included within the corporate limits of a town subsequently incorporated under the general law for the incorporation of cities and towns. The court said, in effect, that whether the county commissioners had been deprived of the jurisdiction of such road within the new town organization depended upon the legislation on the subject of public roads and of municipal corporations, and that the intent of the legislature, as manifested by the statutes, would control. The conclusion was that the county commissioners had not been so deprived of jurisdiction over the road. As shown in the case of Skinner v. Henderson, supra, the city of Tampa had entered into a contract for the construction of a bridge over a river within the corporate limits of the city, and the county commissioners, on petition for that purpose, ordered that a portion of the cost of the bridge be paid by the county. The payment of the money by the county was enjoined and the bill filed for this purpose, among other things, alleged that the bridge was wholly within the corporate limits, entirely a municipal improvement, and not a county purpose within the meaning of the constitution. Such allegation being admitted to be true on demurrer, it was held that the county commissioners had no authority to appropriate the money. Anticipating the questions that might arise in the case, the court further said that the statute authorizing the city to build bridges within its limits did not necessarily revoke the authority given to the county by general statute without restriction as to locality, to build a bridge within the city limits. As there may be bridges serving only a city purpose, so there may be others demanded in the same territory for county purposes, and where the circumstances create this demand, and the bridge is for the use and benefit of the people of the county at large, or of some considerable portion of them, and intended and needed as well for those outside as for those inside the city, the authority of the county to build it is not annulled by the local city statute. Some courts hold that statutes conferring, in general terms, authority upon counties to establish and maintain public roads and bridges in the counties without restriction as to locality will not be construed so as to authorize its exercise within the territorial limits of incorporated towns or cities situated therein, when legislative authority has been given such towns and cities to establish and maintain municipal streets and highways. We need not go into a discussion of such decisions, as this court has admitted their existence and refused to follow them.

In State v. Putnam County Comrs., supra, it is said: "Though all public roads and all streets are public highways, yet neither all public highways nor all public roads are streets, or city or town highways. . . . Public roads are established by the county authorities with reference to the convenience of the people of the county or of neighborhoods therein; streets and other municipal highways are located in obedience to the dictation of the welfare and convenience of the town or city. The road may be so located in the town that no interest of the municippality would dictate its maintenance at municipal expense; it may touch no municipal highway of any kind." The case of Skinner v. Henderson clearly recognizes a distinctly municipal county purpose in respect to a bridge within the corporate limits, and also a mixed or double municipal and county purpose in respect to the same bridge, dependent upon the circumstances of each particular case. In both of the decisions just referred to the legislative intent, as manifested by the legislation on the subject of public roads and bridges, and in reference to the municipalities in question, was recognized as controlling. The question we are to deal with is not so much one of legislative intent as one of legislative power. The 17th section of the Act before us expressly authorizes the county commissioners of any county in the state, when deemed advisable and for the public good, to levy a special tax not exceeding three mills for working and maintaining the public roads of the county, and directs that one half of the amount realized from said tax on property in incorporated cities and towns shall be turned over to the municipal authorities thereof to be used in repairing, working, and improving and laying out the streets thereof as may be prescribed by ordinances. There is no doubt about the legislative intent here, and if there is no constitutional inhibition against carrying it out, it is the duty of the court to enforce it. The act must be clearly unconstitutional before we are authorized to set it aside on such ground. If we entertain any well-founded or reasonable doubt about the constitutionality of the act, we must, in deference to the legislative department, uphold it. This rule of constitutional construction is well settled. State v. Hocker, 36 Fla. —. If the establishment and maintenance of streets in incorporated towns and cities cannot be declared by the legislature, or regarded to any extent a county purpose within the meaning of the provision of the constitution on the subject, then the proviso to the act in question directing that a portion of the money raised by taxation for the public roads and bridges of the county be turned over to the municipal authorities for the purpose mentioned, is unauthorized and void. That locality alone within the corporate limits cannot determine the character of the purpose, is clearly pointed out by the decisions in this court already referred to, and even under statutes giving general authority over public roads and bridges to county commissioners, taken in connection with statutory authority in municipal bodies over streets, lanes, and alleys within their limits, it may be that a street will subserve both a county and municipal purpose. If such should be the case there would be no difficulty, according to the reasoning in the decision in Skinner v. Henderson, in appropriating road money raised by county taxation to all such streets that exist in incorporated towns and cities. So long as the money is devoted to such streets, even though expended under the agency of the municipal corporation, it would not be a diversion of it under such statutes from strictly county purposes. We have no information in the record as to the character of the streets in the city of Jacksonville for the establishment and maintenance of which the funds in question are demanded, and even under statutes similar to those existing when the decisions to which we have referred were made, it would be difficult to affirm that the devotion of part of the money raised by taxation on the property in the town or city to maintaining the streets therein would be a diversion of it from county purposes. Balsey v. People, 84 Ill. 89. But, as before stated, there is a specific statutory direction that one half of the road money raised by county taxation from the taxable property in incorporated towns and cities shall be turned over to their municipal authorities for the specific purpose of laying out and maintaining the streets therein, and, conceding this to be a direction to turn the money over to the municipal authorities to be applied by them on any or all of the streets of the municipality, without distinction, the question is, Is such an object so far foreign to a county organization, or a county purpose as to be forbidden by the constitution under county taxation for public roads or highways? The authorities have formulated no generally accepted definition of county purposes, but leave each case involving the question to be decided as it may arise. Cotten v. Leon County Comrs. 6 Fla. 610; Stockton v. Powell, supra. In the first-mentioned case it is said: "The constitution does not attempt to give a definition of county purposes, and to obtain a correct interpretation of that phrase we must look to the contemporaneous legislation upon that subject and the uniform action of the county courts under the territorial government. By this reference it will be abundantly demonstrated that at that day county purposes were taken to embrace principally the erection and repair of court-houses and jails, the opening and maintaining public thoroughfares within the limits of their respective counties, by opening roads, building bridges and causeways and keeping the same in repair, licensing and regulating ferries and toll-bridges, etc. It is thus seen that the entire subject of highways was, at the time of the constitution, an object peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the county authorities, and we are hence warranted in the assumption that it was so understood by the convention when they used the phrase 'county purposes.'"

In Hamilton County Comrs. v. Mighels, 7 Ohio St. 109, the court says: "A county organization is created almost exclusively with a view to the policy of the state at large, for purposes of political organization and civil administration, in matters of finance, of education, of provision for the poor, of military organization, of the means of travel and transport, and especially for general administration of justice. With scarcely an exception, all the powers and functions of the county organization have a direct and exclusive reference to the general policy of the state, and are in fact but a branch of the general administration of that policy." The legislature has always under our system of government had plenary control of all public highways whether they be public county roads or streets in cities and towns. State v. Jacksonville Street R. Co. 29 Fla. 590. Cooley on Taxation, page 130, says: "One of the most important functions of government is the making provision for public roads for the use of the people. The variety of these is great, and the modes of construction and operation are different. No question is made of the competency of the legislature to levy taxes for the common highway, the improved turnpike and macadamized road, the planked or paved street, the canal, the tramway or the railway. Any or all of them may be constructed by the state, or under state authority, by the municipal subdivisions of the state within whose limits they may be needed." The decision in the case of Will County Supra. v. People, 110 Ill. 511, makes a distinction between raising money by taxation for the purpose of building bridges and maintaining public highways, and for the purpose of carrying on other more private concerns of a municipality. It was there held that the raising of money by taxation in towns or counties in pursuance of a general law of the state, for the purpose of building bridges, maintaining public highways, and for other objects of a similar character, in which the people of the state at large are directly interested, is not the levying of a tax for a strictly local corporate purpose within the meaning of the Illinois Constitution. In that case a mandamus was sustained against the board of county commissioners of the county to compel the levy and collection of a tax upon the property of the county to aid the commissioners of highways of the town of Wilmington to build a bridge across a river within the limits of said town. It is true that there may be a distinctively municipal purpose, as distinguished from county purposes, and, in our judgment, the constitution of the state recognizes such distinction, but in reference to the laying out and maintenance of public streets, or municipal highways, over which not only the people of the municipality, but of the entire county, can travel, it cannot be said, we think, that they are so distinctively and exclusively a municipal purpose as to render it impossible for the legislature to authorize the counties to devote revenue raised by county taxation for public roads on the property situated within the municipalities to the maintenance of the public streets therein. The result of this conclusion is, that the proviso in question is not in conflict with section 5 of article 9 of the Constitution.

The objection that the subject-matter of the proviso to section 17 is not expressed in the title of the act cannot, in our judgment, be sustained. It is not questioned that it was not competent for the legislature under the title of the act to authorize the county commissioners, when deemed advisable and for the public good, to levy a special tax not exceeding three mills on the dollar on the entire taxable property of the county for the purpose of maintaining, working, and repairing the public roads therein. What matter is properly connected with the expenditure of the money raised by such a levy?

It was held in State v. Montgomery County Comrs., 26 Ind. 523, that "when a matter is so closely connected with the subject of the act as to create a doubt whether it is not included within it, the court will not consider the question whether the legislative action upon it violates the constitutional prohibition relating to the title of laws." "A street is a public road or way in the city, town, or village. All streets are highways, but all highways are not necessarily streets." 24 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 2. All highways, whether public roads or streets, are subject to the control of the legislature. Our constitutional requirement in reference to the subject-matter and titles of laws is, that each law shall embrace but one subject and matter properly connected therewith, and that the subject shall be briefly expressed in the title. It is not essential that the title should give a synopsis of all the means by which the object of the law is to be accomplished by the provisions in its body. State v. Green, 86 Fla. —. The title of an act may be general, and so long as the generality of the subject therein expressed is not employed as a guise to conceal the real object of the law, or some provision therein, it will not be objectionable. It is also true that the title to an act may be so restrictive in reference to a subject expressed therein as to confine the body of the act to such phase of the subject as is indicated by the title. State v. Palmes, 38 Fla. 620; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 172. The general subject of the title of the act we are considering is the laying out and maintaining the public roads of the counties, and streets are public roads or highways within the limited space of the municipalities within the counties. We deem the provision as to applying a part of the road tax to the streets in incorporated cities and towns in a county as matter properly connected with the maintenance of public roads in the county; at least it is so closely connected therewith as to create a doubt whether it is not included in the general subject of the roads of the county.

In the case of Knorrville v. Lewis, 12 Lea, 180, cited by counsel for plaintiffs in error, the title of the act considered was to provide more just and equitable laws for the assessment and collection of revenue for state and county purposes, and to repeal all laws then in force whereby revenue was collected for the assessment of real estate, personal property, privileges, and polls. The act contained many sections, and after making provisions on the subject of assessing and collecting state and county revenue, it enacted, in the 50th section, that the county clerk should collect the municipal revenues. Under the law previously existing the municipal recorder collected the town taxes. Under a constitution similar to ours as to the subject-matter and title of an act it was held that the 50th section introduced a new subject not expressed in the title, and the entire act was void. In reaching this conclusion the court said there was a distinction between state and county revenue, and municipal revenue, recognized by the constitution itself, and as a result the legislature had undertaken to introduce into the act on the subject of state and county revenue provisions in reference to a different subject not expressed in the title. Our constitution recognizes a difference between taxation for distinctively county or municipal purposes, but in reference to public highways, whether public roads or urban highways, in the county, it is competent for the legislature to authorize the counties to raise money by taxation for their maintenance.

The turning over of one half of the money raised from the property in the towns and cities does not destroy the equality and uniformity of the tax itself. The levy is made upon all the taxable property of the county just as any other tax is assessed and levied, and all property in the county bears an equal portion of the burden of such tax in proportion to its value. Sangamon County Suprs. v. Springfield, 68 Ill. 66.

It is further objected that the statute does not require the county commissioners to turn over the money to the municipal authorities, or that it is left in doubt as to whose duty it was to turn over the money, and that the relief by mandamus will be refused when the right is doubtful. It will be seen that the 17th section directs the money when collected to be paid into the county treasury as a special fund to be expended under the direction of the county commissioners solely for the purpose of maintaining, working, repairing, and keeping in good condition the public roads and bridges of the county, and for purchasing suitable tools, implements, and material for that purpose, "provided, however, that one half of the amount realized from said special tax on property in incorporated cities or towns shall be turned over to the municipal authorities of said cities or towns to be used in the repairing, working, and improving and laying out of the streets thereof as may be prescribed by the ordinances of said cities or towns." No money can be drawn from the county treasury except upon warrant drawn by the order of the county commissioners, and the warrant shall specify the particular fund upon which it is drawn. Rev. Stat. §§ 584, 585. The county treasurer is required to keep the various county funds separate (sec. 586), and he is forbidden to pay out any money in his hands as county treasurer except upon warrant drawn as provided under an order of the county commissioners. If the municipal authorities are entitled to any portion of the special fund raised for the maintenance of the public roads of the county and required to be paid into the county treasury, it is evident that it is the clear duty of the county commissioners, under the statutes mentioned, to draw the warrant for the money. The municipal authorities are compelled to obtain such warrant before they can call upon the county treasurer for the money, and the plain duty in such a case rests upon the county commissioners to issue the warrant.

The only other contention demanding any discussion is, that the peremptory writ commands the county commissioners to forthwith turn over to the municipal authorities of Jacksonville $5,746.74, when, as shown by the return, only $758.91 remained in the treasury to the credit of the public road fund. The case was disposed of on the alternative writ and return thereto, and as shown by the return one half of the amount collected and paid into the county treasury on property in the city of Jacksonville as a road fund for the years 1891, 1892, and 1893 was $8,455.79. The sum of $2,709.05, it is conceded, had been paid, and the balance amounted to $5,746.74. This last sum is the amount ordered by the court in the peremptory writ to be immediately turned over to the city authorities. The return distinctly alleges that the whole amount had been required and used for the purpose of keeping the county roads and bridges in good repair, except the sum of $758.91, the balance remaining in the hands of the county treasurer. According to the return of the county commissioners, it is clearly shown that the county had expended all the road and bridge fund except the amount stated, and that the only sum received by the city authorities was $2,746.05. The county had expended largely the city's part of the road money, but the money, as is clearly shown, is not in the county treasury to be turned over, and the question arises, To what extent will the remedy of mandamus apply? The writ of mandamus is a discretionary remedy, and while the courts will apply it in proper cases, they often refuse it when it would be attended by no beneficial results. State v. Marion County Comrs. 27 Fla. 438. A peremptory writ of mandamus will not usually issue commanding an officer to do what is not within his power to do, and though by putting it out of his power to perform a duty he may become liable in damages, still where he cannot perform the act, and this is clear to the court, mandamus will not be issued against him. This rule has been applied to public officers who have improperly diverted funds in their hands or under their control so that they are unable to comply with some duty in reference to their disposal. Rice v. Walker, 44 Iowa, 458; Bates v. Porter, 74 Cal. 224; Universal Church v. Columbia Twp. Section 29, Trustees, 6 Ohio, 446. 27 Am. Dec. 267; State v. Vanarsdale, 42 N. J. L. 586; People v. Tremain, 29 Barb. 96; State v. New Orleans, 34 La. Ann. 469; Township 36, Range 2 East, Board of Education v. Boyd, 58 Mo. 276.

Under the showing made, we think the court should not have undertaken to compel the county commissioners to turn over money that was not under their control, and which it was not in their power to do as officials of the county. The judgment should have commanded the county commissioners to turn over the road funds in the county treasury by issuing a warrant on the treasurer for that purpose. To this extent only should the remedy by mandamus be applied in this case.

The judgment is reversed with directions that the circuit court enter judgment in accordance with this opinion.

1. The intention of the parties to a covenant respecting real property is the controlling element in determining, at least on a bill of equity, whether or not the covenant shall bind subsequent owners of the property.
2. Consideration for an agreement by a railroad company and other parties about to construct a railroad from a mine to a furnace and from the furnace to an established railroad, that they will ship all their products at reasonable rates over the latter railroad, may be found in the purchase by the owner of the old road of a certain quantity of the bonds of the new company at par in order to supply funds for the enterprise.
3. A contract to give all the traffic of certain mines and furnaces and of a railroad therefrom, at reasonable rates, to another and connecting railroad which furnishes aid to develop the business, is not ultra vires or in violation of Const., art. 17, §§ 1, 3, and 4, requiring railroads to carry each other's traffic without discrimination, and prohibiting discrimination in transportation for individuals, and prohibiting the consolidation of parallel and competing roads.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Centre County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to enjoin defendants from violating an alleged contract to give plaintiffs the traffic from certain iron works. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John Blanchard and David W. Sellers, for appellants:

The court erred in holding that the Valentine Iron Company does not sustain either privity of contract or estate with the covenantors or covenantees in the agreement of March 22, 1887, and that the plaintiffs are strangers in title to the land owned by the Valentine Iron Company.

In the English note to Spencer's Case, in 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 9th Am. ed. pp. 186-188, it is pointed out that in the English case of Minshull v. Oakes, 2 Hurlst. & N. 793, the court of exchequer has not only expressed an opinion that the rule announced by Coke as having been decided in Spencer's Case is unreasonable, but has also suggested that that case itself decided the contrary.

At page 208, in the American note, it is said: "It may be observed that the question of whether it is necessary to covenant for 'assigns,' as to anything not in esse at the time of the covenant, discussed in the first and second resolutions of the leading case, has generally been passed over lightly in this country, and the use of the word "assigns," considered of little importance if an intention that the covenant run can be gathered from the whole instrument."

Masury v. Southworth, 9 Ohio St. 340; Bradford Oil Co. v. Blair, 113 Pa. 83, 57 Am. Rep. 442.

The "privity of estate," held to be essential in courts of common-law jurisdiction to sustain a covenant running with the land against a subsequent grantee of the land, is understood, in the best-considered authorities of the present day, in a sense very much modified from that defined and exemplified in the earlier cases.

Bronson v. Coffin, 108 Mass. 175, 11 Am. Rep. 835, 118 Mass. 156; Savage v. Mason, 3 Cush. 500; Horn v. Miller, 9 L. R. A. 810, 186 Pa. 640; Webb v. Bennett's Branch Imp. Co. 161 Pa. 623.

While in the courts of common-law jurisdiction privity of estate in this modified and modern sense is held to be essential in order to cause an otherwise proper covenant to run with the land, in equity jurisprudence the rule is different.

It may be well said in regard to this case, in the language of the Pennsylvania case of Horn v. Miller, supra, that "the benefit and the burden are so inseparably connected that each is necessary to the existence of the other," that "both must go together," that "the liability to the burden will be a necessary incident to the right to the benefit."

Coleman v. Coleman, 19 Pa. 101, 57 Am. Dec. 641.

As to the principles involved where a lease by the mortgagor is prior and where it is subsequent to the mortgage, see—

Moss v. Gallimore, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 6th Am. ed. p. 843; 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 9th Am. ed. p. 883.

As regards the application of these principles to covenants running with the land, made by the mortgagor, it may be noted that the English decisions have so far adhered to the old common-law ideas above adverted to as to hold that an equity of redemption will neither carry the benefit nor burden of covenants running with land to an assignee from the mortgagor.

tionate amounts of $634,850 in stock of the new company issued in shares of the par value of $50. By this change the railroad companies, plaintiffs, became stockholders in the amount proportionate to their $75,000 purchase of bonds. The new company continued the same relations with the railroad companies from the date of its organization down to the winter of 1892-93.

On the 11th of May, 1889, the "Central Pennsylvania Railroad Company" was incorporated to construct a railroad from Mill Hall, in Clinton county, to Unionville, in Centre county, a distance of about twenty-five miles, located with a view to form a connection with the Nittany Valley Railroad near Bellefonte and the Beech Creek Railroad near Mill Hall. The last-named railroad is, in its terminals and connections, a competitor of the plaintiff railroad companies. The plaintiffs averred that the Valentine Iron Company, since the beginning of the year 1893, has encouraged the construction of the Central Pennsylvania Railroad financially and otherwise; J. W. Gephart, the president of the iron company, being also the president of the railroad company, is also acting as superintendent of the work of construction of the competing road and is the chief representative of the undertaking; that the Nittany Valley Railroad, in 1891, was leased to the Valentine Iron Company and is operated by the iron company. That the Valentine Iron Company threatens to give the traffic coming and going to the mines and furnace for transportation over the Central Pennsylvania, and thence by its connections, over the lines of competing roads.

The plaintiffs aver that the acts of defendants are in violation of their covenants in the agreement of March 23, 1887, and pray that they be restrained by injunction. The defendants demurred to the bill:

1. Because, by the sale on the mortgage, they took the property free and discharged from all the covenants of the agreement, the agreement having been executed subsequent to the mortgage.

2. The purchaser at the mortgage sale took the land discharged of the covenants, therefore every other party to the agreement was released.

3. That the agreement was without consideration and is therefore void.

4. The agreement was against public policy.

5. It was in violation of article 17 of the Constitution and is not enforceable in law or equity.

6. That the Nittany Valley Railroad did not covenant not to aid in the construction of competitive lines of railroad.

7. That the restraint of the construction of competitive lines, whether by moral support or otherwise, is illegal.

8. That to enjoin defendants from giving traffic to a common carrier, under the laws of the commonwealth, is in restraint of trade.

9. There is an adequate remedy at law.

The court below, after argument, sustained the first, fourth, fifth, and eighth grounds of demurrer and entered a decree dismissing the bill, and from that decree plaintiff appeals, 29 L. R. A.

assigning sixteen errors to the decree and opinion of the court.

The bill sets out the facts in substance as we have stated them, and it follows from the demurrer that defendants admit them as averred.

The opinion of the learned judge of the court below is in good part devoted to demonstrating that the covenant to transport the traffic to and from the ore lands and furnace over plaintiff's lines and not to aid and encourage the construction of other or rival roads to the source of the traffic, is not a covenant real which runs with the land, binding upon the heir, successor, or assignee, but is a mere personal covenant binding only upon the parties to it. Spencer's Case, the leading case, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 9th Am. ed. p. 174, with many of the cases cited in the notes to the leading case, and others which do not there appear, are relied on as authority for this holding. Spencer's Case is taken from 5 Coke, 16, as reported by Coke, who says that among other questions it was decided: "Where the assignee shall be bound without naming him and where not; and where he shall be bound, although he be expressly named, and where not." It then appears from the case that the second of the seven resolutions adopted by the court is: "If the lessee had covenanted for him and his assigns that they would make a new wall upon some part of the thing demised, that forasmuch as it is to be done upon the land demised, that it should bind the assignee; for, although the covenant doth extend to a thing to be newly made, yet it is to be made upon the thing demised, and the assignee is to take the benefit of it, and therefore shall bind the assignee by express words. . . . But although the covenant be for him and his assigns, yet if the thing to be done be merely collateral to the land and doth not touch or concern the thing demised, in any sort, there the assignee shall not be charged."

This case, decided three hundred years ago, as with many of the cases at that time, bases its conclusions, in the main, on the results arrived at by the ratiocination of the judge. They assumed certain premises and if, from these, a certain conclusion was reached then the judgment was for plaintiff or defendant; as, for instance in the first resolution, "When the covenant extends to a thing in esse, parcel of the demise, the thing to be done by force of the covenant is quodammodo annexed and appurtenant to the thing demised, shall go with the land and bind the assignee, although he be not bound by express words." Here the assignee is bound, although the covenantor hath not so said; then the same resolution goes on, "But when the covenant extends to a thing not in being at the time of the demise made, it cannot be appurtenant or annexed to the thing which hath no being." Here the covenant does not bind the assignee, although the covenantor hath so said. Resort was had to the instrument to ascertain the subject of the contract and when that was settled on, a contract was made by the judges for the parties without much regard to what the parties said; they looked not for the expressed intention with a view to giving it effect in the judgment, but adopted a conclusion based often on an artificial or arbitrary rule of construction and this conclusion moulded the judgment; the intention was subordinated to the rule. As shown by the large number of cases, both in England and this country, cited by the able editors of the notes to Spencer's Case, there has been more or less of a struggle by the courts in the three centuries which have elapsed since that decision was announced to escape from its application, and very often, if the rule defeated the manifest intent of the parties, some distinction was found or assumed which warranted a disregard of it; and in some cases where the rule, if invoked, would plainly shut the door against equity, the door was closed against this rule. Like the arbitrary ancient rules, in Shelley's Case [1 Coke, 106], in Twyne's Case [3 Coke, 80], and others, it has been given such flexibility by so many later decisions that, without overruling well-decided cases, it is impossible to rigidly apply it at this day even in common-law actions. Whether under our system of administering equity, if this were an action at law, Spencer's Case would rule it on the facts, it is not important to decide. This is not an action at law, but a bill in equity, and the controlling element is the intention of the parties to the covenant, and so it is laid down by many of both the English and American decisions, some of them cited in the notes to Spencer's Case. In the note on page 198, English notes, it is said: "In Tulk v. Mozhay, 2 Phil. Ch. 774, it was laid down by Lord Cottenham that a covenant made by the purchaser of land that he and his assignee would use or abstain from using the land in a particular way, may be enforced in equity against all purchasers without reference to the question whether the covenant ran with the land." And it is remarked by the editor that Keppell v. Bailey, 2 Myl. & K. 517, in the court of chancery, a case cited and relied on by the court below and appellees in this case, is overruled by Tulk v. Mozhay, and the latter case has been since followed and extended.

Take the facts as they are averred in the bill in equity and as they are here admitted by the demurrer: 1. The complainants contributed $75,000 for the development of the ore land and the construction of a furnace and railroad. 2. The furnace and railroad were constructed, were put in operation, and ore mines, from which was obtained ore to run the furnace, opened. 3. The property was sold on a mortgage antedating the agreement and $75,000 contribution about seven months. 4. Those who had the legal title and equity of redemption made the contract, by which they secured plaintiffs' money, and, in consideration therefor, covenanted for themselves, successors, and assigns in the nature of a covenant to run with the land, to give all traffic coming to or going from the ore lands and furnace to plaintiff's lines. 5. The Valentine Iron Company, the present assignee of the property from the sheriff's vendee, from January, 1891, for nearly two years, accepted all the benefits derivable from this contract as shippers and affirmed it. 6. Defendants refuse absolutely to perform the covenants entered into by their predecessors in title, although the very existence of the property occupied and enjoyed by them was created in part by the large contribution of defendants. 7. There is no adequate remedy at law for a persistent violation of such a covenant.

Should the facts, as they thus appear, move the conscience of a chancellor to afford relief to the injured party? We do not consider it important that by the judicial sale and reorganization of those interested, under a new charter, the nominal identity of the actual parties to the covenant and those now in possession has been changed. The averment of affirmance of the contract by the present defendants is admitted by the pleadings. That the affirmance of a traffic contract touching land rests in parol, will not prevent the interposition of equitable principles even where the contract post-dated a lien through which the defendant claimed title.

In Campbell v. Hand, 49 Pa. 284, adjoining owners of land on opposite banks of a stream agreed to build and keep in repair a dam for the use of both; on a judgment against one of them, antedating the agreement, his interest was sold at sheriff's sale; the sheriff's vendee used the dam, as did the debtor in the judgment; the court below held the sheriff's vendee bound to contribute to the repairs, because he had, by the use of the dam, affirmed the agreement; this court, Thompson, J., says: "I will not undertake to say the contract created covenants running with the land because the covenantor could not undertake to impose a covenant or duty that might not be divested by a sale of the premises so incumbered by a prior judgment, a sale on which would carry back the title to a period coeval with the date of the lien."

Now, why should not the assent of the sheriff's vendee and that of the remaining co-tenant be sufficient to continue the original covenants in their original efficiency? I do not think it is a sufficient negative of the inquiry to say the remedy on the covenants is not pursued."

What would have been the effect of a denial of any affirmance of this contract by the sheriff's vendee, or these defendants, we are not called upon to say; we decide the point on their admission of the affirmance of it.

Nor is the contract as contended by appellees, and as held by the court below, without consideration; the preliminary statements to the stipulations show the value of the consideration. The land association and iron company, with the Nittany Valley Railroad Company, are about to construct the railroad from the furnace to the mines on the land, and from the furnace to a connection with the plaintiffs' lines; they are about to complete a furnace or furnaces partly built; for the purpose of securing funds, they have placed a mortgage to secure $600,000; they cannot carry out their project with a paper mortgage; they want the money which it is to secure; plaintiffs give them $75,000 and agree to carry their products at reasonable rates; if any dispute arises about what is reasonable, they agree to the establishment of a tribunal to determine the dispute without resort to the courts. In consideration of this aid in the development of their property, defendants agree to give them their traffic. Without such development—the railroad to carry the ore from the mines to the furnace head, and from the casting house to market—their property, for present enjoyment, is useless; by the stipulated aid, it is valuable. This is an ample consideration.

It is held by the court below the contract is in violation of sections 1, 3, and 4 of article 17 of the Constitution. The first section provides that all railroads, as common carriers, shall carry each other's traffic without discrimination. There is nothing in the agreement which contravenes this provision; the railroad company must carry such freight as a shipper offers it; if freight by the public be routed over its road to destination by way of the Central Pennsylvania Railroad, it must so forward it; it is not averred in the bill that the contract is to the contrary.

Section 3 of the same article provides that all individuals shall have equal rights to transportation without discrimination. The bill does not seek to deprive the iron company of the right here guaranteed. The right of every shipper is to make a contract with such common carrier as he chooses to carry his goods to destination; if he makes none expressly, the law implies one with the carrier who accepts his goods. But he cannot make contracts with two or more carriers to carry the same goods; if he does, as but one can carry, the others can invoke the law as a remedy for his violation of contract. If he contracts with a railroad to lay its rails to his manufactory or furnace, and furnish him money to aid him in bringing the raw material to the furnace, and he, in consideration, promises to give the railroad the transportation of such manufactured product to market at reasonable rates, how is the shipper deprived of any right? He but exercises the right guaranteed by the constitution; he contracts for the carrying of his own product for shipment to market from his own manufactory, with whom he pleases; the Constitution does not go further and guarantee him a right to violate his contract when he pleases.

How this contract offends against section 4, which prohibits the consolidation of parallel and competing roads, we do not understand, although this is one of the reasons given for declaring the contract void. The Nittany Valley Railroad, whose traffic is sought by plaintiff, is not a parallel road, but a connecting road, prolonging the plaintiff's reach into new territory; the Central Pennsylvania is parallel to plaintiffs' line; it has no contract either for traffic or consolidation with plaintiffs. The right of one road to lease, make traffic contracts with, or consolidate with connecting roads not parallel or competing has not for thirty-four years been doubted, that we know of; the Act of April 23, 1861, expressly confers such right and the constitution does not affect it, except to prohibit the consolidation and leasing of parallel and competing lines. The rights of connecting roads, under this act, have been recognized many times since the adoption of the Constitution of 1874; and that contracts for through business, both freight and passenger, between connecting roads and shipper, are not only not ultra vires, but that they, on the contrary, have for their basis sound business principles; and special contracts may be made with a special class of shippers to secure business. See Fitchburg R. Co. v. Gage, 12 Gray, 399; Hersh v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 74 Pa. 181; Munhall v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 92 Pa. 150; Hoover v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 158 Pa. 220, 23 L. R. A. 263. In this last case the contract was with a manufacturing company for a special rate on coal used for manufacturing purposes; the contract was made eight years before the suit, with a view to the building up and development of the plant. This court, in a most exhaustive opinion by our brother Green, in which nearly all the authorities on the subject are noticed, held that special contracts for a special rate with a manufactory for the transportation of fuel was not undue discrimination; that blast furnaces, iron mills and rail factories are encouraged and built up in sparsely settled regions by the aid of such contracts. While the question of discrimination does not arise in this case, the same principle is involved. Is a contract by a railroad company with an iron company, in which the former contributes a large sum of money to the latter for development, and gives to it facilities for transportation, in consideration of which the iron company contracts to give it all its traffic, ultra vires? It is not in restraint of trade, for its express purpose and necessary effect are to increase both trade and population; not a single traveler or shipper, outside the contracting party, is affected in his selection of a route; the contract binds none of them.

It is not seldom those who have reaped benefits from a contract such as this seek to escape its obligation by taking refuge in that assumed turpitude, which, on grounds of public policy, avoids the contract; but here, and it is a gratification to us to say it, the parties to this contract violated no law; restrained not others from engaging in business; did nothing of evil example or detrimental to public morals; therefore, there is no public policy which, in the absence of express legislative enactment, makes void this contract; as there, clearly, is no adequate remedy at law for repeated or continued violations of the defendants' covenants, they ought to be enforced in equity, to the extent equity will take cognizance of their violation.

While the covenant to ship over plaintiffs' lines on the faith of which plaintiffs enlarged their facilities for shipment and paid their money will be enforced, our decree will go no further. The Central Pennsylvania Railroad is a corporation under the laws of the commonwealth authorized to construct a line of railroad between certain terminals; its manifest duty is to construct its road for the benefit of the general public; no citizen can be restrained from giving its construction moral and material aid; public policy demands that it shall fulfill the objects of its being. Admit that the officers of defendant company are giving it moral aid and encouragement because its construction will make it possible for defendants to violate their contract for shipment; this, at most, shows disregard of a moral obligation without an infraction of the legal one, the actual shipment; the latter, equity can control, the former, it will not, both on grounds of public policy, and because its process would, to a great extent, be ineffectual; we cannot prevent men wanting to violate their contracts, while we can prevent the overt acts which constitute the breach; equity can enforce a tangible, substantial right of property under a contract, but it cannot make men good, and it is a very rare case in which it even tries to. With these defendants, however, who have pleaded, the case is different; we can restrain them from a flagrant violation of an essential covenant of their contract; the Nittany Valley Railroad Company and the Valentine Iron Company affirmed the original contract which, in fact, gave them a business existence; they are bound to give their traffic to plaintiffs; this much of the contract is within the grasp of equity.

Therefore, the decrees of the court below sustaining the demurrer is reversed and set aside at costs of appellees, and it is adjudged and decreed that an injunction issue, directed to the Nittany Valley Railroad and the Valentine

Iron Company, their and each of their officers, agents, and employes, including the said J. W. Gephart, president of the Valentine Iron Company, restraining them from giving any traffic coming from or going to points upon the railroad of the said Nittany Valley Railroad, or coming to or going from the mines and furnaces of the said Valentine Iron Company, that may be owned or controlled by the said company and originating upon said lands mentioned and described in agreement of 22d of March, 1887, to the said Central Pennsylvania Railroad Company or to any company or persons other than to the said plaintiffs. It is further ordered that the said contract be specifically performed in this respect; they, the said Nittany Valley Railroad Company and the said Valentine Iron Company, are hereby ordered and directed to give all traffic coming or going to points upon said railroad, or coming to or going from the property, mines, and furnaces of the said iron company, in so far as said traffic originates with or is controlled by them, the said companies, to them the said plaintiffs, their successors or assigns. It is further ordered this record and decree be remitted to the court below, that our order and decree may be carried into effect.

Petition to modify decree so as to permit further pleadings denied.

GLOBE MILLING & REDUCTION CO.

1. "A nonresident's shares of stock in a foreign corporation cannot be reached by attachment in a state where the corporation is doing business, although its officers are also in such state.
2. A by-law giving the corporation the first right to purchase stock which is for sale by any of its members is not valid under a statute specifying several subjects upon which by-laws may be enacted, but making no reference to the question of stock transfers.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William H. Sweetland, for plaintiff:

It is beyond the power of a corporation to make such by-laws unless specially authorized by its charter as in case of Sweetland v. Quidnick Company, considered in 11 R. I. 828, or when such power is given by general statutory

An agreement or contract between the members or a part of them not to sell except upon certain conditions is valid, unless it amounts to an unreasonable restraint of trade.

An agreement of this sort was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States as valid.

Taft v. Mills, 5 R. I. 893.

In Young v. South Predegar Iron Co., 85 Tenn. 189, a foreign corporation doing business in the state, in conformity with certain statutes, was deemed to be subject, like a domestic corporation, to the attachment of its stock.

The stock in a corporation can be attached by garnishment.

Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 404; Geyer v. Western Ins. Co. 3 Pittsb. 41.

Tillinghast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The pleadings in this case present two questions for our decision, namely: First, is the stock of a nonresident, in a foreign corporation, doing business in this state, attachable here? And, second, are the by-laws of the defendant corporation, set up in its 29 L. R. A.

third special plea in bar, taken in connection with the statutes of the state of Maine relating to the transfer of stock in corporations, which are also pleaded, effectual to prevent William R. Stearns, the assignor of the stock in question, from transferring the same to the plaintiff by a mere indorsement and delivery thereof so as to confer upon him the right to maintain this action? The first and second pleas set up as an excuse for the refusal of said defendant corporation to transfer said stock the fact that at the time of the making of the request by the plaintiff for said transfer said stock was under two attachments, as the property of said Stearns, and hence that it could not safely transfer the same. The third plea sets up that the defendant corporation was organized August 10, 1892, under the laws of the state of Maine, at Saco, by articles of agreement or association, to which articles said Stearns was a subscribing party; and that in the proceedings of organization he participated, and was then and there elected president and a director of said corporation, which offices he filled during the ensuing year; and that then and there, as a part of the proceedings of the organization of said company, certain by-laws were unanimously adopted by said Stearns and the other incorporators of said company in relation to the transfer of stock and other matters, among which by-laws were the following: "Article 3. Capital Stock. Sec. 2. No stockholder shall assign and transfer his stock, or any part thereof, to any person, unless he shall first offer the same to the corporation at the lowest price at which he is willing to sell and assign the same. If in thirty days after such offer shall have been made in writing to the corporation, said corporation shall refuse or neglect to purchase the stock so offered, the owner thereof may sell and transfer the same to any other person at not less than the price stated in said offer. Sec. 3. Shares may be transferred by indorsement on the certificates of stock and delivery thereof, but shall not be valid (except between the parties thereto) until the same shall be recorded in proper form upon the books of the corporation. Upon surrender, a new certificate or certificates shall be issued, and the surrendered certificate or certificates shall be canceled, and replaced and secured in the certificate book." Said third plea then proceeds to state that said by-laws had been adopted and were in force at the time and before the time when the certificates of stock mentioned and described in the declaration, or any certificate of stock in the said corporation, had been issued, and that all said certificates were and are subject to said by-laws and the provisions thereof, which by-laws, from their said adoption till now, have been continuously in force, of which by-laws and the operation thereof said Stearns and said plaintiff, at and before the sale set out in plaintiff's declaration, had knowledge; that said Stearns had not, before said alleged sale, offered to said corporation his said stock at any price whatever, nor had he in any manner complied with said by-laws concerning the transfer of his said stock, of which noncompliance with said by-laws by said Stearns the plaintiff had knowledge at the time of and before said sale; wherefore the defendant, having said lien of option upon said stock by reason of said by-law, declined to register said transfer of said stock, because said Stearns had, as aforesaid, failed to comply with said by-law relating to said transfers. Said plea, as amended by agreement of the parties since the hearing of the case, also sets up the statutes of the state of Maine in force at the time of the organization of the defendant corporation, relating to the organization and management of corporations, viz. chapter 48, §§ 16-19.

As to the first question. We think it is well settled that shares of stock owned by a nonresident defendant in a foreign corporation cannot be reached by process of attachment, although the officers of the corporation are within the state, and the business of the corporation is being carried on here. The situs of the stock, for the purposes of attachment and execution, is the domicile of the corporation, and that place only. See Cook, Stock & Stockholders, 8d ed. § 486, and cases cited; Plimpton v. Bigelow, 98 N. Y. 592; 23 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 632, and cases cited; Winslow v. Fletcher, 58 Conn. 394, 55 Am. Rep. 122.

A corporation can have but one legal residence, and that must be within the state or sovereignty creating it, although, by comity, it may be allowed to do business, through its officers and agents, in other jurisdictions. Chafee v. Fourth Nat. Bank of New York, 71 Me. 514, 36 Am. Rep. 345. Our statute which authorizes "the attachment of the shares of the defendant in any corporation," etc. (Judiciary Act, chap. 38, § 20), "is to be construed," as said by the court in Plimpton v. Bigelow, supra, concerning a similar statute of New York, "in view of the fundamental principle upon which all attachment proceedings rest, that the res must be actually or constructively within the jurisdiction of the court issuing the attachment, in order to any valid or effectual seizure under the process." See also Taft v. Mills, 5 R. I. 393. In the case at bar the stock in question was neither actually nor constructively in this state at the time of the attempted attachment thereof, and hence the proceeding was a nullity. And this statement is equally applicable to the attempted proceeding by trustee process or garnishment, set out in the pleadings, as to the said attachment proceeding; although we do not wish to be understood as intimating that shares of stock in a corporation can be reached in this way. In this connection, see Lowell, Transfer of Stock, § 9, and cases cited.

As to the second question. We do not think the defendant corporation had power to enact the by-law first above quoted. Section 6 of chapter 46 of the Statutes of Maine, set up in the defendant's third special plea, provides that "corporations may determine by their by-laws the manner of calling and conducting meetings; the number of members that constitute a quorum; the number of votes to be given by the shareholders; the tenure of office of the several officers; the mode of voting by proxy, and of selling shares for neglect to pay assessments; and may enforce such by-laws by penalties not exceeding twenty dollars." And the rule is that where, by the provisions of the particular charter, or by a general statute relating to corporations, power is conferred upon a corporation to enact by-laws for certain specified purposes, its power of legislation is limited to the cases and objects enumerated, all others being extended by implication. "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius." See Angell & A. Corp. 5th ed. § 325; Child v. Hudson's Bay Co. 2 P. Wms. 207; Kennebec & P. R. Co. v. Kendall, 81 Me. 470; Chouteau Spring Co. v. Harris, 20 Mo. 882.

The defendant corporation, then, having no power to enact the by-law in question, it becomes unnecessary to consider whether or not it was a reasonable enactment, as contended by defendant's counsel.

The defendant's demurrers to plaintiff's replications to the first and second pleas are overruled, and said replications are sustained, and the plaintiff's demurrer to the defendant's third plea is sustained, and the plea overruled, and the case remitted to the common pleas division for further proceedings.

Letters and telegrams which constitute an offer and acceptance of a proposition complete in its terms may constitute a binding contract, although there is an understanding that the agreement shall be expressed in a formal writing, and one of the parties afterwards refuses to sign such an agreement without material modifications.

(Earl, Gray, and Bartlett, JJ., dissent.)

(December 18, 1894.)

NOTE.—Sufficiency of contract by offer and acceptance without execution of contemplated formal instrument.

While there are some expressions in the decisions upon this subject which are difficult to reconcile, the decisions are divisible into classes which are quite harmonious and which leave very little actual conflict.

General statements of the law.

Where the parties orally agree upon the terms of the contract and there is a final assent thereto so that no variation can be introduced into the writing except by mutual consent, the mere suggestion or intention to put it in writing at a subsequent time is not of itself sufficient to show that they did not mean the oral contract to be

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, affirming a judgment entered upon the report of the referee in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged breach of a contract to purchase apples. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Eugene M. Bartlett for appellants. Mr. George W. Daggett, for respondent:

Where the minds of the parties do not meet upon the whole and exact terms of a contract, it is not binding.

Fullerton v. Dalton, 58 Barb. 286, affirmed 49 N. Y. 659.

complete and binding without being put in writing. Parties may, however, agree verbally upon the terms of a contract, and yet stipulate that it is not to be binding until put in writing; in such case such a stipulation becomes an operative term of contract, and unless reduced to writing and signed by the parties does not constitute a complete and binding agreement. Hodges v. Sublett, 91 Ala. 588.

The distinction is manifest between those cases in which there is a complete verbal contract which the law does not require to be in writing and a subsequent agreement that it should be reduced to writing, and those in which it is part of the bargain that the contract shall be reduced to writing. In the first class of cases the original verbal contract is in no manner impaired by the failure to carry out the agreement and put it in writing. In the second class of cases the final contract is suspended, the contract is inchoate, incomplete, and it cannot be enforced until it is signed by all the parties. Fredericks v. Farnacht, 30 La. Ann. 117.

The question always is, Did the parties mean to contract by their correspondence, or were they only settling the terms of an agreement into which they proposed to enter after all its particulars were adjusted, which was then to be formally drawn up, and by which alone they designed to be bound. Lyman v. Robinson, 14 Allen, 242.

The question is merely one of intention. If the party sought to be charged, intended to close a contract prior to the formal signing of a written draft, or if he signified such an intention to the other party, he would be bound by the contract actually made, though the signing of the written draft be omitted. If, on the other hand, he neither had, nor signified any such intention to close the contract until it was fully expressed in a written instrument and attested by signatures, then he will not be bound until the signatures are affixed. If the written draft is viewed by the parties merely as a convenient record of their previous contract, its absence does not affect the binding force of their contract, if, however, it is viewed as the consummation of the negotiation, there is no contract until the written draft is finally signed. Mississippi & D. S. S. Co. Limited v. Swift, 86 Me. 243.

But in May v. Thomson, L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 706, 51 L. J. Ch. 917, 47 L. T. N. S. 286, the master of the rolls says it very often happens that both parties use expressions in letters which, read alone, would amount to a contract, if we did not know that in fact neither of the parties intended those general expressions to constitute a contract, and in that case if the court lays hold of the letters to make a contract, it makes a contract for the parties which the parties never intended to enter into.

Suggestion of formal contract.

An acceptance and proposal of a more formal mode of carrying the acceptance into execution 29 L. R. A.

Where a correspondence is intended only to settle preliminaries which are to be reduced to a formal agreement to be executed by the parties, then the proffer and acceptance of these preliminaries do not constitute a contract.

Commercial Teleg. Co. v. Smith, 47 Hun, 494; Kirwan v. Byrne, 9 Misc. 76; Fullerton v. Dalton, supra.

While each party continues to propose to other additional unsatisfied terms no contract is consummated and no recovery can be made thereon.

Templeton v. Wile, 23 N. Y. S. R. 251.

To create a contract by correspondence the answer must be as specific as the proposition.

will not destroy the contract. Gibbins v. North Eastern Metropolitan Asylum Dist. Board of Management, 11 Beav. 1, 17 L. J. Ch. N. S. 5, 12 Jur. 22.

An intimation in a written acceptance of a tender, that a contract would be afterwards prepared, does not prevent the parties from becoming bound to perform the terms of the tender and acceptance respectively mentioned, if the intention of the parties was thereby to enter into an agreement, and if the preparation of the contract was contemplated merely for the purpose of expressing the agreement, already arrived at in formal language. Lewis v. Brass, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 667, 37 L. T. N. S. 788, 26 Week. Rep. 152.

The mere fact that in the course of the correspondence reference has been made to a more formal agreement will not prevent the enforcement of the contract if a definite contract has been arrived at in the letters. Cayley v. Walpole, 23 L. T. N. S. 903, 39 L. J. Ch. 609, 18 Week. Rep. 782.

The mere fact that a telegram of acceptance conveys the idea that there will be a writing does not prevent the acceptance from being a binding contract. Dalrymple v. Scott, 19 Ont. App. Rep. 477.

Mere reference to the preparation of a formal contract will not negative the idea that the parties have already bound themselves to its performance. Obeney v. Eastern Transp. Line, 59 Md. 567.

Where the parties have assented to all the terms of the contract the mere reference to a future contract in writing does not negative the existence of a present contract. If the parties make an agreement which they intend to be binding on them at the time, effect will be given to it, although they intend that it shall be superseded by a more formal written contract. Green v. Cole, 108 Mo. 70.

Understanding that there is to be a formal contract.

The majority of the decisions go farther than to hold that failure to comply with a suggestion that there shall be a formal contract will not destroy the obligation, and hold that an understanding between the parties that there is to be a formal contract will not defeat an obligation which has been assumed without the intended formality.

When a complete contract has been made orally, the fact that it is expected that a written contract will afterwards be signed, embodying the terms of the oral one, does not prevent the oral one from taking effect. Cohn v. Plumer, 88 Wis. 622.

If there has been a final agreement, the terms of which are evidenced in a manner to satisfy the statute of frauds, the agreement will be binding although the parties may have declared that the writing is to serve only as instructions for a formal agreement, or although it may be an express term that a formal agreement should be prepared and signed by the parties. As soon as the fact is established of the final mutual assent of the parties to certain terms, and those terms are evidenced by a writing signed by the party to be

Brown v. Norton, 50 Hun, 248; Hough v. Brown, 19 N. Y. 111; Brown v. New York Cent. R. Co. 44 N. Y. 79.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in this action sought to recover damages for the breach of a contract for the sale and delivery of a quantity of apples. The complaint was dismissed by the referee, and his judgment was affirmed upon appeal. The only question to be considered is whether the contract stated in the complaint, as the basis for damages, was ever in fact made, so as to become binding upon the parties. On the 28th of October, 1891, the charged or his agent lawfully authorized, there exist all the materials which the court requires to make a legal binding contract. But if to a proposal or offer an assent be given to a provision as to a contract, then the stipulation as to the contract is a term of the assent, and there is no agreement independent of that stipulation. Chinnock v. Marchioness of Rly, 4 De G. J. & S. 633.

In Thomas v. Dering, 1 Jur. 211, 1 Keen, 729, 6 L. J. Ch. N. S. 297, it is said: "It is true that mention is made in the letters of an intended formal contract to be afterwards drawn up. But there are many cases in which a correspondence referring to the future execution of a more formal agreement has been held to constitute in itself a valid contract, and I think that the correspondence is equivalent to a contract in the present case."

If the parties have reached an agreement it will be binding on them unless one of the very terms of the agreement itself is that it shall not be concluded until a solicitor intervened and drew a formal agreement. Rositer v. Miller, 3 App. Cas. 1124, 48 L. J. Ch. 10, 39 L. T. N. S. 173, 23 Week. Rep. 865.

If parties have entered into an agreement they are not the less bound by it because they say they will send it to a solicitor to have it reduced to form. But when parties negotiate and do not say so, the mere fact that they do send it to a solicitor to have it reduced into form affords cogent evidence that they do not intend to bind themselves till it has been reduced into form. Ridgway v. Wharton, 6 H. L. Cas. 238, 4 Jur. N. S. 173, 27 L. J. Ch. 46.

The fact that an express contract contemplates a more formal contract with a corporation in which the contractee is largely interested, does not affect its binding power. Drummond v. Crane, 23 L. R. A. 707, 159 Mass. 577.

Where an agreement is in all other respects complete (and in the absence of any understanding between the parties that the same shall not be complete until reduced to writing) it will bind the parties, although it may have been understood between them that the agreement shall afterwards be formally reduced to writing, and executed. Blaney v. Hoke, 14 Ohio St. 292.

If the agreement is put in writing, and signed, the mere fact that the parties agree to have it examined by a lawyer and such changes made as are necessary to put it in legal form will not render it unenforceable. Mackey v. Mackey, 20 Gratt. 153.

In Heyworth v. Knight, 17 C. B. N. S. 294, 10 Jur. N. S. 866, Earle, Ch. J., says something was said about the letters not constituting a binding contract, because a more regular and extended contract was contemplated. That notion, however, is totally at variance with the law as laid down by many cases in the court of queen's bench, where the broker's book has been allowed to be resorted to for evidence of the contract, when the parties intended to contract 29 L. R. A.

plaintiffs submitted to the defendant the following proposition in writing: "Buffalo, N. Y., Oct. 28, 1891. Messrs. Pottlitzler Bros. Fruit Co., Lafayette, Ind.—Gentlemen: We offer you ten car loads of apples, to be from 175 to 200 barrels per car, put up in good order, from stock inspected by your Mr. Leo Pottlitzler at Nunda and Silver Springs. The apples not to exceed one half green fruit, balance red fruit, to be shipped as follows: First car between 1st and 15th December, 1891; second car between 15th and 30th of December, 1891; and one car each ten days after January 1, 1892, until all are shipped. Dates above specified to be considered as approximate a few days either by means of bought and sold notes, where there has been a variance between those documents. And Byles, J., said: "I can see no principle, nor am I aware of any authority for saying, that a contract in writing which is sufficient within the statute of frauds can be invalidated or affected by a subsequent abortive attempt to put it in a more formal shape. The mere fact of an agreement providing for a more complete and formal development of the intention of the parties cannot of itself prevent the operation of the preliminary contract; it has been repeatedly so held in cases of contracts for leases."

If instructions are given to cable confirmation, the cablegram, and not the bought and sold notes which are to be exchanged to avoid "any possible mistake," will be the conclusion of the contract. Darlington Iron Co. v. Foote, 16 Fed. Rep. 644.

If a complete contract has been formed, the mere fact that the parties agree to put it in writing, and that this agreement is subsequently broken, will not prevent its being enforced. Bell v. Offutt, 10 Bush, 633.

If the oral agreement is perfect when the proposition to reduce to writing is made, the binding force will not be affected by failure to comply with the proposition. Avendano v. Arthur, 30 La. Ann. 316.

If it does not appear that either party contemplates the insertion in the formal contract of any stipulation upon which the minds have not already met, and which are not substantially inserted in the letters, nor that either party believed any further writing necessary to create a contract, then the execution of the former writing will not be necessary to bind the parties. Lawrence v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 34 Wis. 427.

Where some terms unsettled.

If the contract is not complete of course it will not be binding until the missing terms are added.

If the negotiations only cover part of the terms to be settled by the contract, and the understanding is that the other terms shall be settled and put into a formal contract, and those terms cannot afterwards be agreed upon, there will be no enforceable contract between the parties. Connery v. Best, 1 Cab. & El. 291.

If the formal contract which is to constitute the contract contains terms which are never agreed upon, and one of the parties at all times insists on them, there will be no binding contract, although the correspondence between the parties settles some of the terms of the alleged contract. Jones v. Daniel [1894] 2 Ch. 332.

No contract ought to be held established if it is clear upon the facts that there were other conditions of an intended contract beyond and besides those expressed in the letters, and without the settlement of which the parties had no idea of concluding any agreement. Hussey v. Horre-Payne, way, at the price of $2.00 per barrel, free on board cars at Silver Springs and Nunda, in refrigerator cars; this proposition to be accepted not later than the 31st inst., and you to pay us $500 upon acceptance of the proposition, to be deducted from the purchase price of apples at the rate of $100 per car on the last five cars. Yours respectfully, J. Sanders & Son." To this proposition the defendant replied by telegraph on October 31st as follows: "Lafayette, Ind., 31st October. J. Sanders & Son: We accept your proposition on apples, provided you will change it to read car every eight days from January first, none in December; wire acceptance. Pottlitzer Bros.' Fruit Co." On the same day the plaintiffs replied to this dispatch, to the effect that they could not accept the modification proposed, but must insist upon the original offer. On the same day the defendant answered the plaintiff's telegram as follows: "Can only accept condition as stated in last message. Only way we can accept. Answer if accepted. Mail contract, and we will then forward draft. Pottlitzer Bros.' Fruit Co." The matter thus rested till November 4th, when the plaintiffs received the following letter from the defendant: "Lafayette, Ind., November 2, 1891. J. Sanders & Son, Stafford, N. Y.—Gents: We are in receipt of your telegrams, also your favor of the 31st ult. While we no doubt think we have offered you a fair contract on apples, still the dictator of this has learned on his return home that there are so many near-by apples coming into market that it will affect the sale of apples in December, and therefore we do not think it advisable to take the contract, unless you made it read for shipment from the 1st of January. We are very sorry you cannot do this, but perhaps we will be able to take some fruit from you, as we will need it in the spring. If you can change the contract so as to read as we wired you, we will accept it, and forward you draft in payment on same. Pottlitzer Fruit Co." On receipt of this letter the plaintiffs sent the following message to the defendant by telegraph: "November 4th. Pottlitzer Brothers Fruit Company, Lafayette, Ind.: Letter received. Will accept conditions. If satisfactory, answer, and will forward contract. J. Sanders & Son." The defendant replied to this message by telegraph, saying: "All right. Send contract as stated in our message."

The plaintiffs did prepare and send on the contract precisely in the terms embraced in the foregoing correspondence, which was the original proposition made by the plaintiffs, as modified by defendant's telegram above set forth, and which was acceded to by the plain-

4 App. Cas. 511, 48 L. J. Ch. 846, 41 L. T. N. S. 1, 27 Week. Rep. 585.

If it is evident that there were unsettled terms there can be no contract between the parties which will be enforced. Bristol. O. & S. Adair Bread Co. v. Magga, L. R. 44 Ch. Div. 618.

If some of the terms of the contract are left to be settled by a formal agreement, the contract will not be enforced. Dennison v. People's Café Co. 45 L. T. N. S. 187.

If there is no concluded agreement between the parties, it cannot be enforced. Bushell v. Pocock, 53 L. T. N. S. 890.

When the agreement is to be reduced to writing, and there is no sufficient evidence from which its exact terms can be determined, it will be inferred that the understanding of the parties was that there was to be no contract until its terms should be reduced to writing. Methudy v. Ross, 10 Mo. App. 101, affirmed 81 Mo. 481.

If material terms have not yet been agreed upon, the contract will not be binding. Bourne v. Shapleigh, 9 Mo. App. 64.

If, from the nature of the correspondence, it appears that such correspondence is to be for the settlement of the preliminaries of a more formal contract, and that it is the intention of the parties that those preliminaries should be reduced to the form of a more formal agreement to be executed by the parties, then the proffer of those preliminaries by the one party, and the acceptance of them by the other, by no means constitute a contract, because it is the intention of the parties that something else should be done before the proposed agreement should become binding. Commercial Teleg. Co. v. Smith, 47 Hun, 494.

Where the execution of a formal contract is one of the terms of the agreement.

If in a public advertisement for bids there is a statement that the successful bidder will have to sign a contract, the mere acceptance of the bid will not bind the bidder. Kingston-upon-Hull Guardians of Poor v. Petch, 10 Exch. 610, 24 L. J. Exch. 23.

If a bid for a payable work is accepted, with the understanding that the contract shall be reduced to writing, there is no contract which will support an action for the price of the building if the writing is not executed. Weits v. Des Moines Independent Dist. 79 Iowa, 422.

If the agreement is made "subject to a formal contract being prepared and signed by both parties as approved by their solicitors," there will be no enforceable contract until such formal one is executed. Hawkesworth v. Chaffey, 54 L. T. N. S. 72, 55 L. J. Ch. 285.

If the party sought to be charged insists at all times upon the contract being reduced to writing, and refuses to sign all drafts presented because they contain terms not agreed upon, he cannot be held bound upon the contract. MacMackin v. Timmins (Pa.) 80 Alb. L. J. 56.

Where the agreement is made by written communications, it must appear from both or some of them to be known to both parties that the execution of the formal lease was to be a condition precedent to the agreement becoming obligatory. Cochrane v. Justice Min. Co. 16 Colo. 415.

There is some apparent conflict in the application of this rule that if the execution of a formal contract is an element of the agreement there will be no contract until it is done, and that mentioned above, that the mere understanding or suggestion that there shall be a formal contract will not make its absence fatal. The point of difference probably comes in the different views of what is necessary to make the execution of a formal contract an element of the agreement. It has been held that—

If by agreement of the parties their negotiations are to be reduced to writing there will be no perfect contract so long as the act of reducing it to writing and signing it remains to be done. Congdon v. Darcy, 46 Vt. 478.

If the intention is expressed by both parties that there shall be a formal written agreement between them, then the correspondence will be simply preliminary, and cannot be regarded as a final contract. Sidney Glass Works v. Barne, 86 Hun. 374.

Where it has been agreed that the contract should tiffs. This was not satisfactory to the defendant, and it returned it to the plaintiffs with certain modifications, which were not referred to in the correspondence. These modifications were: (1) That the fruit should be well protected from frost and well hayed; (2) that if, in the judgment of the plaintiffs, it was necessary or prudent that the cars should be fired through, the plaintiffs should furnish the stoves for the purpose, and the defendant pay the expense of the man to be employed in looking after the fires to be kept in the cars; (3) that the plaintiffs should line the cars in which the fruit was shipped. These conditions were more burdensome, and rendered the contract less profitable to the plaintiffs. They were not expressed in the correspondence, and I think, cannot be implied. They were not assented to by the plaintiffs, and on their declining to incorporate them in the paper the defendant treated the negotiations as at an end, and notified the plaintiffs that it had placed its order with other parties. There was some further correspondence, but it is not material to the question presented by the appeal. The writings and telegrams that passed between the parties contain all the elements of a complete contract. Nothing was wanting in the plaintiffs' original proposition but the defendant's assent to it, in order to constitute a contract binding upon both parties according to its terms. This assent was given upon condition that a certain specified modification was accepted. The plaintiffs finally assented to the modification, and called upon the defendant to signify its assent again to the whole arrangement as thus modified, and it replied that it was "all right," which must be taken as conclusive evidence that the minds of the parties had met and agreed upon certain specified and distinct obligations which were to be observed by both. It is true, as found by the learned referee, that the parties intended that the agreement should be formally expressed in a single paper, which, when signed, should be the evidence of what had already been agreed upon. But either party was entitled to insert in the paper any material condition not referred to in the correspondence, and if it was inserted without the consent of the other party it was unauthorized. Hence the defendant, by insisting upon further material conditions, not expressed or implied in the correspondence, defeated the intention to reduce the agreement to the form of a single paper signed by both parties. The plaintiffs then had the right to fall back upon their written proposition, as originally made, and the subsequent letters and telegrams; and, if they constituted a contract of themselves, the absence of the

be reduced to writing until it is actually written and signed by all the parties, either of them may recede. Villere v. Brognier, 3 Mart. (La.) 349; Blocker v. Tillman, 4 La. 80; Avendano v. Arthur, 30 La. Ann. 316.

Although the letter states that the writer has agreed to the proposition, yet there will be no contract if the letter also states that a contract is to be executed. Wood v. Edwards, 19 Johns. 212.

If the parties agree that the contract is to be reduced to writing, it is not complete until that writing is made and signed. Des Boulets v. Gravier, 1 Mart. N. S. 480.

Agreement to execute formal contract may be binding.

The negotiations for a formal contract may have progressed to a point where, although no action could be maintained on the formal contract, yet a liability might exist for refusal to execute the agreement, which in practical effect would be the same as for a breach of the formal contract. Under such circumstances the question of liability would depend more upon the form of action than upon anything else. As to the operation of this principle to insurance contracts, see note to Newark Mach. Co. v. Kenton Ins. Co. (Ohio) 22 L. R. A. 768.

A contract to make and execute a written agreement, the terms of which are specific and mutually understood, is in all respects as valid and obligatory where no statutory objection interposes as the written contract itself would be if executed. If, therefore, it should appear from the evidence that the minds of the parties had met; that a proposition for a contract had been made by one and accepted by the other; that the terms of this contract were in all respects definitely understood and agreed upon; and that a part of the mutual understanding was that a written contract embodying those terms should be drawn and executed by the respective parties,—there is an obligatory contract which neither party is at liberty to refuse to perform. Pratt v. Hudson River R. Co. 21 N. Y. 305.

The intention of the parties to turn a parol agreement into a written one does not weaken the obligations of the parol agreement, and one of the parties cannot escape from his obligation by refusing to execute the written agreement after it has been prepared. Blight v. Ashley, 1 Pet. C. C. 15.

In reference to the case of the issuance of an insurance policy, the court, in Baldwin v. Chouteau Ins. Co. of St. Louis, 56 Mo. 154, 17 Am. Rep. 671, said, courts will interpose and furnish relief when the negotiations have reached such a point that nothing remains to be done but to execute what has been agreed upon.

In Fowle v. Freeman, 9 Ves. Jr. 351, it is said, the question is whether the whole effect of the agreement is suspended by adding to it a letter to an attorney desiring him to prepare a more formal instrument. It is impossible that the letter could have such an effect. If it had, though that formal agreement had been prepared, he would not have been obliged to sign it. At least it amounts to this: that if prepared he should execute that more formal agreement. The attorney could not introduce the least variation by his direction. He had bound himself so far that those should be the terms introduced.

But if the negotiation constitutes an agreement for a contract, and not a contract, no action can be maintained on the contract unless it is executed. Megrath v. Gilmore, 10 Wash. 339.

A written statement: "We agree to sell certain lumber and will make a contract giving the right to go on the lands and out the timber,"—is not a contract, but merely an agreement to make one, and will not support an action as upon a sale. McDonald v. Bewick, 51 Mich. 79.

Making out policies of insurance will not enable the insurer to maintain an action for the premium where its by-laws provide for the delivery of the policies upon the payment of the premium and signature of the deposit notes, neither of which has been done. Real Estate Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Hoelsa, 1 Gray, 386.

formal agreement contemplated was not, under the circumstances, material. When the parties intend that a mere verbal agreement shall be finally reduced to writing, as the evidence of the terms of the contract, it may be true that nothing is binding upon either party until the writing is executed. But here the contract was already in writing, and it was none the less obligatory upon both parties because they intended that it should be put into another form, especially when their intention is made impossible by the act of one or the other of the parties, by insisting upon the insertion of conditions and provisions not contemplated or embraced in the correspondence. Vassar v. Camp, 11 N. Y. 441; Brown v. Norton, 50 Hun, 248; Pratt v. Hudson River R. Co. 21 N. Y. 808. The principle that governs in such cases was clearly stated by Judge Selden in the case last cited, in these words. "A contract to make and execute a certain written agreement, the terms of which are mutually understood and agreed upon, is in all respects as valid and obligatory, where no statutory objection interposes, as the written contract itself would be, if executed. If, therefore, it should appear that the minds of the parties had met; that a proposition for a contract had been made by one party, and accepted by the other; that the terms of this contract were in all respects definitely understood and agreed upon, and that a part of the mutual understanding was that a written contract embodying these terms should be drawn and executed by the respective parties,—this is an obligatory contract, which neither party is at liberty to refuse to perform."

In this case it is apparent that the minds of the parties met, through the correspondence, upon all the terms, as well as the subject-matter, of the contract, and that the subsequent failure to reduce this contract to the precise form intended, for the reason stated, did not affect the obligations of either party, which had already attached, and they may now resort to the primary evidence of their mutual stipulations. Any other rule would always permit a party who has entered into a contract like this, through letters and telegraphic messages, to violate it, whenever the understanding was that it should be reduced to another written form, by simply suggesting other and additional terms and conditions. If this were the rule the contract would never be completed in cases where, by changes in the market, or other events occurring subsequent to the written negotiations, it became the interest of either party to adopt that course in order to escape or evade obligations incurred in the ordinary course of commercial business. A stipulation to re-

If the intention was that before the contract should become binding it should be executed in duplicate, it will not be held to have been duly executed until duplicates at least substantially alike have been executed and delivered. Crane v. Portland, 9 Mich. 498.

Where the agreement is to be reduced to writing and signed by the parties before it is to take effect, the agreement will not be binding in law until it is signed. Irish v. Pulliam, 82 Neb. 24.

When the understanding is that the contract is to be reduced to writing, or that it is to be signed before it is acted on or is to take effect, it is not binding until it is so written out or signed. Morrill v. Tehama Consol. Mill & Min. Co. 10 Nev. 125; Boyd v. Hind, 36 Eng. L. & Eq. 568.

A contract does not become complete and binding until reduced to writing and signed, if such appears to be the intention of the parties. Jersey City Water Comrs. v. Brown, 22 N. J. L. 504.

If the correspondence shows that the parties did not understand that it made an agreement between them, but that they intended that the agreement should be formally reduced to writing, there will be no contract until the writing is executed. Brown v. New York Cent. R. Co. 44 N. Y. 73.

If in agreeing upon a bargain the parties also agree that there shall be a formal act passed before a notary with the intention that the bargain shall not be made perfect until the notarial act is so passed, the parties, though they may have agreed upon the terms, may recede before the act is complete. Dietz v. Farish, 53 How. Pr. 217.

If after oral negotiations a paper is drawn up in consequence of the clear intention of both parties to have a written instrument signed by each as the evidence of any contract they might make, and the fact that neither considered any contract concluded until the paper was fully executed, there will be no binding contract unless the paper is signed. *Ambler v. Where the parol agreement is assented to, which is understood between the parties to be put into writing, it is not binding until it is put in that form. Bads v. Carondelet, 42 Mo. 118.

But the reduction of a contract to writing is not necessary to its enforceability unless the parties intended that it should not be binding until it was put in writing. Montague v. Well, 30 La. Ann. 53.

When parties make and sign a written memorandum of agreement with the understanding that a formal contract embracing the same stipulation is thereafter to be written out and executed, if they afterwards act upon the memorandum it will be treated as a valid and binding contract, although never written out in a formal manner. Riggins v. Missouri River, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. 78 Mo. 598.

If the terms of a contract which is to be reduced to writing, but never is, are agreed on, parties receiving benefits under it will not be heard to say that the understanding that it was to be reduced to writing was not carried out, for the purpose of avoiding the obligation placed on them by it. Müller v. McManis, 87 Ill. 157.

Although one of the parties notifies the other that he will not perform the contract unless it is reduced to writing, he cannot, after he has gone on and performed a large part of the work, repudiate it and recover a higher compensation, although the notice to reduce to writing was not complied with. Paige v. Fullerton Woolen Co. 27 Vt. 485.

Illustrations of proposals for formal contract.

If the execution of the written agreement is to be made a condition of the contract, the intention must be expressed in such a way as to show that such condition was to be insisted on, and for those duce a valid written contract to some other form cannot be used for the purpose of imposing upon either party additional burdens or obligations, or of evading the performance of those things which the parties have mutually agreed upon by such means as made the promise or assent binding in law. There was no proof of any custom existing between the shippers and consignees of such property in regard to the payment of the expense of firing, lining, and haying the cars. If it be said that such precautions are necessary in order to protect the property while in transit, that does not help the defendant. The question still remains, Who was to bear the expense? The plaintiffs had not agreed to pay it, any more than they had agreed to pay the freight or incur the other expenses of transportation. The plaintiff sent a plain proposition, and the defendant accepted without any such conditions as it subsequently sought to attach to it. That the parties intended to make and sign a final paper does not warrant the inference that they also intended to make another and different agreement. The defendant is in no better position than it would be in case it had refused to sign the final writing, without alleging any reasons whatever. The principle, therefore, which is involved in the case, is this: Can parties who have exchanged letters and telegrams with a view to an agreement, and have arrived at the point where a clear and definite proposition is made on the one side and accepted on the other, with an understanding that the agreement shall be expressed in a formal writing, ever be bound until that writing is signed? If they are at liberty to repudiate the proposition or acceptance, as the case may be, at any time before the paper is signed, and as the market may go up or down, then this case is well decided. But if, at the close of the correspondence the plaintiffs became bound by their offer, and the defendant by its acceptance of that offer, whether the final writing was signed or not, as I think it was, under such circumstances as the record discloses, then the conclusion of the learned referee was erroneous. To allow either party to repudiate the obligations clearly expressed in the correspondence, unless the other will assent to material conditions, not before referred to, or to be implied from the transaction, would be introducing an element of confusion and uncertainty into the law of contract. If the parties did not become bound in this case, they cannot be bound in any case.

purposes a mere statement at the close of the letter that, "if this is agreed to, the agreement can be drawn up and signed," is not sufficient for that purpose. Allen v. Chouteau, 102 Mo. 309.

A letter stating, "We accept" the offer, "and now hand you two copies of the conditions of sale which we have signed; we will thank you to sign them and return one of the copies to us,"—will not constitute a contract until the copies are signed. *Crosley v. An agreement to take a lease "subject to the preparation and approval of a formal contract," is not such contract as can be specifically enforced. Winn v. Bull, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 29, 47 L. J. Ch. 139, 26 Week. Rep. 200.

An agreement "subject to a contract to be settled" or "subject to a proper contract" is not one that can be enforced. Harvey v. Principal of Barnard's Inn Corp. 50 L. J. Ch. 750, 45 L. T. N. S. 280, 29 Week. Rep. 922.

A statement in a letter accepting an offer for a house, that the other party "should make an appointment to meet to draw the agreement," is not sufficient to show that the agreement was not concluded so as to be binding on the parties. Cowley v. Watts, 17 Jur. 172, 22 L. J. Ch. 591.

An acceptance "subject to the terms of a contract being arranged," will not constitute a complete contract. Honeyman v. Marryatt, 6 H. L. Cas. 112, 26 L. J. Ch. 619, 4 Jur. N. S. 17.

Intention to have formal contract as evidence.

The fact that the parties have decided to have a formal written agreement executed is strong evidence that the oral agreement was not understood or intended to be binding. Bryant v. Ondrak, 87 Hun, 477.

The fact that the parties agree to reduce the agreement to writing to be signed by the parties, is strong evidence that they did not intend the writing to be complete until it was reduced to writing and signed. Irish v. Pulliam, 33 Neb. 24.

The fact that parties negotiating a contract contemplate that a formal agreement shall be made and signed is some evidence that they do not intend to bind themselves until the agreement is reduced to writing and signed. But, nevertheless, it is always a question of fact, depending upon the circumstances of the particular case, whether the parties had not completed their negotiations and concluded a contract definitely complete in all its terms which they intended should be binding upon them, and which, for greater certainty or to answer some requirement of the law, they designed to have expressed in a formal written agreement. Wharton v. Stoutenburgh, 35 N. J. Eq. 206.

Section 5056 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that: "When any part of the real property, the subject-matter of action, is situate in any county or counties other than the one in which the action is brought, a certified copy of the judgment in such action must be recorded in the recorder's office of such other county or counties, before it shall operate therein as notice so as to charge third persons," or affect interests acquired by them in the property not situate in the county where the action was brought,—relates to actions and judgments in the state courts, and not to those in courts of the United States.

2. A suit brought in a federal court to foreclose a mortgage on the property of a railroad corporation operates as constructive notice throughout the district, and all persons acquiring an interest in or lien on any part of the property during the pendency of the suit will be bound by the decree and sale made thereunder; the purchaser will take the property discharged from all such liens and interests, though the persons obtaining them be not parties to the suit; they must seek satisfaction from the proceeds of the sale, to reach which they should become parties, and bring their claims to attention of the court by appropriate pleadings.

3. But a judgment recovered in a state court against the railroad company, prior to the commencement of the foreclosure suit, by a creditor who was not made a party, remains unaffected by the decree and sale; such judgment becomes a lien on the real property owned by the company at the time of its recovery, in the county where rendered, including lands acquired for the roadway, right of way, depots, and other purposes of the company, and continues to be so against the property in the hands of the purchaser at the foreclosure sale.

4. ERROR to the Circuit Court for Huron County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas refusing to recognize the validity of the liens of certain judgments upon the property of the Wheeling & Lake Erie Railroad Company.

Reversed as to one lien holder, and affirmed as to the others.

Statement by Williams, J.:

On the 20th day of May, 1889, Charles H. Stewart, as the administrator of the estate of Hugh B. Wilson, deceased, commenced his action, in the court of common pleas of Huron county, against the Wheeling & Lake Erie Railroad Company, the Wheeling and Lake Erie Railway Company, the Central Trust Company, of New York, the Mercantile Trust Company, of New York, as trustee, John W. Cassell, William S. Fox, and Cyrus McNeely.

The petition, after stating the due appointment and qualification of the plaintiff as administrator, and the corporate character of the several companies defendants, alleges that the defendant railroad company, prior to and during the year 1885, was the owner, and in possession of, and operating a line of railroad in and through Huron, and other counties of the state, and was the legal owner, and in possession of certain real estate situated in the county of Huron, consisting of its roadway and lands adjoining the same, depot grounds, and grounds occupied by its machine shops, station houses, car houses, engine houses, and other buildings; that at the October term, 1885, of the court of common pleas of that county, the plaintiff recovered a judgment against the said railroad company, for the sum of $4,049.84, and costs, which became a lien on the property of the railroad company, and remains in full force, and unsatisfied; that, afterward, on the 6th day of March, 1886, the plaintiff caused an execution to be issued on his judgment, which was returned unsatisfied, for want of goods and chattels, or unincumbered lands whereon to levy, the property of the company then being incumbered to an amount exceeding its value; but the incumbrances having been subsequently discharged the plaintiff caused another execution to issue, which was, on the 19th day of April, 1889, levied on the property of the railroad company in Huron county. The petition then alleges that the other defendants each claim to have some lien on, or right in, the property, by reason of which a sale under the execution cannot be effected, and prays they may be required to set up their claims, or be barred, and for an adjustment of whatever liens may be set up, and a sale of the property, and for general relief.

The defendants, Cassell, Fox, and McNeely, and J. L. Ames, who was made a party, each filed an answer and cross-petition setting up judgments recovered by them respectively in the court of common pleas of Huron county, against the railroad company, and the levy of executions issued upon them; the judgment of Fox was recovered on the 4th day of February, 1884, and was for the sum of $739.50; that of Ames, on the 14th day of September, 1885, for $1,427.18; that of Cassell, on the 25th day of October, 1885, for $1,446.18; and McNeely recovered two judgments—one, on the 24th day of May, 1886, for $590.70, and the other on the 21st day of February, 1887, for $285.35. The executions issued on the judgments were all levied at the same time the plaintiffs' execution was levied, and upon the same property; and the cross-petitions contain substantially the same prayer as the petition. The railroad company filed no answer. The answer of the railway company to the petition, and the several cross-petitions, denies generally their allegations, and avers, that on the 1st day of November, 1879, the railroad company executed its first-mortgage bonds, thirty-five hundred in number, each for the sum of one thousand dollars, payable on the 1st day of November, 1900, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent per annum, payable semiannually on the 1st day of May and November, in each year, and sold and delivered twenty-eight hundred of the bonds to bona fide purchasers; that to secure the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds, the railroad company executed and delivered its mortgage, of deed of trust, to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, as trustee, and thereby conveyed to the trust company, its successors and assigns, all the railroad company's property, real and personal of every description, including the real estate in Huron county, in said petition described, "in trust for the benefit and the security of the several persons, copartnership firms, and corporate bodies who should at any time be or become holders of any of the above-mentioned bonds, to secure the due and punctual payment of the principal and interest of said bonds according to the tenor and effect thereof. The mortgage or deed of trust contained a provision that in case default should be made in the payment of any of the installments of interest upon any of said bonds and such default should continue for the period of six months, the principal of all the bonds secured thereby should become immediately due and payable; and it was duly recorded during the year 1880, in the office of the recorder of deeds of Huron county, Ohio, and in each of the other counties in which any real property of said railroad company was situate. The railroad company failed to pay the interest, which became due on the first day of November, A. D. 1883, and on the eighth day of July, A. D. 1884, the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company filed its bill of complaint in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio eastern division against the Wheeling & Lake Erie Railroad Company praying that all of the property and franchises herein before described be sold under a decree of said court to satisfy the conditions of said mortgage or deed of trust; and on the same day said railroad company duly entered its appearance in said suit. That on the 18th day of January, A. D. 1886, a decree was rendered in said suit by said circuit court of the United States, finding the sum of three million two hundred and forty-two thousand seven hundred and sixty ($3,242,760) dollars, due upon said bonds hereinbefore described, and adjudging and decreeing that if the said, the Wheeling & Lake Erie Railroad Company should fail within the period of ten days thereafter to pay into said court said last-mentioned sum, all equity of redemption of said, the Wheeling & Lake Erie Railroad Company, in and to said mortgaged property and franchises should be barred and foreclosed, and said mortgaged property and franchises should be sold by Wilbur F. Goodspeed, special master commissioner, who, thereafter, for the sum of five hundred and five thousand dollars, sold said railroad property and franchises, including the property in the petition described, to George J. Forrest, Melville C. Day, and Daniel E. Garrison, trustees; and on the 22d day of June, A. D. 1886, said circuit court of the United States duly confirmed said sale and ordered said Wilbur F. Goodspeed, as special master commissioner, to execute and deliver to said trustees a deed of conveyance for said railroad property and franchises. That in pursuance of the aforesaid order of said circuit court of the United States, said Wilbur F. Goodspeed, special master commissioner, on said 22d day of June, A. D. 1886, executed and delivered to said George J. Forrest, Melville C. Day, and Daniel E. Garrison, trustees, a deed conveying to said trustees the railroad property and franchises hereinafter specifically described, being the property described in said mortgage or deed of trust and the same property described in said petition; said deed was duly recorded by the recorder of deeds for the county of Huron, Ohio, on the — day of —, A. D. 1886, in volume — of Deeds, at page—. That on the 25th day of June, A. D. 1886, for a valuable consideration, the said George J. Forrest, Melville C. Day, and Daniel E. Garrison, trustees, executed and delivered to this defendant, the Wheeling & Lake Erie Railway Company, their certain deed, whereby they conveyed to this defendant all their right, title, and interest in said railroad and property so sold and conveyed to them by said Wilbur F. Goodspeed, special master commissioner, being the property described in said mortgage or deed of trust as well as in said petition; that said last-mentioned deed was recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds for the county of Huron, Ohio, on the — day of —, A. D. 1886, in volume — of Deeds, at page—. The executions issued on the judgments were all levied at the same time the plaintiffs' execution was levied, and upon the same property; and the cross-petitions contain substantially the same prayer as the petition. The railroad company filed no answer. The answer of the railway company to the petition, and the several cross-petitions, denies generally their allegations, and avers, that on the 1st day of November, 1879, the railroad company executed its first-mortgage bonds, thirty-five hundred in number, each for the sum of one thousand dollars, payable on the 1st day of November, 1909, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent per annum, payable semiannually on the 1st day of May and November, in each year, and sold and delivered twenty-eight hundred of the bonds to bona fide purchasers; that to secure the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds, the railroad company executed and delivered its mortgage, of deed of trust, to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, as trustee, and thereby conveyed to the trust company, its successors and assigns, all the railroad company's property, real and personal of every description, including the real estate in Huron county, in said petition described, "in trust for the benefit and the security of the several persons, copartnership firms, and corporate bodies who should at any time be or become holders of any of the above-mentioned bonds, to secure the due and punctual payment of the principal and interest of said bonds according to the tenor and effect thereof. The mortgage or deed of trust contained a provision that in case default should be made in the payment of any of the installments of interest upon any of said bonds and such default should continue for the period of six months, the principal of all the bonds secured thereby should become immediately due and payable; and it was duly recorded during the year 1880, in the office of the recorder of deeds of Huron county, Ohio, and in each of the other counties in which any real property of said railroad company was situate. The railroad company failed to pay the interest, which became due on the first day of November, A. D. 1883, and on the eighth day of July, A. D. 1884, the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company filed its bill of complaint in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio eastern division against the Wheeling & Lake Erie Railroad Company praying that all of the property and franchises herein before described be sold under a decree of said court to satisfy the conditions of said mortgage or deed of trust; and on the same day said railroad company duly entered its appearance in said suit. That on the 18th day of January, A. D. 1886, a decree was rendered in said suit by said circuit court of the United States, finding the sum of three million two hundred and forty-two thousand seven hundred and sixty ($3,242,760) dollars, due upon said bonds hereinbefore described, and adjudging and decreeing that if the said, the Wheeling & Lake Erie Railroad Company should fail within the period of ten days thereafter to pay into said court said last-mentioned sum, all equity of redemption of said, the Wheeling & Lake Erie Railroad Company, in and to said mortgaged property and franchises should be barred and foreclosed, and said mortgaged property and franchises should be sold by Wilbur F. Goodspeed, special master commissioner, who, thereafter, for the sum of five hundred and five thousand dollars, sold said railroad property and franchises, including the property in the petition described, to George J. Forrest, Melville C. Day, and Daniel E. Garrison, trustees; and on the 22d day of June, A. D. 1886, said circuit court of the United States duly confirmed said sale and ordered said Wilbur F. Goodspeed, as special master commissioner, to execute and deliver to said trustees a deed of conveyance for said railroad property and franchises. That in pursuance of the aforesaid order of said circuit court of the United States, said Wilbur F. Goodspeed, special master commissioner, on said 22d day of June, A. D. 1886, executed and delivered to said George J. Forrest, Melville C. Day, and Daniel E. Garrison, trustees, a deed conveying to said trustees the railroad property and franchises hereinafter specifically described, being the property described in said mortgage or deed of trust and the same property described in said petition; said deed was duly recorded by the recorder of deeds for the county of Huron, Ohio, on the — day of —, A. D. 1886, in volume — of Deeds, at page—. That on the 25th day of June, A. D. 1886, for a valuable consideration, the said George J. Forrest, Melville C. Day, and Daniel E. Garrison, trustees, executed and delivered to this defendant, the Wheeling & Lake Erie Railway Company, their certain deed, whereby they conveyed to this defendant all their right, title, and interest in said railroad and property so sold and conveyed to them by said Wilbur F. Goodspeed, special master commissioner, being the property described in said mortgage or deed of trust as well as in said petition; that said last-mentioned deed was recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds for the county of Huron, Ohio, on the — day of —, A. D. 1886, in volume — of Deeds, at page—. This defendant therefore denies that the judgment mentioned in the petition and cross-petitions ever became a lien on the real estate in the petition described, or on any part thereof."

The answer of the Mercantile Trust Company sets up bonds to the amount of three millions of dollars, and a mortgage securing the same, executed by the railway company on the 6th day of July, 1886, which bonds, it is alleged, are in the hands of holders for value, and the mortgage embraces all the property purchased by the railway company, including that described in the plaintiff's petition. The mortgage was recorded in Huron county, and in each of the other counties in which any of the property is situated, in August, 1886. The defendant prays that its mortgage lien, and the interests of the holders of the bonds secured by it, may be protected. The Central Trust Company, in its answer, sets up a subsequent mortgage executed by the railway company, on the same property, to secure bonds to the amount of one million five hundred thousand dollars, in the hands of holders for value, which mortgage was recorded in the several counties where the property is located, in May, 1888, and prays that its rights and those of the bond holders may be protected. Demurrers to these several answers were filed by the plaintiff, and cross-petitioning judgment creditors, which were overruled, and replies were then filed controverting their allegations, and alleging that "if said defendants or either of them, obtained the title or liens, or any of them, in their said answers pretended, the same were procured with full knowledge and notice of the prior rights, lien, and interest of the plaintiff," and the other judgment creditors of the railroad company.

After trial and judgment in the court of common pleas, the cause was taken to the circuit court on appeal, where it was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts; and that court also made and entered its findings of fact, upon the issues joined, from which it appears that the allegations of the petition, and of the several cross-petitions filed by those having judgments against the railroad company, as they have already been stated, are true, and the averments, as they have been stated, in the answers of the railway company, the Central Trust Company, and the Mercantile Trust Company are also true; and, upon that state of facts the court held that neither the plaintiff, nor either of the other judgment creditors, was entitled to any relief, and, rendered judgment against them for costs. A motion for a new trial, filed by them, was overruled, and a bill of exceptions, at their request, was duly signed and allowed, and they are each asking the reversal of the judgment rendered against them.

Mr. G. T. Stewart for plaintiff and cross-petitioners in error.

Messrs. Swayne, Swayne, Hayes, and Tyler for the railway company, defendant in error.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The mortgage executed by the defendant railroad company, to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, November 1, 1879, embraced all of the property of the mortgagor, including that which the plaintiff, in the action below, sought to have subjected to sale for the payment of his judgment. The mortgage was duly recorded in 1880, in each of the counties where any of the property was situated. The suit to foreclose that mortgage was commenced in the United States circuit court of the proper district on the 8th day of July, 1884, and the appearance of the defendants duly entered on the same day. That suit, which was regularly and continuously prosecuted, resulted in a decree of foreclosure, rendered on the 18th day of January, 1886, under which all of the property was sold, and the sale confirmed on the 22d day of June, 1886. The purchasers, after receiving their deed for the property, conveyed it in due form to the defendant railway company, on the 25th day of June, 1886. These conveyances were properly recorded. The plaintiff below, and the several cross-petitioners, except Fox, recovered their judgments against the railroad company, after the commencement, and during the pendency of the foreclosure suit, and none of them were made parties thereto. Fox recovered his judgment before the commencement of that suit, but was not made a party. It is claimed by the defendants in error that all of these judgment creditors, except Fox, are bound by the decree in the foreclosure suit, and whatever lien or right they acquired against the property, by their judgments, was devested by its sale under the decree, and the purchasers took the title discharged therefrom.

That the court in that suit had jurisdiction of the parties, and of the property included in the mortgage, is not questioned; nor is it, that the prosecution of the suit was close and continuous; and it is well settled that all persons who, in such case, purchase, or otherwise acquire an interest in the subject of the litigation, take with constructive notice of the pendency of the suit, and will be bound by its result, though not made a party. The rule as formulated by Lord Chancellor Bacon, and generally adhered to since is, that "no decree bindeth any that cometh in bona fide by conveyance from the defendant before bill exhibited, and is made no party, neither by bill nor the order; but, where he comes in pendente lite, and while the suit is in full prosecution, and without any color of allowance or privity of the court, there regularly the decree bindeth." The rule is founded in necessity, as well as upon public policy, as, without it, the judgment of the court could in all cases be frustrated, or rendered ineffectual by conveyance or incumbrance made or suffered during the pendency of the suit; new suits would then become necessary against those so obtaining an interest in the subject of the action, who might, in the same way, compel still further suits, and so on, until there would be no end to the litigation. As was said by Chancellor Kent, in Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 566, 1 L. ed. 247, "no doubt the rule sometimes operates with hardships upon a purchaser without notice, but this seems to be one of the cases in which private mischief must yield to the general convenience." In general, a suit is to be determined upon the state of case existing when it was instituted ; and persons who procure an interest in its subject-matter during its pendency should, if they wish to assert any claim founded upon that interest, become parties, and bring it to the attention of the court by appropriate pleadings. The rule is quite as applicable to judgment creditors as it is to purchasers, or other incumbrancers, and there is no reason why it should not be; the lien of the judgment attaches only to the right or title which the debtor had at the time of its rendition, and the position of the creditor is not more meritorious than that of a mortgagee or bona fide purchaser. It is contended, however, by counsel for the plaintiff in error, that section 5056 of the Revised Statute, forbids the application of the rule in this case, and prevents the foreclosure suit brought in the United States court from operating as a lis pendens affecting the liens of the judgments recovered in Huron county. That section provides that: "When any part of real property, the subject-matter of an action, is situated in any county or counties other than the one in which the action is brought, a certified copy of the judgment in such action must be recorded in the recorder's office of such other county or counties, before it shall operate therein as notice so as to charge third persons, as provided in the preceding section; but it shall operate as such notice, without record, in the county where it is rendered; but this section shall not apply to actions or proceedings under any statute which does not require such record." The preceding section provides that: "When the summons has been served or publication made, the action is pending so as to charge third persons with notice of its pendency; and while pending no interest can be acquired by third persons in the subject-matter thereof as against the plaintiff's title." These sections belong to the code of civil procedure; and it is obvious they relate to actions brought, and judgments rendered in the state courts, and not to those in the courts of the United States. Section 5056 is, by its terms, limited to judgments recovered in one county, concerning real property partly situated in another county; and actions of that nature are authorized by a preceding section of the Code, section 5022. In the federal courts, actions are not brought in counties, but in the district or circuit where jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter may be properly obtained: and, throughout the territorial limits of that jurisdiction their judgments operate as liens, and actions pending as constructive notice, like those of state courts within their appropriate jurisdiction. Similar statutes have received like construction elsewhere. A statute of the state of Virginia provided that "no lis pendens, or attachment against the estate of a nonresident, shall bind or affect a purchaser of real estate, without actual notice thereof, unless and until a memorandum setting forth the title of the cause the general object thereof, the court in which it is pending, a description of the land and the name of the person whose estate is intended to be affected thereby, shall be left with the clerk of the court of the county or corporation in which the land is situated, who shall forthwith record the said memorandum in the deed book, and index the same by the name of the person aforesaid." When that statute was in force, an assignee in bankruptcy brought suit in the federal court at Richmond, to set aside, as fraudulent, a deed for certain real property in Petersburg. Pending the suit, a third person, in good faith, purchased the property from a defendant, and paid full value for it, without notice of the fraud, or pending suit. The court held he took nothing by his purchase as against the decree in the federal court, notwithstanding no lis pendens was filed or recorded as required by the Virginia statute. Rutherglen v. Wolf, 1 Hughes, C. C. 78. In the case of Wilson v. Hefflin, 81 Ind. 85, it appeared that during the pendency of a suit in the federal court to reform a mortgage so as to embrace a tract of land not described in it, and foreclose the mortgage when so reformed, Wilson purchased the land, which was situated in a county where the federal court did not sit, and where, upon the records, the title was in the name of his grantor, and no incumbrance of the land appeared of record. His purchase was made in good faith, for value, and without actual notice of the mistake in the mortgage, or the pendency of the suit to reform and foreclose it. Subsequently, the court decreed reformation of the mortgage, and sale of the property. In an action brought by Wilson, who was in possession of the land, to quiet his title as against the decree of the federal court, he relied on a statute of Indiana which had not been complied with, similar in its provisions to that of Virginia, heretofore mentioned; but the court decided against him, holding that the statute had "no effect upon suits in the United States courts." And in Majors v. Cowell, 51 Cal. 478, it was held that the clause of the practice act of that state, "relating to the filing of a lis pendens, does not apply to suitors except in the state courts."

It follows that the judgments recovered against the defendant railroad company, while the suit was pending in the federal court to foreclose the mortgage embracing the property which it is sought to subject to their payment, created no lien, nor gave any right or remedy to those creditors that can now be enforced or be made effectual against the property. But Fox, whose judgment was recovered prior to the commencement of that suit, and who was not made a party to it, occupies a different position, and is not without remedy, unless it is to be denied upon some other ground. The nature, as well as the existence of that remedy, is well settled. It is the duty of a mortgagee to make all persons who appear of record to have a lien upon or interest in the mortgaged premises parties to his action of foreclosure, and if he does not, their lien or interest remains unaffected thereby; and any such incumbrancer, whether prior or subsequent to the mortgage, who has not been made a party, may maintain action to enforce his lien, and have a resale of the property for that purpose; if a subsequent incumbrancer, he is only entitled to have applied to the payment of his claim such part of the proceeds of the resale as may be necessary, which remains, after the payment of the prior incumbrance and costs, and if nothing so remains he cannot recover costs; but he is not required, as a condition of his right of resale, to first pay such prior incumbrance. The purchaser at the first sale takes the title of the mortgagor and mortgagee, and may, for his protection, be subrogated to the rights of the latter to the extent of the purchase money paid. Frische v. Kramer, 16 Ohio, 126, 139, 47 Am. Dec. 368; Myers v. Hewitt, 16 Ohio, 449; Childs v. Childs, 10 Ohio St. 339, 75 Am. Dec. 512; Stewart v. Johnson, 30 Ohio St. 24; Holliger v. Bates, 48 Ohio St. 487; Vanderkemp v. Shelton, 11 Paige, 28, 5 L. ed. 45.

But it is contended the remedy cannot properly be enforced in this case, because the railroad company, when the judgment was recovered against it, was a public agency whose property was essential to the exercise of its franchise, and the discharge of those duties it had assumed toward the public; and the railway company holds the property, it is claimed, impressed with the same public trust, and secured by the same right of exemption. There are authorities which maintain the general proposition, that the real property of corporations classed as public agencies, such as railroad companies, which is essential to the exercise of their corporate franchise, and the performance of their duties to the general public, cannot be sold on execution, without statutory authority; and, further, that a part only of the property of such a corporation cannot be so sold, when the sale would practically destroy, or seriously impair the uses and value of the remainder. Conceding, however, that considerations of public policy, or the peculiar nature, uses, and incidents of property owned by such quasi public corporations, forbid the sale, upon execution of the whole or parts of the property, with or without the corporate franchise, it does not follow that a lien upon it may not be created by the recovery of a judgment against the corporation, which may be preserved in some mode, and enforced by some appropriate proceeding. If it could not be, it is evident the purposes of the corporation would generally, if not always, fail; for ordinarily, in conducting its business, it becomes necessary to contract debts and incur obligations, and it being understood the creditor has no means of enforcing payment, the corporation could obtain no credit. As said by Gholson, J., in Coe v. Columbus, P. & I. R. Co., 10 Ohio St. 873, 75 Am. Dec. 518: "It may be true that a railroad corporation holds its property, in a certain sense, as a public trust, to answer the purposes of a public highway, the transportation of persons and property. But it is consistent with that public trust to contract obligations. Indeed, the very exercise of the trust necessarily involves obligations to individuals, and to meet those obligations the property of the corporation must, in some form, be liable. The question is, in what form? Shall it be in the ordinary legal form applicable to the property of individuals, or shall peculiar rules be introduced, which may have the effect to delay creditors, and operate as a shield to protect property from their just demands?" The court, in that case, distinguishes between the franchise of being a corporation, which, it is said, properly speaking, is a franchise of the incorporators, and the franchise to operate the road and make profits therefrom; and holds that the former cannot be conveyed or sold, while the latter may be. And with respect to the property of the corporation, after it has been mortgaged, and the respective rights of the mortgagee, and subsequent lien holders, it is said: "The property must be subject in some form to the just claims against the party subsequently arising, and this will frequently and necessarily lead to interruption and disappointment in a prior arrangement, as to the time within which it is to be performed;" and, further, that the company "could not by its own act exempt from the claims of its creditors any part of its property," nor could the mortgagee "object to the creation of other legal liens upon the property embraced in the mortgage." In Lane v. Baughman, 17 Ohio St. 642, 93 Am. Dec. 658, it is held that "the remedy of a judgment creditor of a railroad company, where its property is incumbered by mortgage, is in equity to subject the interest of the mortgagor to the payment of the judgment, except where his claim is such as to entitle him to have it paid out of the earnings of the company, when his appropriate remedy is to subject the earnings to its payment." And this court held in Dayton, X. & B. R. Co. v. Lewton, 20 Ohio St. 401, that a party who has a lien on a specific part only of the property of a railroad corporation, is not entitled to a sale of such part, where the sale will have the effect to break the continuity of the road and interfere with the public interests. The lien asserted in that case was in the nature of a vendor's lien on a piece of land used for the company's roadway. Speaking of the lien holder's remedy in such case, McIlvain, J., says: "The public has and can have no right which springs from an act of injustice to the defendant in error. Its only right is to preserve the continuity of the road, of the line of public travel and transportation. And this right is as well subserved if the ownership and management of the highway be in the hands of one party as another. Hence the public has no interest impaired by a sale of the whole line." And, "because a part may not be sold on account of the paramount right of the public to keep the highway intact, a necessity arises, in order that justice may be done to the defendant in error, to decree a sale of the whole line of the road to satisfy his lien. And this is the only mode in which the rights and interests of other parties, either as owners or lien holders upon the road, can be protected, and their property or security saved from absolute destruction."

In general, the liability of property for the owners' debts, except in so far as there are express legal exemptions, is as unlimited as the power of disposition, which is an inseparable incident of ownership, when their is no legal disability; for the incurring of indebtedness for the payment of which the property may be taken, is but a mode of disposition by the owner. Under our laws railroad companies are authorized to appropriate lands for their roadways, depots, workshops, and for various other uses, and to acquire by purchase or donation any lands in the vicinity of the line of the road, or through which it passes, deemed necessary or convenient for the right of way, or that may be granted to aid in the construction of the road; and to hold and convey the same in such manner as the directors may prescribe. Rev. Stat. §381, §382. And that the lien of a judgment may attach to such property, as it does to that of an individual, is distinctly recognized in the legislation of this state. Thus, it is provided by section 3398, of the Revised Statutes that the lien of certain mortgages and deeds of trust executed by the company shall be postponed to the lien of judgments recovered against the company for labor thereafter performed for it, or material or supplies thereafter furnished to it, or for damages, or losses, thereafter sustained by the misconduct of its agents, or in actions founded on its contracts or liability as a common carrier thereafter made or incurred. And the subsequent and supplemental sections point out the mode of enforcing the lien of the judgment and preserving its priority. Section 8516-85, declares that if one company, owning a railroad jointly with another company, shall refuse to pay its part of the costs of making necessary additions and improvements as directed by the statute, judgment may be recovered therefor, which "shall be a valid lien upon the interests of the party so in default in said railroad or part of railroad owned jointly as aforesaid, and such interest may be sold at public sale as in other cases upon execution," and the purchaser shall enjoy "all the rights, privileges, and franchises which were exercised or enjoyed by the company owning the same at the time of the sale." Other instances may be found in sections 3299, 5866, 6449. By section 5375 of the Revised Statutes, a judgment is made a lien on all the lands of the debtor, and any vested interest he may have in lands, situated in the county where the judgment is rendered, either from the first day of the term of the court at which it is rendered, or from the day of its rendition. And we are of the opinion that judgments recovered against railroad corporations become liens upon their real property situated in the county where rendered, and that lands owned by such corporations for their roadways, rights of way, depots, and other purposes must be regarded as property of that character, and subject to such liens. We are also of the opinion that while the judgment creditor may not, except as authorized by statute, sell on execution the property to which his lien attaches, separate from the franchise of the company, nor, when it is part only of the corporate property and is necessary in connection with the balance of the property to enable the company to accomplish the purposes of its organization, and perform the duties it owes to the public, or its sale will materially impair the uses and value of the balance of the property, he may, by a proceeding in equity, to which all persons interested are made parties, enforce his lien by subjecting the whole of the property and franchises of the corporation to sale.

The pleadings do not seem to have been drawn with this view of the case; the property is not adequately described in the petition, or cross-petition of Fox; but such description is supplied by the answer of the railway company. Then, the recovery of Fox's judgment was subsequent to the record of the mortgage under which the former sale was had, and it appears the proceeds were insufficient to pay the indebtedness secured by it; and, as it is not shown that the claim on which the judgment was rendered was such as to entitle it to priority over the mortgage, the latter must be treated as the superior lien, and entitled to receive the unpaid balance out of the proceeds of any sale of the property that may be had at the instance of Fox, before any part can be properly applied on his judgment. The holder of the mortgage, or of the indebtedness secured by it, is therefore a necessary party, but as he can only be interested in the distribution of the proceeds of the sale, it will be sufficient if the party is brought in before that takes place. The presence of the party is not necessary before the decree of sale. It may turn out that the resale will produce no more, nor even enough to pay the balance of the mortgage debt; but, whether a suitor's remedy promises to be productive of beneficial results, or not, is for his consideration; the court is concerned only with his rights.

The judgment rendered by the Circuit Court against Fox is reversed, and the cause will be remanded for a decree in his favor in accordance with this opinion.

In other respects the judgment is affirmed.

Gordon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought in the superior court of the county of Jefferson for the purpose of restraining the collection of taxes assessed against the lands of plaintiff for municipal purposes. The ground upon which relief is sought is that the property against which said taxes are levied is situated within that portion of territory attempted to be annexed to the city of Port Townsend by virtue of certain proceedings upon the part of the officers of said city, which proceedings, he alleges, were had and taken without authority of law, and are therefore void. Issue of fact was joined by answer and reply, and thereafter, upon motion of the respondents, judgment was rendered upon the pleadings in favor of respondents, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The city of Port Townsend was incorporated under an act of the legislature of the territory of Washington, approved November 29, 1881. The theory of the complaint, and the sole ground upon which the relief is sought, is that the attempted annexation proceedings were void. The prayer of the complaint is: "That upon the final hearing herein the court will order and declare the said attempted annexation of said property so as hereinbefore set forth attempted to be annexed to said city of Port Townsend, and the acts and doings of said city of Port Townsend in relation thereto, void, and of no effect."

Various errors are assigned in the appellant's brief, relating principally to matters within the discretion of the lower court, all of which, save those hereinafter noticed, were abandoned upon the oral argument in this court; and, although we have examined and considered them, we do not think that any of them are of sufficient importance to warrant a reversal of the cause. Section 9 of the Act of March 27, 1890, being section 501, 1 Hill's Code, is as follows: "The boundaries of any municipal corporation may be altered and new territory included therein, after proceedings had as required in this section. The council, or other legislative body of such corporation, shall, upon receiving a petition therefor, signed by not less than one fifth of the qualified electors thereof, as shown by the vote cast at the last municipal election held therein, submit to the electors of such corporation, and to the electors residing in the territory proposed by such petition to be annexed to such corporation, the question whether such territory shall be annexed to such corporation and become a part thereof." The section further provides for the calling of a special election to be held for that purpose, and giving notice therefor, and provision is made for canvassing and declaring the result. Continuing, the section provides that: "If it shall appear upon such canvass that a majority of all the votes cast in such territory and a majority of all the votes cast in such corporation shall be for annexation, such legislative body shall, by an order entered upon their minutes, cause their clerk, or other officer performing the duties of clerk, to make and transmit to the secretary of state a certified abstract of such vote, which abstract shall show the whole number of electors voting in such territory, the whole number of electors voting in such corporation, the number of votes cast in each for annexation, and the number of votes cast in each against annexation." It then provides that "from and after the date of the filing of such abstract such annexation shall be deemed complete, and thereafter such territory shall be and remain a part of such corporation." It is alleged in the complaint that this section does not apply to, and has no relation whatsoever to, the city of Port Townsend. Learned counsel for the appellant, in his very able and exhaustive brief, has failed to advance any reasoning in support of the position thus assumed.

A similar question was involved in the case of State v. Warner, 4 Wash. 778, 17 L. R. A. 268, and of that section this court there said: "In our judgment, there can be no doubt that the intention was to make it apply to municipal corporations of every class, whether existing under special territorial charters or under the constitution and subsequent laws of the state." Further consideration convinces us that this is the true meaning of that section.

It appears from the complaint in this action that in September, 1890, a petition was presented to the council of the said city, signed by a number of persons, requesting that said outlying territory (describing it, and which includes the lands of appellant) be annexed to the city of Port Townsend, and that the city limits be extended so as to include the same. Continuing, the complaint alleges that "the said city council, in pursuance thereof, and in attempting to annex the said property and extend said boundaries, caused a notice of a special election to be published." Then follows the notice, the sufficiency of which is not questioned. "That said city council caused said notice of said election to be published for the time required by law in a newspaper printed and published within the limits of the city of Port Townsend, as required by the acts of the legislature aforesaid." Further, it alleges that "on October 27, 1890, an election was held under and by virtue of said notice, and thereafter the council proceeded to declare the result, and made its finding and declaration in respect thereto, showing a majority of 341 in favor of annexation, and thereupon the city council made an order that the city attorney and clerk draw an abstract to be filed with the secretary of state." Continuing, the complaint alleges "that ever since the finding and declaration aforesaid as to the canvassing of said vote and the drawing and filing of the abstract aforesaid with the secretary of state, the said city of Port Townsend has assumed and taken control of and legislated for and assessed taxes for general and special purposes upon and against all the property, both real and personal, within the limits described in and mentioned in said notice of election." It is alleged in the answer, and admitted by the reply, that the plaintiff was a signer of the petition (already mentioned) which was presented to the council, asking for such annexation. It is also admitted that since said attempted annexation various streets have been laid out within the territory so annexed, by authority of said city, and improvements made thereon, aggregating thousands of dollars; that the appellant also signed some of the petitions to the council praying for said improvements and the grading of said streets. It also appears that during the years 1891-92 he furnished the assessor of the city with a detailed list of all his property within the limits thereof, including in said list his property situated in the annexed portion of said city. Upon the facts above noticed, we think the judgment appealed from must be affirmed for two principal reasons, viz.: (1) A private citizen cannot question the right of a municipal corporation to exercise the authority, powers, and functions of an incorporated city. This can be done only in a direct proceeding, prosecuted by the proper public officers of the state. (2) The appellant is precluded by his conduct from maintaining the present action. The following authorities, and many others that might be cited, support the first proposition above laid down: Voss v. Union School Dist. No. 11, 18 Kan. 487; Stafford County School Dist. No. 25 v. State, 29 Kan. 57; Graham v. Greenville, 67 Tex. 62; Stockle v. Silsbee, 41 Mich. 615; Clement v. Eberest, 29 Mich. 19; Mullikin v. Bloomington, 73 Ind. 161; Achison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wilson, 38 Kan. 228. In the case last above cited the court says: "To maintain this suit, and to defeat the tax complained of, the plaintiff must establish, and the court must determine, that the organization of the district is illegal. This cannot be done in the present action. The legality of the organization cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding, nor at the suit of a private party. The organization cannot be attacked, nor any action taken affecting the existence of the corporation, except in a direct proceeding, prosecuted at the instance of the state by the proper public officer." In Clement v. Eberest, supra, it is said: "It would be dangerous and wrong to permit the existence of municipalities to depend on the result of private litigation. Irregularities are common and unavoidable in the organization of such bodies; and both law and policy require that they shall not be disturbed, except by some direct process, authorized by law, and then only for very grave reasons." In Mullikin v. Bloomington, supra, the court says: "As there is a statute under which the town might have become a city, and the complaint shows an attempt to comply with this statute, and shows also acts performed, after such attempt (conceding that the statute was not strictly complied with), as a city corporation, and that powers were asserted under the general act for the incorporation of cities, a citizen, in his own behalf, cannot attack the right of the corporation to exercise the functions, powers, and authority of an incorporated city. In such cases as the present the right to exercise the powers and authority of a corporation can only be questioned by a proceeding in the nature of a quo warranto, filed by some one possessing competent authority, in behalf of the state." Without multiplying authorities upon a proposition so generally recognized and understood, we think it can be safely said that, where the legislature has conferred upon a city the power to enlarge its corporate limits, and, having jurisdiction of the general subject-matter thereof, the city authorities proceed to act and to declare a result, and thereafter to act upon such result, the legality of such acts cannot be called in question in a collateral proceeding. So here the subject of annexing territory to the city was one over which the council of the city of Port Townsend had jurisdiction by virtue of section 9 of the Act of 1890, supra. That jurisdiction was brought into exercise by the filing of the petition, regardless of whether the petition complied with the statute, and regardless of any errors or irregularities in the proceedings of the council. "The power to hear and determine a case is jurisdiction; it is coram judice whenever a case is presented which brings this power into action." United States v. Arredondo, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 691, 8 L. ed. 547. In Morrow v. Weed, 4 Iowa, 77, 66 Am. Dec. 122, it was held: "If there be a petition, or the proper matter of that nature, to call into action the power or jurisdiction of the court, its sufficiency cannot be called in question in a collateral proceeding." To the same effect is the very well considered case of Terre Haute v. Beach, 96 Ind. 143. The objections urged against the proceedings of the council of the respondent city do not go to any question of jurisdiction, but constitute mainly irregularities and informalities not affecting jurisdiction, and afford no ground for collateral attack.

The appellant's participation in the annexation proceedings, his subsequent recognition of the jurisdiction of the city authorities, his acquiescence in the result reached and declared by them, and his gross laches in the assertion of his rights, constitute an equitable bar to the cause of action which he, after the lapse of nearly three years, first attempted to assert; and it would be immaterial to the result were we to determine that his conduct amounted to a ratification, or an election, or requires the application of the doctrine of estoppel. Strosser v. Fort Wayne, 100 Ind. 448; Hayward v. Eliot Nat. Bank, 96 U. S. 611, 24 L. ed. 855; Graham v. Greenville, supra. In Strosser v. Fort Wayne, supra, it is said: "If a taxpayer were permitted to long acquiesce in the order of annexation, and then secure its overthrow, great confusion would ensue, and much injustice be often done. High considerations of public policy and of justice require that a taxpayer who is notified that a public corporation claims to have extended its limits so as to take in his property should act with promptness, and proceed with diligence, if he would resist the attempted annexation." We think the lower court was right in giving judgment for the respondents and in denying appellant's application for leave to amend, and said judgment is affirmed.

Upon the question of the liability of cotenants to account for the use and occupation of the premises and for rents and profits received therefrom, see note to Gage v. Gage (N. H.) 28 L. R. A. 829.

The question of improvements as considered in a claim for rents and profits will be found in the same note, head XVIII., p. 854.

The liability of cotenants for money expended in payment of taxes, or removing incumbrances, will form a separate note.

The question of improvements and repairs as considered in this note is confined exclusively to the consideration of the subject as between cotenants strictly so called, namely, joint tenants, tenants in common, and coparceners, and does not, therefore, include improvements and repairs as between a tenant for life and remaindermen, trustee and cestui que trust, guardians and minors, and persons expending money therein in the belief that they are the true owners, purchasers under a defective title and others, all of which will be treated of hereafter.

I. Improvements.

a. Liability at common law.

Where the repairs and improvements are not necessary as a reparation of the common property, nor the property itself such in character as to bring the case within the principle of contribution, and the erection of the house is voluntary for the sole benefit of the party erecting it, and not necessary to the preservation or joint enjoyment of the estate, and no benefit or advantage is derived therefrom by the cotenants, they are not liable for such improvements. Louvalle v. Menard (1844) 6 Ill. 30, 41 Am. Dec. 161; Harry v. Harry (1891) 127 Ind. 91; Elirod v. Keller (1893) 59 Ind. 382; Carver v. Fennimore (1893) 116 Ind. 236, 238; Lane v. Taylor (1873) 40 Ind. 496.

A tenant in common cannot recover from a cotenant the expenses and improvements made, unless the cotenant assented to the improvements.

tion of the premises, is not chargeable in favor of coparceners, unless he excludes them.

*3. Where it is proper to allow a coparcener for improvements a charge for use and occupation may be set off against the improvements.

*4. Permanent improvements made by one coparcener without request or agreement of others are not chargeable to the others personally or upon their shares in the land; but if made by their request or agreement, they are a debt upon them, and a lien on their shares in the land.

*5. One joint tenant, tenant in common, or coparcener can compel others to contribute to make necessary repairs to a mill or house, after request to assist and refusal. But this compulsion is as to future repairs, not Coakley v. Mahar (1885) 38 Hun, 157; Ford v. Knapp (1884) 31 Hun, 522; Scott v. Guernsey (1890) 60 Barb. 163, 48 N. Y. 106.

And this is so both at law and in equity, in the absence of fraud or consent on the part of the owner. Bazemore v. Davis (1875) 55 Ga. 504.

As one tenant, whether in possession or not, owes no duty to his cotenant which requires him to improve, cultivate, or rent the premises. Soonce v. Soonce (1884) 15 Ill. App. 169.

He cannot at his pleasure charge his cotenants for improvements which they neither agreed to nor desired, nor can he ordinarily claim for that which he has done solely for his own advantage, and for which he has reaped the benefit. Moore v. Thorp (1889) 7 L. R. A. 731, 16 R. I. 655.

This is so no matter what may be the rule in regard to necessary repairs, in the absence of an express or implied contract to pay for them, and the parties must rely upon the agreement. Taylor v. Baldwin (1880) 10 Barb. 592.

As against his consent, one cotenant cannot be compelled to unite in making improvements which are not necessary. Ibid.

Especially where cotenants are well known and easy of access, improvements made are at the risk of the improving tenant, and will not, as a matter of right, be allowed to him in the partition of the premises. Johnson v. Pelot (1885) 24 S. C. 254, 58 Am. Rep. 223.

Such tenants cannot erect buildings or make improvements on the common property without consent, and then claim to hold until reimbursed a portion of the money expended; nor can they authorize this to be done by a third person. Crest v. Jack (1894) 3 Watts, 233, 37 Am. Dec. 368; Dech's App. (1896) 87 Pa. 467.

And in the absence of any agreement or understanding with his cotenants to that effect, a cotenant cannot recover any portion of the costs or value of the improvements, either in an action brought by him for that purpose, or by way of set-off in another action brought against him by his cotenant. Walter v. Greenwood (1882) 29 Minn. 87.

So with regard to improvements placed upon the property and for labor and trouble incurred in conducting a business upon the premises, the cotenant is not bound to account in the absence of a special agreement. Nell v. Shuckelford (1876) 45 Tex. 119.

Improvements which are unnecessary, expensive, useless, fanciful, or ornamental, and made with the design to render it out of the power of the proprietor to pay for them, and in order to cause an abandonment of his claim, will not be allowed. Whitledge v. Wait (1804) Sneed (Ky.) 326, 2 Am. Dec. 731.

those already made by one of the co-owners. This compulsion only applies to mills and houses, not to fences or other repairs to other properties.

6. In partition the part improved, if it can be done without injury to others, should be assigned to the improver; but, where this cannot be done, the cost of improvement cannot be charged to him to whom it goes.
7. Where, however, the property is not susceptible of partition, and must be sold to divide the proceeds, the coparcener who made repairs and permanent improvements shall receive out of the proceeds that amount by which the property, at the date of sale, remains enhanced in value from the improvements, not their original cost.
8. Where there is no exception to a commissioner's report, except as to error on its face, it is taken as admitted by the parties to be correct, both as to the principles and the evidence on which it rests, and the court will not look into it, but must act on it as so admitted, except as to infants and persons non compos. If excepted to not later than the first term after its return, or later by leave of court, the admission of its correctness ceases, and the court will examine it; but on the hearing of such exception, unless taken within ten days after completion of the report before the commissioner, no evidence before him can be used, unless he has made it a part of the report, or certified it, or the court requires him to certify such evidence by order, in which cases it may be used to sustain the exceptions; but depositions taken after the return of the report cannot be used to overthrow Neither will they be allowed where there is no safe or intelligible legal or equitable basis by which the excess can be calculated and ascertained. Campbell v. Campbell (1870) 21 Mich. 438.

Nor where there is no proof that they were advised, or assented, and where such improvements are not for the benefit of the estate, but solely for the use and enjoyment of the party in possession. Rowan v. Reed (1857) 19 Ill. 21.

So it is with respect to the expense of additions made to the buildings on the common property in the absence of an agreement or assent on the part of the latter. Stevens v. Thompson (1845) 17 N. H. 108.

And with reference to expenses incurred by a cotenant in clearing the land not assented to by his cotenant. Kidder v. Rixford (1844) 16 Vt. 169, 42 Am. Dec. 504.

Neither has the joint owner, cultivating land not exceeding one half of it, any right of action against his cotenant for improvements or repairs made for the purpose of improving and aiding the collection of a crop. Beckel v. Beckel (1871) 23 La. Ann. 150.

And a disseisor wrongfully holding possession, and denying and attempting to destroy the other's title, is not entitled to contribution for improvements. Austin v. Barrett (1876) 44 Iowa, 488.

Neither will compensation for improvements and ameliorations be awarded to a parcener so as to make his coparceners his debtors. Graham v. Graham (1838) 6 T. B. Mon. 562, 17 Am. Dec. 166.

If a tenant in common cultivates or improves the property, he does so at his own risk, and if loss ensues he has no right to contribution; and, on the other hand, if a profit is made, his cotenant cannot claim the benefit. Pico v. Columbet (1850) 12 Cal. 414, 73 Am. Dec. 550.

As the enjoyment of the estate may be ample compensation for the improvements made, where there are no equities existing favorable to the claim for such improvements. Rowan v. Reed (1857) 19 Ill. 21.

In no event, however, ought a balance for improving to be charged up against coheirs. Graham v. Graham, supra.

If a tenant in common, or joint tenant, desires to improve without asking the assent of the co-owner, his course is to have his share set off by partition, and then to deal with it as he thinks proper. Crest v. Jack (1834) 8 Watts, 238, 27 Am. Dec. 363.

For a tenant in common in possession has no right to raise a charge for improvements. Hancock v. Day (1840) McMull. Eq. 69, 36 Am. Dec. 293.

One tenant in common cannot make the fact that he has made improvements on the common property operate as a conveyance to him of any right, title, or interest in or to the land on which such improvement is made. Curtis v. Poland (1886) 63 Tex. 511.

And the rule applies as forcibly to the case of a husband of a tenant in common as to one of the immediate cotenants. Rothwell v. Dewees (1863) 67 U. S. 2 Black, 613, 17 L. ed. 300.

In equity, however, if one tenant in common stands by and permits the improvements to be made, and so conducts himself as to encourage their making, he will be charged with such improvements, it being a fraud to allow him to receive the benefits without contributing to the costs. Crest v. Jack, supra.

So when such improvements enhance the value and proceeds of the estate, the cotenants should not be enabled to take advantage, to his injury, of improvements for which they have contributed nothing. Moore v. Thorp (1839) 7 L. R. A. 731, 16 R. I. 655.

So expenses incurred by a co-owner as manager of the estate held in common must be borne ratably by the other cotenants, where such expenses are incurred in making useful improvements, there being no objection raised at the time. Percy v. Millandon (1828) 6 Mart. N. S. 616, 17 Am. Dec. 190.

In Kidder v. Rixford (1844) 16 Vt. 169, 42 Am. Dec. 504, the court distinguished the case from that of Percy v. Millandon, supra, which required joint tenants to contribute ratably to useful expenses incurred upon the property by a joint owner who had the management, where no opposition had been made to such expenses, holding that such case was taken from the civil law and was not the rule at common law.

And the use of improved lands without the payment of rent may be a fair set-off to any additions made by the party in possession by taking and subjecting the land to cultivation. Rowan v. Reed (1857) 19 Ill. 21.

In Peyton v. Smith (1830) 22 N. C. 349, it was held that one tenant in common of land had a right to charge his cotenant with a just proportion of expenses incurred in relation to the common estate where it is shown that the attempts made were in all respects proper.

A tenant in common making necessary improvements such as a prudent and vigilant man would make according to his best judgment, with the consent of his cotenant, is entitled to be paid his proportion by a cotenant, although such improvements could have been made with greater advantage. Reed v. Jones (1855) 8 Wis. 421.

Or the circumstances must lead to or show a mutual understanding between the parties, entitling him to compensation. Redfield v. Gleason (1888) 61 Vt. 220.

And he is then entitled to contribution. Jordan v. Soule (1837) 79 Me. 590; Soule v. Frost (1834) 78 Me. 119; Bayley v. Denny (1874) 26 La. Ann. 255.

And it rests upon the cotenant claiming the benefit of improvements made by him to show the report. They can be used only to support a motion to recommit the report.

9. Error on the face of a report may be taken advantage of in the lower or appellate court, with or without exceptions.

10. Where exception is taken to a commissioner's report before the commissioner, within ten days after its completion, it is his duty to certify the exceptions and evidence before him relating to the exceptions, with such remarks as he may see proper to make, in order that the exceptions may be heard by the court upon such evidence. He should so certify the evidence as to show it to be the evidence sent up.

11. Where such exception has been so taken within the ten days, the party excepting, or the adverse party, may take further evidence before the return of the report, and upon it the commissioner may amend his report, or make an amended report, as may suit the case, and then return his report and amendment, if any, to the office of the court.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Taylor County in favor of defendants in a suit brought by one coparcener of certain real estate to recover for the use and occupation of the premises by his coparceners and compel them to contribute for repairs made by him on the property. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

that by mutual consent he had the exclusive possession of a part of the estate and made improvements thereon, and if it appears that, although he had the exclusive possession, he did not hold with the consent of his cotenants, he cannot so recover or claim the improvements. Reed v. Reed (1878) 68 Me. 568.

So an exception to the above rule exists where one cotenant performed services which neither the law, nor his partnership obligations, nor the relation of cotenancy, imposed upon him. Redfield v. Gleason (1888) 61 Vt. 220.

Where, however, the parties stand in a peculiar relation to each other, such as the proprietors of a town which they seek to lay out and build up, such improvements will be allowed, and the necessary improvements in such a case will be such as are proper, fit, and adapted to the accomplishment of the double object in view, the enhancement of their own property by improvement and the building up of an important town, even though such improvements may not be profitable, the collateral advantages resulting therefrom being such as an advantageous man would make. Reed v. Jones (1856) 8 Wis. 421.

So improvements commenced during the lifetime of a cotenant and completed after his death, pursuant to the contract and plan entered into by the cotenants, will be allowed to the cotenant, the intention of the parties being executed. Sears v. Munson (1897) 23 Iowa, 380.

And with respect to repairs made under a lease by one tenant who erected a new building upon the premises with the acquiescence of his cotenant, the share of such cotenant was held chargeable with his proportion of the expenditures. Pren-tice v. Janssen (1890) 79 N. Y. 478.

In an action of assumpsit to recover the value of crops raised upon property held in common, the court allowed evidence of the amount of lime put upon the land by the defendant, necessary to raise the crop. Luck v. Luck (1896) 118 Pa. 256.

But a tenant in common with minors, making necessary and valuable improvements and repairs, is not entitled to exclusive possession until reimbursed the amount so expended. Young v. Gammel (1854) 4 G. Greene, 207.

And a rule to allow the costs of improvements would subject the owner of the premises to a want of judgment or economy of the improver, and render him liable to be built out of his land by the improvidence of the tenant. Moore v. Williamson (1856) 10 Rich. Eq. 323, 78 Am. Dec. 98.

At common law no allowance will be made for improvements, when the California practice act only permits it to the extent of being used as a set-off for damages for withholding possession. Ford v. Holton (1855) 5 Cal. 819.

The Louisiana code, which makes provision for the protection of the rights of coproprietors of property, does not embrace the right to judicially force one to make a contract and incur a debt for the improvement of property, according to the view of the other. Morgan v. Morgan (1871) 38 La. Ann. 502.

Under the Revised Statutes of Maine, ed. 1893, chap. 88, § 14, the value of the improvements made by a tenant in common are to be considered, and the assignment of shares made in conformity therewith. Reed v. Reed, supra.

Questions arising under the Maine Statute of 1855, as amended by the Revision of 1897 (which gives a cotenant a right to partition at common law), relating to improvements by cotenants, as they refer entirely to the individual interests and proportion of the parties, must be determined by the jury before an interlocutory judgment. Allen v. Hall (1861) 50 Me. 263; Ham v. Ham (1856) 39 Me. 216.

The meaning of the language of the above statute was in that case held to be that the tenant making the improvements should have the entire benefit, and if they were not assigned to him specifically he should have their value over and above his share of the common property. Ibid.

And it was also held that a tenant in exclusive possession of any part of the premises "by the mutual consent" of the cotenants, and having made improvements thereon, was entitled to have such part assigned to him, unless, exclusive of the improvements, it exceeds his share. Allen v. Hall, and Reed v. Reed, supra.

But a tenant in possession, making improvements without the consent of his cotenant, cannot claim to have his share so set out as to embrace such improvements, and he may be compelled to take some other portion of the estate, but he is entitled to have the improvements made by him considered and the assignment made in conformity therewith. Allen v. Hall, supra.

And a tenant in common in possession without consent, making improvements, is entitled to have the benefit of their actual value to the estate assigned to him, though such share may be on other part of the property. Reed v. Reed, supra.

In an action of trespass to try title it was held that the mere fact that the parties are tenants in common does not deprive them of the right to compensation for improvements, under the Texas Statute, Rev. Stat. art. 4814. Thompson v. Jones (1890) 77 Tex. 626, 629.

The General Statutes of Massachusetts, chapter 136, § 1, which re-enact the earlier statutes, provides that persons holding lands as joint tenants, coparceners, or tenants in common may be compelled to divide the same, either by writ of partition at the common law, or in the manner provided in that chapter, and makes particular and minute provisions for such partition, but this does not provide for compensation for betterments or improve-

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Maria Ward died seised of an hotel property known as the "Ward House," in the town of Grafton, leaving a husband and six children. Her husband, George W. Ward, occupied the property as tenant by the curtesy from February, 1878, when his wife died, until December, 1880, when he died. Four of his children lived in the hotel with him, the plaintiff, L. E. Ward, John B. Ward, Mrs. Broyles, and Archibald Ward. Before the father's death, and for eleven years afterwards, the plaintiff, L. E. Ward, occupied a stable on the property as a livery stable, and after his death Mrs. Broyles and husband occupied the hotel. Mrs. Broyles, by purchase from coparceners at different times after her father's death, became owner, including her own share, of five sixths of the property. L. E. Ward brought this suit in the circuit court of Taylor county, alleging that in 1879 he and several others of the parcnerns, seeing that the property was badly in need of repair, almost entirely rebuilt and greatly enlarged the hotel, at great expense, he furnishing a large amount of means, labor, and material, of the amount of $1,538.26, and that Archibald F. Ward and Lloyd M. Broyles, for his wife, furnished material and labor, for ments made by a cotenant. Husband v. Aldrich (1888) 126 Mass. 517, 518.

The Massachusetts Statute of 1860, chapter 273, re-enacted in Gen. Stat., chap. 126, § 46, provides that when in any writ or other process of partition the respondent or defendant denied the right of the petitioner or plaintiff, and claimed the estate himself, and had held the same under a title which he believed to be good, he should be entitled to compensation for buildings or improvements.

Under that act an allowance for improvements will not be made by the court, where there is no denial of title or holding under the title believed by the tenant in possession to be good. Aldrich v. Husband (1881) 181 Mass. 480; Chandler v. Simmons (1870) 105 Mass. 412.

And further, that, although a tenant in common disclaimed can maintain a statutory action for partition, yet the respondent has no remedy for improvements. Husband v. Aldrich, supra; Marshall v. Crehore (1847) 13 Met. 463.

b. Liable in assumption for improvements.

Assumpit will not lie by one tenant in common against his cotenant for a board fence built upon the land in place of one that has rotted down, where such fence is not a substantial benefit to the premises, and a previous request to join and a refusal are not shown. Mumford v. Brown (1826) 6 Cow. 475, 16 Am. Dec. 440.

In Haven v. Mehlgarten (1857) 19 Ill. 91, an action in assumpit was held to lie by a resident co-owner against his cotenant or his heirs, to recover money expended in the necessary preservation of their property and franchises, which they were authorized to establish and required to repair and maintain under penalty of forfeiture, even without a special request to contribute, such being implied by reason of the nature of their ownership and relation and the character of the work done.

As to the remedy by way of assumpit for rents and profits and use and occupation, see note to Gage v. Gage (1890) (N. H.) 23 L. R. A. 844, div. V., subdiv. c.

c. Rule in equity.

Although at common law, independent of statute, one cotenant cannot charge another with the value of improvements made by him upon the premises, unless they are made with the latter's consent, yet in equity a different rule is applied, and the court, acting upon the maxim, "he who seeks equity must do equity," will decree an account and suitable compensation and take them into consideration in decreeing a partition of the premises, even though such improvements have been made without consent, or a promise of contribution, or a request and refusal, when made by a cotenant who believes he owns the fee in severalty, and also when made bona fide, provided they are necessary, useful, substantial, and permanent, enhancing the value of the estate, or when made under circumstances creating an equitable lien, and not merely for the purpose of ornamentation, embarrassment, incumbrance, or hindrance; and the court in such cases will direct that the portion of the premises so enhanced in value be assigned to the tenant making such improvements, or, if that cannot conveniently be done, and a sale is therefore resorted to, will decree that the purchase money shall be so apportioned as to reimburse such tenant his outlay.

These principles are borne out by the courts of the various states in the following cases: Wilkinson v. Stuart (1883) 74 Ala. 198; Sanders v. Robertson (1876) 57 Ala. 465; Drennon v. Walker (1880) 21 Ark. 557; Seale v. Soto (1868) 35 Cal. 102; Beverly v. Burke (1851) 9 Ga. 440, 54 Am. Dec. 851; Thomas v. Malcom (1869) 89 Ga. 823, 99 Am. Dec. 459; *Willingham v. which amount expended by him he claimed compensation. He further alleged that for several years Broyles and his wife had the possession and use of the hotel property, except the stable, without payment of rent, but had paid taxes, and put some repairs on the property from time to time as needed, and that he, the plaintiff, had occupied the stable without payment of rent. He prayed that an account of the rent and improvements be taken, the amount due him and others be decreed; that the property be rented or sold to satisfy those charges; and also that the property, not being susceptible of partition, might be sold, and the proceeds divided. The other parties resisted this demand of the plaintiff for improvements, saying that such improvements were made by their father while in possession as tenant by the curtesy, and any charge by the plaintiff was against him, not against his coparceners, as they never assented to such improvements, and neither they nor their property were liable therefor. The case was referred to a commissioner, and he reported a large sum as due the plaintiff from Mrs. Broyles, one of the parceners, for rent and improvements. The court disallowed all claim by the plaintiff for improvements or rent, and, declaring the property insusceptible of partition, directed its sale. The plaintiff appealed.

First, let us consider the subject of rent. Are those of the heirs who occupied the property after the end of the father's estate by the born v. Osborn (1884) 63 Tex. 495; Curtis v. Poland (1886) 66 Tex. 511; Dodson v. Hays (1887) 59 W. Va. 577, 578; Wood v. Wood (1899) 16 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 471; Biehn v. Biehn (1871) 18 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 497; Hovey v. Ferguson, Id. 498; Swan v. Swan (1820) 8 Price, 515.

The rule applies where the tenants in common have severally made valuable improvements on distinct portions of the property sought to be partitioned, and an interlocutory decree ordering "that there be set off to the several parties such portions of the premises as will include their respective improvements, provided always that the right or interests of neither of the other parties be prejudiced thereby," is correct, and will not be disturbed in the absence of a departure from the rule. Seale v. Soto (1868) 35 Cal. 102.

So improvements will be allowed even though made by tenants in common entitled in reversion. Hall v. Piddock (1871) 31 N. J. Eq. 311.

And the court will require either payment of a ratable proportion of the improvements before the division, or will add the proportion to the share to be allotted to the tenant in possession. Hitchcock v. Skinner (1839) Hoffm. Ch. 21, 6 L. ed. 1050.

A cotenant's right to improvements will not be defeated by the fact that they are made after notice of a cotenant's title. Alleman v. Hawley (1886) 117 Ind. 532.

Especially as against the claim of one subsequently establishing his right as cotenant. Johnson v. Pelot (1885) 24 S. C. 254, 58 Am. Rep. 253.

But the account for improvements will not exceed that for the rents. Broyles v. Waddel (1872) 11 Heisk. 32; Horton v. Sledge (1856) 29 Ala. 473, 493.

So a tenant in common will not, in partition proceedings, be entitled to compensation for any improvements, unless made at a time when he really and bona fide believed himself to be the true owner of the land; and, unless he was induced to make those improvements by that belief really entertained, he will not be entitled to any compensation for improvements made when he knew his title was disputed. Horton v. Sledge, supra.

Therefore new improvements made pendente lite will not be taken into account in the commissioner's report. Reed v. Jones (1855) 8 Wis. 421.

And a cotenant cannot insist upon making new improvements to be so paid, neither can the court cause expensive improvements to be made preliminary to partition. Field v. Leiter (1886) 117 Ill. 341.

Therefore buildings erected by a cotenant in possession for his own use after petition filed cannot be taken into account in the commissioner's appraisements. Parsons v. Copeland (1864) 38 Me. 537.

Yet such equitable claim is neither a right, title, nor interest in or to the land so improved. Curtis v. Poland (1886) 66 Tex. 511.

When, however, the value of the improvements has been ascertained by the verdict of the jury, the 29 L. R. A.

plaintiff has the right to pay a share of the value and have a partition and the report of the commissioners confirmed, where no other question in the case remains to be settled or ascertained, and to retain his full share of the common property. Stafford v. Nutt (1871) 35 Ind. 93.

The one reason for enforcing the equitable doctrine of contribution for improvements arises from the necessity for the preservation of the estate, or the benefit to the joint owner by an enhancement of its value. Burch v. Burch (1885) 82 Ky. 622, 624.

But the right of a cotenant to recover for improvements does not exist in all cases, and each case must depend upon its own facts. Curtis v. Poland (1886) 66 Tex. 511, 514.

A tenant in common improving land of which he is rightfully in possession, having an equitable claim to such portion or to its rental value, does not lose such claim by a sale of the land on account of its indivisibility. Moore v. Thorp (1899) 7 L. R. A. 731, 16 R. I. 655.

Where the estate is not susceptible of a division, a cotenant making improvements will not be entitled to call for payment from the other cotenant, his right being to have the property sold and the proceeds distributed. Alleman v. Hawley (1888) 117 Ind. 532.

In case of a sale the purchase money should be so apportioned that the party making the improvements should have the increased value in addition to his pro rata interest. Dean v. O'Meara (1898) 47 Ill. 120.

The share of a tenant in common arising upon such sale may be charged with amounts thus expended, and also with the costs and expenses in defending the common title. Adams v. Smith (1897) 20 Abb. N. C. 60, 101.

A bill in equity cannot be maintained for a sale and division of the chattels in the exclusive use of one cotenant in business upon their joint property, unless it is shown that they were agreed to be or were used in carrying on the business for the joint benefit of the cotenants, or that the tenancy was of a character requiring or contemplating a sale of such chattels or a termination of the tenancy, except by consent, or unless it is shown that such sale and division are necessary by reason of death or insolvency for the purpose of settling the estate, the remedy at law being sufficient. Blood v. Blood (1872) 110 Mass. 545.

As the equity of the improving tenant to the additional value is applicable to every case where the facts are of such a character as to demand it, and where it can be enforced without injustice to the others, as where the improving tenant believes himself to be exclusive owner, or where it would work a great hardship to deprive him of it, the allowance being made consistently with the equity of the cotenants. Johnson v. Pelot (1885) 15 S. C. 254, 58 Am. Rep. 253.

curtesy liable to pay rent, or rather compensation, for use and occupation? At common law neither a joint tenant, tenant in common, nor coparcener occupying the common property, and thus taking more than his share of the rents and profits, can be made to account to his fellows, unless he has been appointed bailiff or receiver by his fellows. Each one has right to enter and use the land, and this right cannot be impaired by the fact that others absent themselves or do not claim their right to a common enjoyment. Unless the one in possession denies the right of the others to enter and enjoy the estate, or agrees to pay rent, nothing can be claimed of him. It is presumed that the others consent to his use. He cannot call on the others to help him farm or otherwise use the property, and, in case of loss from failure of crops or other cause, he cannot call on the others to contribute to the loss. If the others do not wish to occupy the premises with their co-owners, the remedy of partition is at hand, or, if the property be indivisible, the court will sell it, and divide its proceeds. Lomax, Dig. 501, 481; 3 Minor, Inst. 437, 429; Freeman, Cotenancy, § 269; note to Early v. Friend, 78 Am. Dec. 665: This is the view stated in Freeman on Cotenancy, § 258; Gayle v. Johnston, 80 Ala. 395.

By section 14, chapter 100, Code, it is provided that an action of account may be maintained "by one joint tenant, or tenant in common, or his personal representative, against

The fact that improvements were necessary cannot, however, be inferred from the fact that they are valuable, neither can such fact be inferred from their nature, even though they or some of them are such as may be necessary. Elirod v. Keller (1833) 89 Ind. 322, 323.

It has been held that the mere fact that improvements enhance the value of the common property does not entitle the tenant making them to an allowance for the difference in value, and that if such fact were found it would not warrant the allowance. Ibid.

If, in partitioning land, it cannot be so divided as to allow unimproved land to such joint tenant or tenant in common as may not have contributed to the improvements, he will not be entitled to charge his cotenant rent for the portion of the improved land which he may have obtained, nor has the improver a right to charge for the improvements. Nelson v. Clay (1833) 7 J. J. Marsh. 140, 23 Am. Dec. 397.

The value of the improvements made by one co-owner will not be included in the estimated value of the entire property for the purpose of division. Borah v. Archers (1838) 7 Dana, 173.

A part owner, enhancing the value of the common estate at his own cost, is entitled to such equitable compensation as will leave only the value of the estate without the improvements to be divided among the tenants in common. Moore v. Thorp (1899) 7 L. R. A. 731, 16 R. L. 655; Hall v. Piddock (1871) 21 N. J. Eq. 311; Kurtz v. Hibner (1870) 55 Ill. 514, 8 Am. Rep. 655; Moore v. Williamson (1856) 10 Rich. Eq. 323, 73 Am. Dec. 93; Dean v. O'Meara (1866) 47 Ill. 120; Green v. Putnam (1847) 1 Barb. 500; Conklin v. Conklin (1845) 3 Sandf. Ch. 64, 6 L. ed. 771; Swan v. Swan (1820) 3 Price, 513.

The improving tenant has been allowed the increased value of the premises imparted by such improvements, and not the original costs of his improvements. Willman v. Holmes (1850) 4 Rich. Eq. 476; Soaife v. Thomson (1880) 15 S. C. 363; Anely v. DeSausure (1881) 17 S. C. 391; Johnson v. Harrelson (1888) 18 S. C. 604; Buok v. Martin (1884) 21 S. C. 592, 53 Am. Rep. 702.

So the tenant is entitled to the full benefit of the increased value of improvements made with consent or knowledge and without objection. Dodson v. Hays (1837) 29 W. Va. 577, 598; Moore v. Williamson (1858) 10 Rich. Eq. 323, 73 Am. Dec. 93.

In Collett v. Henderson (1879) 80 N. C. 337, a direction to commissioners, to value the share at what it would have been worth without the improvements, and to report to the court for further orders, was, upon appeal by the defendants, held correct, the court stating that it would be unjust and inequitable in the others to take the common property enhanced in value by the expenditures of one of them without making him compensation, and he was held entitled to an account.

In Collett v. Henderson, supra, the amount was allotted at a valuation without regard to the improvements.

No partition will be granted without allowing the party the full value of such interest. Green v. Putnam (1847) 1 Barb. 500.

If the improvements are made under the mistaken belief that the tenant holds the land, an allowance will be made in proceedings for partition for the amount that the land is enhanced in value. Elirod v. Keller (1833) 89 Ind. 323; Conklin v. Conklin (1845) 3 Sandf. Ch. 64, 6 L. ed. 771; Scott v. Guernsey (1866) 43 N. Y. 103.

If the lands upon which the improvements stand are more than the share to which the cotenant making such improvements will be entitled, he must make recompense in money, but if the remaining lands are sufficient to give the other cotenants their share in value, it must be given out to them. Brookfield v. Williams (1840) 3 N. J. Eq. 341.

Where the improvements were made while the improving tenant was in exclusive possession holding as sole owner, before any claim or notice of opposing title had been made, she was entitled to the value of the improvements. Johnson v. Pelot (1885) 24 S. C. 254, 58 Am. Rep. 253.

In Pope v. Whitehead (1873) 68 N. C. 191, 200, the court decreed partition to the devisees entitled under a will, directing the commissioners to assign to one of such devisees as cotenant a share of the land so as to include every part upon which he had made improvements, valuing it at what it would have been worth without the improvements, or at its original valuation.

So the heirs of a tenant in common, who has improved the property which is sold in partition proceedings under the statute, are entitled to the actual increase in price caused by his improvements before division. Louvalle v. Menard (1844) 6 Ill. 39, 41 Am. Dec. 161.

A step-father of coheirs, whose mother, a tenant in dower, had made valuable improvements upon the land in good faith, was held entitled to the improvements upon the death of the mother. Bond v. Hill (1873) 37 Tex. 323.

Money expended by coheirs in valuable improvements upon the premises in good faith, under the belief that they were the sole owners, were allowed to them in partition proceedings to the extent that the value of the premises was enhanced thereby. Conklin v. Conklin (1845) 3 Sandf. Ch. 64, 6 L. ed. 771.

In the above case the court followed the opinion in St. Felix v. Rankin (1899) 3 Edw. Ch. 223, 6 L. ed. 675, where the complainant, supposing that he had the whole title, improved part of the estate and mortgaged and sold a portion, the court in partition proceedings awarding him the portion improved making his mortgages liens thereon.

A party lawfully and voluntarily in possession the other for receiving more than comes to his just share or proportion, and against the personal representative of any such joint tenant or tenant in common." This statute originated in England, and there and in a majority of the American states it has received the construction, which I would think the proper one, that merely by exclusive occupation and use one tenant in common or joint tenant does not become liable to account to others, but only where he receives rents or proceeds of the estate from strangers. Freeman, Cotenancy, § 274; note to Early v. Friend, 78 Am. Dec. 665; Chambers v. Chambers, 14 Am. Dec. 585, and note. But in Early v. Friend, 16 Gratt. 21, 78 Am. Dec. 649, which was decided at a date making it binding authority here, it is held that one tenant in common may sue his cotenant, who has occupied the whole property, for an account of rents and profits. He is accountable whether he receives rents and profits from strangers, or receives them by occupying the premises himself, with interest from each year's close. Rust v. Rust, 17 W. Va. 901, holds just the same. In Dodson v. Hays, 29 W. Va. 577, syllabus 2, this doctrine was somewhat qualified in the holding that where the property is such as to admit of use by several, and less than his just share is used by one tenant in common in a manner not hindering or excluding the others from the use of their shares, he does not receive more than his share, within the meaning of section 14, chapter 100, without individual right, although not entitled to demand payment for improvements made without the consent of the heirs, is entitled, along with the heirs and in their right, to hold possession until partition, when such improvements may be set off against the rents and profits, although those made without consent of the coheirs cannot be charged against the corpus of the estate. Jones v. Johnson (1873) 23 Ark. 211, 233, 234.

A tenant for life in possession who is also entitled as tenant in common in remainder will be allowed compensation for improvements made by him during his life estate, but where he has no interest in remainder such improvements will not be allowed him. Broyles v. Waddel (1872) 11 Helak. 32.

In Putnam v. Ritchie (1837) 6 Paige, 390, 3 L. ed. 1033, where industrial accessions had been made to property in good faith by a person having the legal title to the property, the real owner being compelled to resort to proceedings in chancery to assert his equitable title, the court acted upon the civil-law rule of natural equity and compelled the real owner to compensate the adverse party for such industrial accessions or improvements as a condition for granting relief.

The rule was applied in a case where the complainant had entered upon a part of the common estate, reduced it from a wild or waste condition to cultivation, and made valuable improvements thereon, his labor and money being expended with the knowledge and the implied consent, if not the express authorization, of his cotenant, who had not improved any part of the estate, leaving it, so far as he was concerned, in the condition in which it was when acquired. Wilkinson v. Stuart (1833) 74 Ala. 196.

In Re Heller (1838) 3 Paige, 139, 3 L. ed. 115, the cotenants of an idiot were entitled to compensation by partition of land the buildings of which were pulled down by such lunatic cotenant.

In Blehn v. Blehn (1871) 18 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 497, the father of the contestants let one son into possession of the property and the son made improvements which nearly doubled the value. It was held he was entitled to a charge for improvements and to have the land allotted to him upon division of the estate, provided its value in an unimproved condition would not exceed the amount of his share, the court questioning whether in such a case he was not entitled to an absolute decree for the land. The same point was made in Hovey v. Ferris (1871) 18 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 498, the court stating that if the son was entitled to the land itself irrespective of the conditions of the father's estate at the time of his death, in case of intestacy, it would be most reasonable that the value of the amount without the son's improvements should be deducted from his share of the estate.

In decreeing a partition the court, in Wood v. Wood (1869) 16 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 471, directed the 29 L. R. A. master to take notice of the possession and improvements made by the parties, upon the respective portions occupied by such cotenants, under a quitclaim agreement, which was declared invalid and a partition decreed.

Where a co-owner executed a deed of trust to secure debts to two creditors, one of whom was the owner of the other portion of the property, and the latter went into possession and worked the premises improving the same and paying taxes thereon, it was held upon foreclosure of the trust, that, although the party making such improvements and claiming them as a tenant in common might not be entitled to contribution so far as his cestui que trust were concerned, yet in equity, the property being sold under the deed and the price being enhanced, he should be refunded the amount of such improvements, and also the amount paid for taxes, being charged with the reasonable rents and profits upon one half. Gardner v. Diederichs (1866) 41 Ill. 158, 171.

With respect to a West India estate, in Scott v. Nesbitt (1808) 14 Ves. Jr. 487, allowances were made for advances for supplies for persons acting as consignees, not under a regular appointment, but with permission of the true owners, or by one tenant in common, if not upon the ground of a lien by the colonial law or usage, upon the nature of the subject, which required expenditure, the court remarking that under similar circumstances a tenant in common would be entitled in the account against the other tenant in common and the estate itself to various charges which he could not make in England, considering the nature of the West India estate and how far it differed from a mere estate of land in that country.

So in Marryatt v. Hooke, cited in Scott v. Nesbitt (1808) supra, at page 445, it was held with regard to a tenant in common of a Jamaica estate, that he must, in respect to the different nature and the expenditure belonging to the management of that property, be allowed the benefit of that principle of English law which would be given in equity to a person having a species of landed estate which could not be represented as mere landed property, as a tenant in common of soil containing mines or alum works in the management of which there must be expenditure incurred between the tenants, the court in such cases giving the account between them, making allowances that would not be given in the case of an estate to be managed in the ordinary course of husbandry, allowing as against the estate claims incurred for the benefit of those taking it, all the claims being such as might be properly allowed in that court.

Where improvements are made without consent, and the land is not susceptible of division, and the improvements are not found to have been necessary to the enjoyment of the estate, the value of them cannot be allowed to a party making them

Code, and is not accountable for the profits of that portion owned by him to his cotenants.

But it will be observed that this statute in terms applies to joint tenants and tenants in common, and does not mention parceners. Does the statute apply by analogy to them? Its letter does not. Joint tenancy, tenancy in common, and coparcenary are the three notable joint estates, and to them alike the common-law rule applied that one cotenant using alone the common property was not liable to account therefor, and the legislature in changing the rule leaves out coparceners, and expressly names joint tenants and tenants in common. Why do this, unless it intended to exclude coparceners from the statute? Could there be a stronger instance of the application of the principle of construction that "the mention of the one is the exclusion of the other?" The lawmakers did not intend that the sister or brother remaining under the roof of the old home, or making bread from the home farm after the departure of parents, should every day be running in debt to the others. While it might be reasonable, as between joint tenants or tenants in common, often strangers, it would not be so between brothers and sisters. There was reason for omitting parceners from the statute. It is humane and reasonable to assume that brothers and sisters do not object, but consent, that brothers and sisters continuing on the premises are still at home, and not expected to pay rent. Such we know to from the proceeds arising from a sale of the land. Eliod v. Keller (1883) 89 Ind. 382.

Where the amount paid by the committee of a lunatic was on the whole inconsiderable, not for betterments as permanent improvements, but merely to keep premises in tenantable condition, the heirs were held not liable to reimburse same to the next of kin of the lunatic. Adams v. Smith (1887) 20 Abb. N. C. 60, 101.

Where the owner of land granted a three years' lease of the property to the defendant for a stone quarry, reserving power to lease to others any part of the premises which could be used without injuring defendant, and later defendant purchased a certain interest in land, plaintiffs and other defendants subsequently buying the remaining portions, defendant having considerably improved the land during the terms of his lease, it was held in partition proceedings that the question of improvements was to be considered as arising between landlord and tenant, and not as between tenants in common, and that such improvements having been made during his tenancy, his rights were only those of an outgoing tenant, and he had no claim for improvements made for his own benefit. Cosgriff v. Foss (1892) 65 Hun. 184.

A claim for improvements, although properly set up in a partition suit, is an equity for the consideration of the court in settling the rights of the parties, and cannot be set up in an answer in bar of the action, but may be properly set up in a cross-complaint. Martindale v. Alexander (1896) 26 Ind. 104, 80 Am. Dec. 458.

The claim for improvements can only be made by cross-petition, which should be filed before the judgment of partition and the appointment of commissioners, so that the rights of the parties may be adjusted and the duty of the commissioners clearly pointed out. Stafford v. Nutt (1871) 25 Ind. 93. But in a case where such a claim was not filed until after the commissioners had filed their report, it was held that the matter was in the discretion of the court, and it was not error on their part to entertain the question of improvements.

A defendant in partition proceedings, claiming for improvements and for taxes, should file his counterclaim along with the answer. Alleman v. Hawley (1888) 117 Ind. 632.

If the cotenant owns timber from land adjoining the part improved by him, it is competent for the court in partition proceedings to direct that such land shall be valued as it was with the timber on it, and to include it in the assignment to such cotenant. Obert v. Obert (1846) 5 N. J. Eq. 397, 408.

Under the Alabama statute, giving the judge of probate statutory jurisdiction in partition proceedings between coparceners, joint tenants, and tenants in common, the judge of probate cannot take cognizance of the equitable right of the complainant and adjust the partition so as to meet and satisfy it, a partition by lot being all that he can decree, and he is therefore without power to give the commissioners special instructions necessary to adjust the equitable rights of the parties, and if such judge first acquires jurisdiction, equity will not interfere in the absence of special circumstances rendering such statutory jurisdiction inadequate. Wilkinson v. Stuart (1883) 74 Ala. 198.

The claim of a cotenant for improvements made by him will give a court of equity jurisdiction to restrain the proceedings taken before the probate judge under the Alabama Statute, sections 3497-3513 of the Code of that state. Ibid.

In Husband v. Aldrich (1883) 135 Mass. 317, 318, it was stated that even if jurisdiction existed in equity to make partition of lands of which partition could not be made at law, the statute excluded by clear implication such jurisdiction as to lands which were subject to its provisions, the plain import of the statute being that partition should be made of lands without regard to the state of the accounts between the cotenants for improvements or erections thereon, and that a part owner might have his part of the land set off to him, although he may not have paid as much for it in proportion as his cotenant paid, and although he might be indebted to his cotenants for improvements upon the lands, and any right to a partition not according to the interests of the tenants in the land, but according to the improvements made upon the common property by them, was excluded.

In the above case the plaintiff in partition in equity sought to have that part of the premises upon which her husband built a house assigned to her without including the value of the buildings in the partition, the erections being made without the knowledge or consent of the cotenant, but the court held this could not be done, neither could the portion of the estate upon which the house stood be set off to him. Ibid.

d. Lien for improvements.

There can, strictly speaking, be no liens upon estates held in cotenancy for improvements made thereon, in the absence of an express agreement between the cotenants. Taylor v. Baldwin (1850) 10 Barb. 582.

Yet with regard to the money expended in improvements, equity regards it as a lien in so far as it will refuse to interfere unless compensation be made. Green v. Putnam (1847) 1 Barb. 500; Robinson v. Moore (1892) 1 Tex. Civ. App. 98.

Especially when one joint tenant agrees with the other that the latter shall expend his money and improve the property and have a lien on it for the money, and the latter does so, it being presumed that the former by agreement induced him to make the expenditure. Houston v. McCluney (1874) 8 W. Va. 135.

Equity has, under peculiar circumstances, in a be the uniform course between members of a family. The same presumption does not hold between two who own as joint tenants or tenants in common. Thus, I think neither the letter nor reason nor the equity of the statute applies to parceners. Prof. Minor, admitting that parceners are not within the letter of the statute, says that "it is believed" that the common-law rule of nonliability has been changed by construction of the statute, partly because courts of equity before the Statute of Anne in England had obliged parceners to render an account, and partly from the irresistible reasonableness of the thing, and partly because of the force of the analogy between joint tenants, tenants in common, and coparceners. 2 Minor, Inst. 457. I have examined the authorities there referred to, and find that this opinion rests on Drury v. Drury, decided in the year 6 of the reign of Charles I., which does seem to sustain the position, as it makes one of two heirs account to the other heirs; but the report in 1 Rep. in Ch. 48, 49, is so meager that we cannot tell how far the element of ouster or exclusion may have entered into the case. Dean v. Wade, Id., decided ten years later, simply adopted Drury v. Drury expressly as a precedent. No facts are given. Eq. Cas. Abr. chap. 2, title Account (A), p. 5, note, so far from sustaining Prof. Minor, is against his position, as it limits the equity jurisdiction to joint tenants and tenants in common, and that under the Statute of Anne, not few cases established a lien not arising out of contract, or established by usage. Taylor v. Baldwin, supra.

Such lien, whenever recognized, being founded upon the equitable doctrine of contribution. Burch v. Burch (1885) 83 Ky. 622.

A claim for improvements being rather an equitable charge upon the land improved, than a right, title, or interest in or to it, and gives a cotenant a lien to secure compensation to him for necessary or proper improvements made by him. Curtis v. Poland (1886) 66 Tex. 611.

And it has been held that a cotenant making improvements with the express consent of his co-owner acquires a lien for a proportion of the costs, which may form the subject of a deed of trust given by him upon such property. Baird v. Jackson (1881) 96 Ill. 78.

Yet it does not follow that it will be valid against a creditor of the cotenant having an attachment levied on the property so as to constitute a legal lien, whether such creditor has notice or not. Houston v. McCluney (1874) 8 W. Va. 136.

If two or more make a joint purchase, and afterwards one of them lays out money in repairs or improvements and dies, the same is a lien upon the land and a trust for the benefit of the representatives of the party advancing it, and such is the case in all cases of a joint undertaking, either in trade or in other dealing, the parties being considered tenants in common, or the survivors as trustees for those who are dead. Lake v. Gibson (1729) 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 290.

c. Interest on improvements.

Where the improvements are undertaken by one tenant in common at the request of another, upon the express understanding that the latter shall furnish his share of the costs, the former will be allowed interest on the money furnished or advances beyond his proportion, where the latter fails to make such allowances and urges the former to complete the work, undertaking to see that he loses nothing by such advance. Sears v. Musson (1867) 23 Iowa 380.

Upon the question of interest in a claim for rents and profits, see note to Gage v. Gage (1890) (N. H.) 23 L. R. A. 553.

1. Position of grantee of cotenant's share.

A grantee under an executory contract for the purchase of the share of one cotenant when partitioned is in equity a tenant in common with the other owner and a party to the partition proceedings, though not bound by the express covenant contained in the deed of partition. Venable v. Beauchamp (1835) 3 Dana, 321, 28 Am. Dec. 74.

The equitable claim or right of a cotenant to reimbursement or compensation for improvements, even if secured by lien, will not pass to a purchaser from a cotenant through a deed not sufficient to pass a debt secured by a lien created by a contract. Curtis v. Poland (1886) 66 Tex. 611.

II. Repairs.

As to how far the question of repairs will be considered by way of deduction in an action for use and occupation and rents and profits, see note to Gage v. Gage (1890) (N. H.) 23 L. R. A. 529, 855, head XVIII.

a. General doctrine.

In Coke upon Littleton, 54b, and 200b, it is said: "If two tenants in common or joint tenants be of a house or mill and it fall into decay, and the one is willing to repair the same and the other will not, he that is willing shall have a writ de reparatione facienda; and the writ saith ad reparationem et sustentationem ejusdem domus teneantur, whereby it appeareth that owners are in that case bound pro bono publico to maintain houses and mills which are for habitation and use of men, and if there be two joint tenants of wood or arable land, the one has no remedy against the other to make enclosure and reparation for safeguard of the wood or corn."

The rule is based upon the pre-eminence and privilege given to houses by law. Bowles' Case (1616) 11 Coke, 82.

The above doctrine has been followed in Calvert v. Aldrich (1868) 99 Mass. 74, 96 Am. Dec. 693; Carver v. Miller (1808) 4 Mass. 559; Anderson v. Greble (1831) 1 Ashm. 130; McDearman v. McClure (1876) 31 Ark. 559; Coffin v. Heath (1843) 6 Met. 76.

In Carver v. Miller, supra, however, the court doubted whether the doctrine applied to mills, but this doubt was removed by statute (Rev. Stat. 1836) giving co-proprietors of mills in that state, Massachusetts, a right to repair after a call or due notice of a meeting of all of them when he may cause the same to be done and claim contribution, otherwise his only remedy is to look to the profits therefor.

But the repairs must be necessary. Fowler v. Fowler (1882) 60 Conn. 258.

They must be absolutely necessary to save the building from decay. Broyles v. Waddel (1872) 11 Helsk. 32.

And they must be necessary to the enjoyment of the common property. Dech's App. (1868) 67 Pa. 467, 472.

So that for such as are both necessary and permanent the repairing tenant is entitled to reimbursement. Jenkins v. Jenkins (1886) (N. J.) 5 Atl. Rep. 135.

As repairs mean ordinary repairs and not improvements. McAlear v. Delaney (1894) 19 N. Y. Week. Dig. 263.

The tribunal in which the action is tried is the judge as to such repairs. Anderson v. Greble (1831) 1 Ashm. 130.

It must, however, be shown that the money has been actually expended in repairs. Doane v. Bad- mentioning coparceners. It is but a note citing no case. Though Kent is cited by Prof. Minor, Kent does not insert it in his text. It is an annotator's note, based on the old English case and the note in Eq. Cas. Abr. just mentioned, and the Kentucky case of O'Bannon v. Roberts, below referred to. Lomax refers to same authority. Now, as to the Kentucky case cited by Prof. Minor (O'Bannon v. Roberts, 2 Dana, 54), it supports Prof. Minor's inclination to an opinion. But examine the case. The opinion plainly shows that Judge Nicholas hesitated to hold that one parcener may be held to account in equity for profits and rents of land exclusively occupied by him, saying that Statutes 3 & 4 Anne, the source of ours, applied only to joint tenants and tenants in common, but he felt bound by a former Kentucky case, Graham v. Graham, 6 T. B. Mon. 562, 17 Am. Dec. 166. When that case is examined, it has nothing whatever to do with the point, for it was a case where one child claimed exclusively in severalty as purchaser of their father by a forged title bond. It was a case of ouster, where one heir shut out another by adverse claim. The syllabus itself states that he held in severalty. I must refer to Chinn v. Murray, 4 Gratt. 348, cited by Minor. It is peculiar. A judicial partition was made in 1830, which lay unconfirmed till 1836, and on appeal as late as 1848 it was reversed. The parties took possession and improved the parcels under the partition as their own. Improvements were allowed as far as they added to the present value, and rents and profits were charged, or rather set off. This case cannot be said to hold the clear proposition that a coparcener, merely from occupation of the premises, receives more than his share, under the said code section, by construction. It is a case of charge to offset improvements, which I elsewhere say can be done. The parties had to be allowed improvements, because made under the mistaken belief that they owned the parcels in severalty, under a partition so long acquiesced in, and, claiming improvements, they must be charged for use and occupation. Where it is proper to allow improvements, ger (1815) 12 Mass. 65; Mumford v. Brown (1826) 6 Cow. 475, 16 Am. Dec. 440.

Beyond this the right to recover contribution is not ordinarily carried. Gardner v. Diederichs (1866) 41 Ill. 158.

Since the rule does not extend to other repairs. Kidder v. Rixford (1844) 16 Vt. 100, 42 Am. Dec. 504.

Therefore where the repairs were not such in the strict sense of the term, and were not absolutely necessary as repairs, but partook more of the nature of improvements, the court held they could not be recovered. Taylor v. Baldwin (1860) 10 Barb. 582.

So, also, in Israel v. Israel (1868) 30 Md. 123, 96 Am. Dec. 571, the court disallowed expenses incurred which did not add to the preservation of the property.

It has been held, however, that for repairs which are of this nature, the law will imply a promise to pay, upon the same principle that it will imply a promise to pay joint debts paid by one debtor. Fowler v. Fowler (1882) 50 Conn. 256.

For the common law recognizes the legal obligation of each cotenant to pay his just proportion in such cases. Alexander v. Ellison (1890) 79 Ky. 148.

So in equity they will, upon refusal to do so, be held to contribute ratably for such expenditures upon a bill for partition. Coffin v. Heath (1843) 6 Met. 78; McDearman v. McClure (1876) 31 Ark. 559; Harrison v. Harrison (1878) 56 Miss. 174.

The equitable doctrine being based upon the doctrine that where the parties stand in coequal jure, equality of burden becomes equity. Coffin v. Heath, supra.

All acts done by one tenant in common are presumed to be for the interest of all the cotenants, and in conformity to all their rights, until an adverse claim is notoriously set up and established by competent proof. Baker v. Whiting (1839) 3 Sumn. 475.

As contribution rests upon the principle that the payment has removed a common burden and established a common benefit. Scriven v. Joyner (1833) 1 Hill, Eq. 260, 26 Am. Dec. 199.

And it has been held that necessary reparation should be done and charged on the estate when one tenant refuses to join in the making thereof, or from disability is unable to do so. Alexander v. Ellison (1890) 79 Ky. 148.

For the reason that the income is applied in repayment thereof where practicable. Ibid.

And this for the reason that, if one makes repair, and the other receives a part of the benefit, they ought not to be permitted, by refusing to unite in necessary repairs, to compel their cotenant to bear the whole expense or to allow his interest to suffer because they are reckless of their own. Ibid.

Yet in the case of repairs it does not seem to be well settled, in the absence of statutory provisions, that one tenant in common can make the necessary repairs and charge his cotenant in an action for the amount in the absence of contract. Taylor v. Baldwin (1860) 10 Barb. 582.

And in Massachusetts an action for contribution cannot be maintained where there is no agreement or consent to the repairs. Calvert v. Aldrich (1869) 99 Mass. 74, 96 Am. Dec. 693.

So in Stevens v. Thompson (1854) 17 N. H. 108 it was questioned whether a tenant in common of a farm could compel his cotenant to contribute to the repairs of a house upon the premises in the absence of an agreement respecting the same.

And a cotenant has been held not liable to account for insurance money received by him and expended in repairing and restoring the property. Annelly v. De Saussure (1897) 26 S. C. 497.

But under a covenant to repair, which runs with the land, the purchaser of a cotenant's share is liable for a proportion of the expenses so incurred. Denman v. Prince (1862) 40 Barb. 215.

The old writ was not employed to obtain contribution for repairs previously made, but to compel the tenant to make such repairs, under the order and direction of the court, as are adjudged to be proper, and was not in use in these states. McDearman v. McClure (1876) 31 Ark. 559.

But the writ will not lie where the repairs have been made under an agreement expressly implied. Coffin v. Heath (1843) 6 Met. 78.

It applies only as against a cotenant, and not as against a reversioner. Carver v. Miller (1805) 4 Mass. 559.

Action upon the case is now substituted therefor. Doane v. Badger (1815) 12 Mass. 65.

So no tenant in common has a right to the exclusive use of the common property for the payment of repairs, unless they have been made in conformity with the Maine Statutes, chapter 88. Buck v. Spofford (1849) 31 Me. 34.

An agreement between cotenants to occupy in severalty according to their interests, each to make necessary repairs to a certain value in severalty, all rents and profits should be charged. Where it is proper to charge rents and profits, improvements should be allowed. The decree in the case says that, "under the circumstances of the case," justice required an allowance for improvements, and then said that rents and profits be charged. The opinions do not touch on the point. They do not consider whether the said statute naming joint and in common tenants includes within its equity coparceners. The matter was not discussed, not even mentioned. The Virginia cases sustaining an account are cases of joint tenants and tenants in common. So the two West Virginia cases cited above. If there is a case in either state pointedly holding that a mere sole use by a coparcener subjects him to account, I have not seen it, except Fry v. Payne, 89 Va. 759, holding, by a mere remark, a parcener liable to account for sole use; but there was no consideration of the point whether the statute applied to parceners, but it was assumed it did.

repairs exceeding such value to be charged jointly to the parties according to their interest, was construed as meaning that whenever repairs at any one time became necessary, not exceeding such specified amount, they were to be made at the sole expense of the tenant, but if the repairs required at one time were more than such sum, the whole was to be joint charged. Kidder v. Rixford (1844) 15 Vt. 103, 42 Am. Dec. 504.

Where there was a joint promise to pay for the repairs done by one cotenant, and the evidence showed that the undertaking was several, and after the repairs were completed one of the defendants performed his part of the agreement, it was held the action must be brought against the other defendants severally for the performance by each of his part, and not against them jointly. Converse v. Ferre (1814) 11 Mass. 325.

Under Mass. Stat. 1795, chap. 74, § 6, the major part of the proprietors in interest on any mill agreeing to repair or rebuild, may do so, and are to be reimbursed out of the profits in case any proprietor refuses to agree to the reparation or rebuilding or to pay his proportion of the expenses, and are entitled to their action against the deficient proprietor to recover the same, and any particular contract to repair or rebuild, entered into by the proprietors, is not to be avoided by the act. The above statute, however, applies only to a part owner, and not to his heirs or assignees. Carver v. Miller (1808) 4 Mass. 550.

The common law gives no right of action by one tenant in common expending more than his share in repairing the common property against the deficient tenants. It gives a right of action in respect to co-owners of mills for the balance justly due from one for the repair of the joint property. Converse v. Ferre, supra.

b. Liability in assumpsit.

Assumpsit will not lie by one tenant in common against another for repairs to the land, though they be proper or necessary, without a previous request to join in the repairs and a refusal thereof. Mumford v. Brown (1826) 6 Cow. 475, 18 Am. Dec. 440.

In the above case the court questioned whether assumpsit would be the proper remedy, even though there were a prior request and refusal. 104d.

But if a tenant in common has expended money for the joint benefit, and does not bring in question the title to the land, he may recover in assumpsit of his cotenant the sum expended by him 29 L. R. A.

The distinction between parceners and joint tenants or tenants in common was not thought of. So, I do not think these parceners could by law demand an account of use and occupation. But, in addition, all the parceners, save one, including the plaintiff, by uniting in the form of a letter signed by all as an agreement, declared that they did not wish the hotel to go into the hands of strangers, and wished Broyles, then in possession, not to leave it, but to keep it and use it, and insure and paint and repair it, and, after all the improvements contemplated by it had been made, if he thought the heirs were entitled to anything he could pay; but, if he thought they were not, then pay nothing, leaving it to him, and they would be satisfied. This was April 17, 1884. It spoke no intent to charge back rent, but by plain implication disclaimed it, and disclaimed an intention to charge in future. The suit would not change this. Mrs. Broyles still had right till partition or sale, so she did beyond his just proportion. Gwineth v. Thompson (1829) 9 Pick. 31, 19 Am. Dec. 350.

c. Necessity of a demand and notice.

At law one tenant in common can compel the other tenants to join in the expense of reparations of a house, where the reparations are necessary to the preservation or enjoyment of the estate, but in order to sustain his action he must show a request to unite in a refusal as well as an actual expenditure; in such a case the expenditure is for the benefit of all the tenants, and contribution is enforced on the principle that parties standing in equal rights are bound to bear an equality of burden. Louville v. Menard (1844) 6 Ill. 39, 41 Am. Dec. 161; Kidder v. Rixford (1844) 15 Vt. 103, 42 Am. Dec. 504; Coffin v. Heath (1843) 6 Met. 76; Calvert v. Aldrich (1868) 90 Mass. 74, 95 Am. Dec. 698.

Such request and refusal are necessary before assumpsit will lie for repairs, or the common-law writ de reparatione facienda. Green v. Putnam (1847) 1 Barb. 500.

So damages cannot be recovered until after the request and refusal. Doane v. Badger (1815) 13 Mass. 65.

The New Hampshire Statutes, ed. 1830, 186 (Rev. Stat. chap. 136), which provide that the necessary repairs in mills, mill dams, or flumes owned by joint tenants or tenants in common shall be made by such owners in proportion to their respective interests, contain no provision relative to the repairs of houses, and it is said that in order to maintain such action it must be proved that there was a previous notice and opportunity given to the cotenant to make repairs. Stevens v. Thompson (1845) 17 N. H. 103.

And see Carver v. Miller (1808) 4 Mass. 550, supra, head II., a.

d. Lien for repairs.

When houses situated on the joint property are falling into decay, and one tenant out of his own means makes reparation, he should not only be entitled to contribution, but should be secured by a lien on the interest of his cotenants, especially if they refuse, or being under disability are unable to consent, to bear their share of the expense. Alexander v. Ellison (1890) 79 Ky. 148.

Not only would they be personally liable to contribute in equity, but their estate will be subjected to a lien, whether the tenants agree to repair or not, if by the repairs a common benefit has been conferred on the owners so that ex æquo et bono they ought to pay for such a benefit. Coffin v. Heath (1843) 6 Met. 78. E. W.

not exclude an actual effort at entry and enjoyment by others. Let the question of liability for use and occupation be settled as it may on general principles of law. This agreement in this case repels a charge.

Next, as to improvements claimed by L. E. Ward. Can he be allowed for them? One joint tenant or tenant in common at common law could compel others to unite in the expenses of the necessary reparation of a house or mill owned by them, though the rule is limited to these parts of the common property, and does not apply to fences enclosing wood or arable land. This right was enforced by a writ de reparations faciendis. It did not apply to past repairs, and could only be resorted to after request to unite in the repairs and refusal. 1 Lomax, Dig. (504) 648; 2 Minor, Inst. 430; 4 Kent, Com. 370. It was confined to a mill or houses, because it is for the public good to maintain houses and mills, which are for the habitation and use of men,—as Lord Coke said in Co. Litt. 200b; Id. 54b: "If there be two joint tenants of wood or arable land, the one has no remedy against the other to make inclosure or reparation for safeguard of the wood or corn." Boules' Case, 11 Coke, 82. I have no doubt this old common-law writ, though disused, might yet be resorted to. It applies to future, not past, repairs. Freem. Coten. § 261; Calvert v. Aldrich, 99 Mass. 76, 96 Am. Dec. 698. I think it can be safely laid down, with the exception stated, no joint tenant, tenant in common, or parcener can compel his cotenant to make improvements, or maintain an action against him personally to compel him to contribute to the expense of improvements made by him upon the estate, without his consent, express or implied, or fix it as a lien on his interest in the estate. One cannot improve his fellow out of his estate. He has voluntarily put improvements on land of another, knowing his right, and he cannot impose a debt on him or his estate without his consent. Freem. Coten. §§ 261, 262; Aldrich v. Husband, 131 Mass. 480; Husband v. Aldrich, 135 Mass. 317; Nelson v. Clay, 7 J. J. Marsh. 138, 23 Am. Dec. 387; Hancock v. Day, McMull. Eq. 69, 36 Am. Dec. 293; Scott v. Guernsey, 48 N. Y. 106; Calvert v. Aldrich, 99 Mass. 74, 96 Am. Dec. 698; Mumford v. Brown, 6 Cow. 475, 16 Am. Dec. 440. It is not the case of one making improvements in good faith believing the land to be his. The common law denied such a one relief, and it is only allowed by statute. Code, chap. 91. It seems that, where a tenant in common or joint tenant is called on for rents and profits in equity, he may deduct ordinary repairs on the principle that he who asks help from a court of equity must do equity. Hannan v. Osborn, 4 Paige, 343, 8 L. ed. 463; Ruffners v. Lewis, 7 Leigh, 720, 743, 30 Am. Dec. 513; 2 Minor, Inst. 420; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 655; Graham v. Pierce, 19 Gratt. 28, 100 Am. Dec. 608, syllabus 6; Freem. Coten. § 279. Where partition is made, the part improved should, if not prejudicial to others, be allotted to the one who made improvements, estimating its value without improvements. 2 Minor, Inst. 420; 29 L. R. A.

Patrick v. Marshall, 2 Bibb, 41, 4 Am. Dec. 670; Nelson v. Clay, 7 J. J. Marsh. 138, 23 Am. Dec. 387. But if this cannot be done, he to whom the improvement falls does not have to pay for it. Nelson v. Clay, supra. Where improvements are made with consent of the cotenants, they are personally bound, and the demand is a lien on their shares. Houston v. McCluney, 8 W. Va. 135; Freem. Coten. § 262.

It seems to be claimed in the brief of counsel that the letter to L. M. Broyles, written by some of the heirs, justifies a charge by L. E. Ward for improvements. After requesting him not to leave the house, but to stay, it recited what he ought to pay, viz., keep and use the property, have it insured, keep taxes paid, keep the house in good repair; and then said: "Go to work and have the house painted and repaired as in your opinion you think it should be; and, after all this improvement has been made, if you think, after calculating the expenses of the improvements and the taxes, etc., which you may have paid heretofore, that the heirs are entitled to anything, then you can arrange and pay them their proportion; and if you think that nothing is coming to the heirs after paying for painting, etc., then we are satisfied." This did not refer to improvements made by L. E. Ward before the letter, but to future improvements. The word "paid" refers to taxes. But although it be law that one coparcener cannot, without consent, make permanent improvements, and charge his coparcener or his share with their cost, where the estate is partible in kind, as a tract of land, how is it in the case of a house or land which is impartible in kind for any reason, so that it has to be sold in order to effect a partition, as was the case in the present instance? Is there no difference here? Circumstances alter cases. Is it right for a court of justice to sell the land greatly increased in value by the expenditure of one brother, and put the money into the pocket of another with its eyes shut to the fact that the property brought more, a great deal, by reason of the new house built by one of the brothers? Ought it not to be ascertained how much the value was enhanced by the improvements, and pay the amount of enhancement to the one whose means produced it, and divide the balance? This is different from the case where there is division in kind. In the later case, to charge the brother who did not consent to the improvement is to force upon him a debt he did not assent to, and to mortgage his estate with a debt which he cannot pay and which will take away his patrimony. One ought not to be made a debtor without his consent; but, where the whole is to be converted into money and distributed, another principle is admissible, doing harm to no one and justice to all. The others get just what they would have received without the improvements, and the one making them is reimbursed. I have observed that in Illinois this doctrine has been frequently applied. Louville v. Menard, 41 Am. Dec. 161, and note; Howey v. Goings, 13 Ill. 95, 54 Am. Dec. 427; Dean v. O'Meara, 47 Ill. 120. And on further search I find this exception approved in Moore v. Thorp, 16 R. L. 655, 7 L. R. A. 781. I think Elrod v. Keller, 89 Ind. 383, would also allow it in such a case as we have in hand. Alleman v. Hawley, 117 Ind. 533, does. It does not follow that the original cost of improvements be given, but the actual enhancement of value at time of sale by reason of improvements is ascertained. See opinion in last-cited case, and in Moore v. Williamson, 10 Rich. Eq. 328, 73 Am. Dec. 98. The opinion in the last case very properly says that, if the cost of improvements be allowed, "it would subject the owner to the want of judgment or economy of the improver, and render him liable to be built out of his land by the improvidence of his tenant." I would add that the improvement may have depreciated from some time before the sale.

It is objected that the bill does not charge a request on the part of the cotenant for the improvements. It would be necessary to charge them otherwise than as indicated above, but it is not necessary to so charge them; that is, as a simple increase of value.

It follows, from what has been said, that, while there could be no claim for use and occupation against Broyles and his wife, yet the decision of the court below is wrong in wholly disallowing all claim for improvement made by the plaintiff out of the proceeds of sale, in the manner above stated, which was directed to be made because the property was found insusceptible of partition.

A reference was made to a commissioner, and his report charged rents and profits to Mrs. Broyles for the hotel, and to the plaintiff for the stable, and charged Mrs. Broyles, as the owner of five sixths of the property, with five sixths of the money spent by the plaintiff in improvements. The commissioner made a part of his report a deposition of the plaintiff, and, as the report imports, there was no other oral evidence before him. Taking that deposition alone, it supports the report as to the charge for improvements, as it shows consent on the part of the cotenants. No exception was made within ten days, and the plaintiff contends that the result reached and returned by the commissioner must be taken as correct, and cannot be impaired by after-exceptions and evidence afterwards taken, and that the court could not, upon depositions afterwards taken, overturn and reject the result reached by the commissioner, but must confirm or recommit.

Ward v. Ward, 21 W. Va. 262. The plaintiff's deposition must be considered a part of the report.—a part of its face. Lynch v. Henry, 20 W. Va., opinion page 424; Kester v. Lyon, 40 W. Va. —. It is plain that if we decide the exception only by the face of the report, including that deposition, we must overrule it, because the deposition sustains the report in the point of view of fact. But after the report, and we will say after the exception, the defense took depositions. They deny the statement of the plaintiff's deposition, that the other heirs agreed that the plaintiff make the improvements. The court read them on the hearing. Could they be read to impair the finding of the report in favor of the plaintiff as to the improvements? This may seem at first an immaterial question, since, as above stated, the plaintiff ought to be allowed out of the sale an amount equal to the amount of increase of value at the time of sale imparted to the property by the improvements; but a second thought makes it material, in this: that if there was an agreement between the parties that the improvements be made, that would entitle the plaintiff to perhaps a larger recovery, that is, the original cost of improvements with interest from the date when made, while, if there was no request, he would get out of the sale the mere increase of value. Can these depositions be read then? If there had been no exception, they could not, as, without exceptions, a report is taken, as to adult parties, to be correct, and will not be examined by the court except for errors on its face. Kester v. Lyons, 40 W. Va. —. But where there is an exception, but not within ten days, how is it? Where the party says that he does not intend to be regarded as admitting the correctness of the report, but excepts to it, and appeals to evidence subsequently presented in the case, can he overthrow the report with that evidence? Is he unalterably bound by the report, if not erroneous on its face? If he had excepted within ten days, he could have taken other evidence, and the commissioner could retain the report to await it, and upon it make remarks, or even make a further or amended report. I think this is so because section 7, chapter 129, Code, says that, if exceptions be taken within ten days, the commissioner shall with his report "return the exceptions, and such remarks thereon as he may deem pertinent and the evidence relating thereto." Judge Green expressed the same opinion in Lynch v. Henry, 25 W. Va. 423. I have some question as to the last matter, but think it tenable, and that the rule may be convenient in practice. The code, after providing for exceptions before the commissioner within ten days, goes on to add: "But any party may except to such report at the first term of the court to which it is returned, or by leave of the court after such term." What does this mean? It may be asked of what use such exception, if evidence taken after the return of the report cannot be read? The answer can be given, that the party may think the commissioner has reached the wrong conclusion on the evidence, and, desiring to have it reviewed, desires to except to get rid of the admission of its correctness which would operate against him from silence, and designs to ask the court to review the evidence, if it has been made part of the report, and, if it has not been, then to ask the court to order the evidence to be certified to be read with his exception, which he may do, if he has been prevented from excepting within the ten days. Arnold v. Slaughter, 36 W. Va. 590, syllabus 4.

If we say that after a report has been made a party may go on and take depositions, and have them read, we introduce confusion in practice, install a bad practice, and put a premium upon negligence and delay. A case is referred to a commissioner. He gives notice, and proceeds to execute the order of reference. The parties ought to attend before him. They can be much better heard upon the facts before a commissioner than in court. It is the most important proceeding in the case, save, perhaps, the final hearing; in many cases even more important than that. If the action of the commissioner is unsatisfactory, the party can, within ten days after he has finally announced his conclusion by a completed report, except, and, if he does not want more evidence, ask the commissioner to certify the evidence to the court for its review; and if he is surprised at the inferences drawn by the commissioner upon that evidence, and thinks he can strengthen his case by additional evidence, he can except within ten days, and take more evidence, and, under proper circumstances, the commissioner will delay returning his report to enable the party to do so, as the statute giving him right to take such evidence ought to be liberally construed to promote a fair, full hearing; and then the commissioner can report on such evidence, or make an amended report, or send up his original report, the exceptions, and all the evidence, old and new. After all the toil before a commissioner, after he has given his decision, and after the full opportunity for a hearing before him, a negligent litigant ought not to be allowed to reopen the case, often to the inconvenience and surprise of the other party. If so, where the utility of this tedious hearing before that important auxiliary of the court, the commissioner? It would be an almost meaningless performance. We do not think the code means such a reopening by giving right to except at the first term after the report. We think such after-taken depositions cannot be read on the hearing to impair the report, as was done in this case. We think the only office they can perform is to support a motion for a recommittal of the report, or to suggest to the court, where it appears contrary to justice to confirm the report, the propriety of such rehearing before the commissioner; but on such evidence the court cannot overturn the report, or remodel or restate the account, which may work great injury and surprise to the other party, but must recommit the report, if dissatisfied with it. Ward v. Ward, 21 W. Va. 262.

I have said this much upon this matter of commissioners' reports because of the importance, in every day's practice, of proper understanding as to proceedings before commissioners, and the frequent controversies arising upon them. Under these views, it would have been error to overturn the report, based on the theory that the improvements were made with the consent and agreement of the coheirs, but for the fact that the bill and amended bill have no allegation that the coheirs requested such improvements to be made or consented thereto. As this was not charged, the finding of the report is error apparent on its face, and vindicates the action of the court against the argument that only by using the after-taken depositions it rejected the finding of the report. Does it thence follow that the total disallowance of anything to the plaintiff is justified by this omission in the bills? By no means. The bills charged the fact of the improvements, and that the hotel property itself was not susceptible of partition, and must be sold, and the same decree which disallowed all compensation for improvements subjected the property to sale in order to divide its proceeds, and upon those facts the plaintiff was entitled to something on the principle of increased value above stated. Nor ought the court to have confirmed the report and decreed its full finding, because it allowed, not an amount for increased value, but the account of expenditure by the plaintiff in improvements, and because it charged use and occupation. There ought to have been a recommittal to ascertain the amount of increased value, viewing the case on those facts. The court could not make a new statement. If the plaintiff amended his bill by the allegation wanting, he could have claimed the account filed by him, with interest, if he could succeed in sustaining the theory or contention that his coparceners agreed to the making of improvements by him, but without such allegation he could not. He can still amend his bill to that effect, if he wishes to do so.

It is contended that in no view can the plaintiff claim anything at all for the improvements, since they were made in 1879, while the father yet lived, and his estate by the curtesy existed, and the heirs had only an estate in reversion, not in possession, and the improvements were made for and by the father. All the children, save two daughters, continued to reside in the home as a family with their father, after the mother's death, and the existence of this curtesy would not prevent any reversioner, by agreement with the others, from making improvements beneficial to the inheritance, and charging the property with them. Nor would it debar one from claiming such increase of value in the reversion or inheritance as his improvements imparted. Of course, were it shown that the plaintiff contracted with the father to make them; if the father became his debtor, his sole debtor, for them, and he looked to the father for pay,—he could claim nothing from the heirs. I do not consider that the evidence at present shows such a case as enables us to say this.

So much of the decrees complained of as disallows the claim of the plaintiff or Lavina Broyles or L. M. Broyles for repairs, improvements, or rents is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in respect thereto, according to principles above stated so far as applicable, and further according to principles governing courts of equity in such case.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

CAPITAL GAS CO., Resp.,J. D. YOUNG, Auditor of Sacramento, Appt.

(.....Cal.....)

The fact that the mayor of a city is also the president and a stockholder of a gas company which furnishes gas to the city, not by virtue of any contract, but by requirement of law, when the mayor has no authority in the matter of procuring the gas, does not defeat the right to enforce payment from the city, although the charter of the city provides that no officer shall be directly or indirectly interested in any contract, work, or business, or the sale of any article for which payment is to be made from the city treasury, and that all contracts in violation thereof shall be void.

(September 18, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Sacramento County granting a writ of madamus to compel defendant to audit a claim by plaintiff against the city of Sacramento for gas furnished it. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. J. Frank Brown and Clinton L. White, for appellant:

Respondent is not entitled to have this judgment affirmed until it can establish to the satisfaction of the court that a shareholder in a corporation organized and conducting business for profit is not interested directly or indirectly in contracts made by the corporation.

The situation here is such as to bring the case within the mischiefs provided against in section 211 of the charter.

Todd v. Robinson, 54 L. J. Q. B. 47; Dwight v. Palmer, 74 Ill. 296; San Diego v. San Diego & L. A. R. Co. 44 Cal. 106; Shakespeare v. Smith, 77 Cal. 688; Finch v. Riverside & A. R. Co. 87 Cal. 597; Capron v. Hitchcock, 98 Cal. 427; Wickersham v. Crittenden, 98 Cal. 29.

Mr. A. L. Hart, for respondent:

There can be no violation of the rule that no man can faithfully serve two masters whose interests are in conflict, unless, in the performance of his duties, the agent has found opportunity to exercise skill or industry against, or to drive a bargain advantageous or disadvantageous to, his principal. Such is not the case here.

Searis, C., filed the following opinion:

The Capital Gas Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of California, is, and for more than twelve years last past has been, engaged in the business of furnishing gas to the residents of the city of Sacramento (a municipal corporation), and to consumers generally, for profit, and has had shares of stock issued to and held by divers persons; and C. H. Cummings is, and for more than one year last past has been, the duly appointed and acting secretary of said corporation. The said corporation has during a period of more than twelve years last past been engaged in said business, under and pursuant to certain franchises duly granted to it by said city of Sacramento. On the 11th day of January, 1893, the board of trustees of said Capital Gas Company, by resolution regularly passed, fixed the price to be paid by consumers thereof at $3 for each 1,000 cubic feet. J. D. Young, the appellant herein, is, and for more than three years last past has been, the duly elected and qualified auditor of said city of Sacramento; and under the provisions of the charter thereof, duly adopted, it is the duty of said auditor to draw and sign all warrants upon the treasury for claims against said city which have been allowed by the board of trustees thereof. The fire department is, and for more than one year prior to 1894 was, one of the departments of the municipal government of the city of Sacramento. At all the times herein mentioned, B. U. Steinman was, and still is, the holder and owner of stock in said Capital Gas Company, and was, and still is, the president of said company, and since the first Monday in January, 1894, has been, and still is, the duly elected and acting mayor of said city of Sacramento. Between the 1st day of February, 1894, and the 1st day of March, 1894, the fire department of the city of Sacramento used and consumed 8,600 cubic feet of gas, furnished and distributed by the Capital Gas Company, which gas, according to the rate fixed as aforesaid, was of the value of $25.80; and thereafter, and on the 1st of March, 1894, the said gas company presented its bill therefor in said amount, duly itemized and verified, to the board of trustees of said city, which bill was allowed by said board for said sum of $25.80, and presented to the auditor aforesaid, who rejected the same, and returned it to the board as provided by the charter. Thereafter the same bill was again allowed and approved by the board of trustees and by B. U. Steinman, the mayor, in due form, and was again presented to the auditor, who refused to audit the same or to draw his warrant therefor on the treasurer of said city in favor of the said gas company. Said sum of $25.80 is still due and owing from the said city to said gas company. The gas so furnished was not furnished under any express contract, nor was it furnished pursuant to any contract entered into before the election of said mayor, except that it was so furnished pursuant to the franchises of the said gas company and the law applicable to said gas company.

Section 211 of the charter of the city of Sacramento provides as follows: "No member of the board of trustees, and no officer or employé of the city, shall be or become directly or indirectly interested in or with the performance of any contract, work, or business, or in the sale of any article, the expense, price, or consideration of which is payable from the city treasury, or in the purchase or lease of any real estate or property belonging to or taken by the city, or which shall be sold for taxes or assessments, or by virtue of legal process at the suit of the city. Any member of the board or any officer or employé of this city violating the provisions of this section, or who shall be directly or indirectly interested in any franchise, right, or privilege granted by the city while he is such member, officer, or employé, unless the same shall devolve upon him by law, shall forfeit his office, and be forever disqualified from holding any position in the service of the city; and all contracts made, or rights or franchises granted, in violation of this section, shall be absolutely void."

NOTE.—As to validity of a contract between a public officer and the public which he represents, see Tippecanoe County Comm. v. Mitchell (Ind.) 15 L. R. A. 820, and note, also Spearman v. Texarkana (Ark.) 22 L. R. A. 858; 29 L. R. A.

Upon the facts as found by the court, of which the foregoing is a condensed statement, the court below adjudged that an alternative writ of mandate theretofore issued in the cause be made peremptory, requiring the appellant herein, as auditor, to issue his warrant upon the treasury of the city of Sacramento, and upon the proper fund therein, for the amount of the demand, viz. $25.80. The defendant, auditor as aforesaid, appeals from the judgment, and the cause comes up on the judgment roll.

The officers of a municipal corporation, like those of private corporations, are agents of the corporate body. It is a cardinal doctrine of the law of agency that, "whenever an agent is invested with authority to use any discretion in the exercise of the powers conferred upon him, it is an implied condition that this discretion shall be used in good faith for the benefit of the principal, and in accordance with the true purpose of the agent's appointment. To this extent every agency which is not a purely ministerial one involves a fiduciary relation between the parties." Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 516. It is in consonance with this principle that officers of a corporation may not, under any circumstances, use their official position for their own benefit, or for the benefit of any one except the corporation itself, and they may not represent the corporation in any contract or transaction in which they are personally interested in obtaining an advantage at the expense of the corporation. In such cases it is said the corporation would not have the benefit of their unbiased judgment, as self-interest would prompt them to prefer their own advantage to that of the company. San Diego v. San Diego & L. A. R. Co. 44 Cal. 106; Shakespeare v. Smith, 77 Cal. 638; Finch v. Riverside & A. R. Co. 87 Cal. 597; Wickensham v. Orittenden, 93 Cal. 29; Capron v. Hitchcock, 98 Cal. 427; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 444. The rule embodied in the foregoing decisions, and which has the support of a host of others which might be mentioned, is not an arbitrary one. In other words, it is founded in reason, and is not to be indiscriminately applied irrespective of the circumstances of the case. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 521.

It would seem that the circumstances of the present case bring it within the exceptions 29 L. R. A.

for the following reasons: (1) The authority to transact the business of the municipal corporation of the city of Sacramento, to procure supplies therefor, and to audit and allow claims against the city, is vested in the board of trustees; and B. U. Steinman, as mayor of the city, has not, so far as appears from the record, any authority in the premises. (2) The gas furnished to the city was not supplied under or pursuant to any express contract with the respondent corporation, of which Steinman is president, and the right to recover the reasonable value thereof is based upon the implied promise which the law raises. (3) Under section 629 of the Civil Code, the respondent was bound, upon proper demand, to furnish gas to the city, and, upon refusal so to do, was liable to a penalty of $50 as liquidated damages, and $5 a day as liquidated damages for each day such refusal or neglect continues thereafter. Under the operation of this law, the gas company was not a free agent with power to contract or refuse to do so, but it became its duty upon demand to furnish gas to the city, irrespective of the status of its president. This duty to furnish gas to the city devolved upon the respondent, not by virtue of any contract, but by operation of law; and hence the laws governing ordinary contracts resting in the volition of the parties thereto has no application. Where the law affixes a penalty for the nonperformance of an act, its performance should not be adjudged illegal, or subject the party performing to the implication of having violated a duty. Had the city of Sacramento been in need of the land of its mayor pursuant to some public use, and had it, by proceedings for the condemnation thereof, under the law of eminent domain, succeeded to the title, the proceeding would have been so far an adversary one that there would have been no liability on the part of such mayor for a violation of section 211 of the city charter, hereinbefore quoted. The case at bar does not differ essentially in principle from the one supposed. Section 211 of the city charter, which inhibits its officers from being interested in any contracts or sales to the city involving the payment of money from its treasury, or from being interested in any franchise, right, or privilege granted by the city while they are in office, is, except as to the penalty imposed thereby, in substance a declaration of the common law as it previously existed, and is founded in wisdom and justice. It is intended as a shield to the city against the selfishness and greed of officials, but was not intended and may not be used as a medium by which the city can take the property of others without their consent, under the form of law, and then refuse to pay therefor its reasonable worth, because an officer of the city is interested in such property. We hold that section 211 of the city charter has no application to a case like the present, where the gas company is required by positive law to furnish gas to the city upon demand, and, having furnished the commodity, has presented its bill for the reasonable value thereof, although the mayor of the city owns stock in the gas company and is president thereof. The city, having received and used the gas pursuant to a right which it enjoyed independent of the volition of respondent, is, in equity and conscience, bound to pay the reasonable value thereof. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: Vanolief, C.; Haynes, C.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

railroad to Wellington, Kan.; that he was provided with a ticket or stock contract entitling him to ride over the road between the points named; and that the conductor in charge of the train refused to accept his ticket or stock contract, and required him to pay in cash the sum of $7.50 for his transportation to Wellington. In the second count of his petition, he alleges that, while he was riding as a passenger and deporting himself in a proper and orderly manner, the agents and servants of the company, in the pretended exercise of authority to preserve order on the train, wrongfully and wantonly assaulted him by striking him on the head and body several times, with great force and violence, with a heavy lantern, thereby causing him to suffer great injury in body and mind. In the third count it is alleged that, while he was conducting himself in a quiet and proper manner, the defendant, by its agents and servants, in the pretended exercise of authority, and to preserve order in and about the train, at Ottawa, did arrest him, without any warrant or authority of law, and did forcibly remove him to the common jail of the county, where he was detained for twelve hours without any reasonable or probable cause, by reason of which he suffered great physical injuries, and that he was also greatly humiliated and injured in his circumstances and credit. For all these things he prayed damages in the sum of $10,000. The answer of the defendant was a general denial. Henry finally withdrew any claim for the amount he paid out for railroad fare from Kansas City to Wellington, and the case was finally submitted upon the claims in the second and third counts of the petition. In answer to special interrogatories which were submitted, the following findings of fact were made: "(1) On what train of cars did plaintiff take passage from Kansas City, Mo., on the 9th day of January, 1890, and over what road did the same run? A. On Santa Fé train, on Santa Fé road, southern Kansas division. (2) In what car on said train did plaintiff first take passage? A. Smoking car. (3) How long did he remain in such car in interrogatory No. 2 mentioned, before going into the ladies' car? A. A very short time; say, a few minutes. (4) Did plaintiff go to sleep soon after taking a seat in the ladies' car? A. He did. (5) If you answer interrogatory No. 4, 'Yes,' state whether he remained asleep until the conductor waked him up to collect his fare. A. According to evidence, yes. (6) How many times did the conductor wake the plaintiff up, and state to him in regard to producing his ticket or paying his fare, before plaintiff paid the same? A. Either two or three times; asked him for ticket three times.

(7) What was the name of the conductor on the train January 9, 1890? A. Eli Parsons.

(8) Upon the payment of plaintiff's fare, did the conductor give him a receipt therefor? A. Yes.

(9) Was not the plaintiff under the influence of intoxicating liquors when he entered the train at Kansas City? A. To a certain extent, yes. (10) After plaintiff had paid his fare, did he not, at several times thereafter, use profane and vulgar language while in the ladies' car? A. The evidence on this question is contradictory. We think, however, that he used profane words a few times. (11) If you answer interrogatory No. 10, 'Yes,' then please state whether or not there were any ladies present in the car at the time. A. Yes.

(12) Is it not a fact that, while in the ladies' car, the plaintiff made threats of doing the conductor personal injury and violence? A. The preponderance of evidence is, we think, against such a conclusion. (13) If you answer interrogatory No. 12, 'Yes,' please state if such threats were communicated to the conductor by any of the passengers in said car. A. . . .

(14) Was not the plaintiff drunk and boisterous while in the ladies' car on said train? A. No.

(15) Is it not a fact that the conductor removed the plaintiff from the ladies' car to the smoker on account of his being drunk and disorderly? A. No. " (18) While in the smoking car, did not the plaintiff have an open knife in his hands, and was not such knife and the blade thereof long and thin? A. Yes.

(19) Did not the plaintiff while in the smoking car threaten to do the conductor personal violence and injury? A. No; we think not. " (21) When the conductor and brakeman came into the smoking car, did the plaintiff have the knife above referred to in his hands, and was the same open? A. Yes. (22) Did not some of the passengers in the smoking car, when the conductor and brakeman came in, say, 'Look out! he [meaning the plaintiff] has got a knife?'

A. Yes. (23) Did not the brakeman order the plaintiff to drop the knife before striking him with the lantern? A. Yes.

(24) How many times did the brakeman order the plaintiff to drop the knife? A. Once.

(25) How many times did the brakeman strike the plaintiff with a lantern? A. Three times. (26) Did not the brakeman, after striking the plaintiff with the lantern the last time, say to him, 'If you make such a pass at me again, you will be carried out of this car a corpse,' or words to that effect? A. Yes.

(27) During all the time the plaintiff was on the train of cars, what was the treatment and demeanor of the conductor to him? A. His treatment of and demeanor towards the plaintiff was good, with the exception of his action in causing the arrest of said plaintiff. " The jury returned a general verdict in favor of Henry, and assessing damages against the railroad company at $3,000. Motions to set aside the verdict and for a new trial were overruled, and judgment was awarded for the amount named in the verdict. The railroad company alleges error.

There can be no question, under the evidence, but that the conductor and brakeman both had reasonable grounds for believing that the plaintiff would make an attempt to carry out the threats which he had previously made, and that, acting on that belief, they had a right to defend themselves, and would not be required to wait until the plaintiff actually inflicted personal injury upon them.

Mr. J. E. Halsell for defendant in error.

Johnston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the trial the plaintiff below, W. T. Henry, relied upon two grounds of recovery: One for the alleged assault made upon him by the brakeman while Henry was a passenger on the train of the railroad company, and the other for the unlawful arrest alleged to have been made at the instance of the railroad company while he was a passenger upon the train, and his illegal imprisonment for about twelve hours in the jail of Franklin county. Henry was a farmer and stock shipper, who made a shipment of cattle from Wellington to Kansas City in January, 1890, and who, in consideration of the shipment, received a ticket or stock pass entitling him, not only to accompany the cattle to Kansas City, but to a return passage from that place to Wellington. On the return trip he was unable to find his stock pass, and was required by the conductor to pay a cash fare. Some difficulty arose between him and the conductor concerning the collection of the fare, in which it was contended by the employes of the company that Henry became profane, violent, and abusive, and threatened violence to the conductor. It is claimed that the threats were communicated to the conductor, who, when passing through the train, accompanied by a brakeman, found Henry with an open knife in his hand in a threatening attitude; that the brakeman approached him, and demanded that he should throw the knife down, but Henry refused, when the brakeman struck him three times upon the head with a lantern. The theory of the railroad company was that Henry was drunk, abusive, and violent; that he had become enraged because of the collection of his fare, and had threatened the lives of the employes of the company; and that with an open knife he was endeavoring to carry out his threats at the time he was attacked by the brakeman; and that therefore the conductor and brakeman were justified in committing the assault upon Henry and inflicting upon him the punishment which they did. On the other hand, Henry claims that he was not drunk nor disorderly; that while he complained of the collection of the fare, and the failure to return it after his stock pass had been found, he made no threats against the conductor, nor any attempt to attack him with a knife or in any other manner. He claimed that he was using his knife to cut a chew from a plug of tobacco which he held in his hand. The jury have specially found, upon conflicting evidence, that, while Henry used some profane language on the train, he was not drunk or boisterous; that he made no threats of doing personal injury or violence to the conductor upon either of the cars on which he rode. There was a further finding that the brakeman struck Henry twice after he had dropped the knife.

According to the testimony which was accepted by the jury, the action of the brakeman in assaulting Henry was a gross violation of the duty of the railroad company towards a passenger. As the relation of carrier and passenger existed, he was entitled to the highest degree of care and protection against violence or interference by others so long as he conducted himself in a proper manner. If, through the negligence of the company in affording him the care and protection to which he was entitled, the passenger had suffered an injury, the company would be liable; and certainly the liability is no less where the injury is intentionally inflicted by an employe of the company who was required to exercise care and protection towards the passenger. It is true, if Henry was drunk and disorderly, and his conduct such as to render his presence offensive or dangerous, they would have been justified in excluding him from the train; and it is also true, as contended by the company, that the brakeman and conductor might repress acts of violence on his part, and under certain circumstances defend themselves or repel a threatened attack. The finding of the jury, however, makes the brakeman the aggressor, and his attack upon the passenger unjustifiable. Stewart v. Brooklyn & C. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 588, 43 Am. Rep. 185; Ray, Negligence of Imposed Duties, §§ 106, 107.

It is next contended that the company is not liable for the illegal arrest and false imprisonment of Henry. The arrest was made without a warrant, and the imprisonment continued for about twelve hours in the county jail of Franklin county. It occurred about one half an hour after the termination of the difficulty on the train at a time when Henry was quiet and orderly. When the train reached Ottawa, the conductor reported the occurrence of the difficulty to a superintendent, who advised that Henry should be taken from the train. The conductor inquired for an officer, and, when one was found, they went together into the train, where the conductor pointed out Henry, who was at once arrested by the officer, and taken to prison. Under these circumstances, there can be but little doubt that the conductor procured the false arrest to be made while in the line of his employment, and at a time when the relation of passenger and carrier existed between the company and Henry. It is well settled that when one in charge of a train, and engaged in the business which has been intrusted to him by the company, causes the arrest of a passenger, the company for which he is acting cannot escape liability. According to the testimony which the jury believed, Henry was arrested at midnight, when he was quietly seated in a car; and, without process or any information as to the cause of his arrest, he was hurried from the train, and placed in jail, where he was searched, and shut up until about noon the next day. The action of the conductor, who must be held to have been acting for the company, was clearly a breach of the contract between the carrier and the passenger, which required that Henry should be carried in safety to his destination, and protected from interference by strangers or against the misconduct of the company's servants. Where the relation of carrier and passenger exists, it is held that no matter what the motive is which causes a servant of the carrier to commit an unlawful act, or to wrongfully inflict an injury upon a passenger, the carrier is responsible for the act and its natural and legitimate consequences. Dwinelle v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 120 N. Y. 122, 8 L. R. A. 224; Hamel v. Brooklyn & N. Y. Ferry Co. 1 Silv. Sup. Ct. 584; Palmer v. Manhattan R. Co. 183 N. Y. 261, 16 L. R. A. 136; Gillingham v. Ohio River R. Co. 85 W. Va. 588, 14 L. R. A. 798; Ray, Negligence of Imposed Duties, § 109.

There is some testimony tending to show that the officer who made the arrest was employed by and received compensation from the railroad company. Some testimony of an objectionable nature in regard to his authority, as well as in regard to the authority of the superintendent, was received; but in view of the conclusion that has been reached, that the conductor, acting in the line of his employment, caused the arrest to be made, the objectionable testimony with respect to the authority of the police officer and of the superintendent becomes immaterial. The final complaint is that the damages awarded by the jury are excessive, but the view which the jury has taken of the facts would justify the allowance of punitive damages against the company, and, looking at all the circumstances of the case, we cannot say that the award of $8,000 is so excessive as to indicate passion or prejudice in the jury, or justify the court in disturbing the verdict.

The judgment of the District Court will be affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

1. Comment upon the testimony by the court, to the effect that there is nothing to show that lumber was set on fire by sparks from a boat, when there is no attempt to prove any other cause of the fire, and several witnesses have sworn to seeing sparks from the boat falling upon the lumber, although the court allows the case to go to the jury, requires reversal of a judgment on a verdict for the defendant.

2. A state statute requiring all vessels using wood for fuel while navigating waters of the state to be provided with suitable fire screens does not conflict with acts of congress or regulations of supervising inspectors, and is not an interference with interstate commerce.

3. It is for the jury to determine which of various screens described by witnesses would comply with the requirements of a statute, and therefore an instruction that there could be no liability for the fire alleged to have been caused by want of a screen, if one of the screens described in the testimony would not have prevented the fire, is erroneous.

4. The jury must determine the facts in the case from testimony given by witnesses, and not from their own judgment or experience or knowledge.

5. A provision for recovery of damages occasioned by neglect to provide fire screens for vessels as required by statute is sufficiently expressed in the title, "An act to compel steam vessels . . . to provide fire screens . . . and to provide a penalty for its violation."

6. The courts cannot declare a statute unconstitutional and void solely on the ground of unjust and oppressive provisions, or because it is supposed to violate the natural, social, or political rights of a citizen, unless such injustice is prohibited or such rights guaranteed or protected by the constitution.

7. A statute requiring screens "of the best approved kind shown by experience to be proper and suitable for protection from fire" to be used on vessels burning wood is not unreasonable, and imposes no greater burden than the common-law rule in most states imposes in the case of railroad locomotives.

8. The mere omission of the word "steam" before the word "vessel" in a section of an act requiring fire screens, the title of which relates to steam vessels, does not render the act repugnant in its terms, as the provisions apply only to steam vessels.

Messrs. Simonson, Gillett & Court-right for defendant in error.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought under Act No. 183, Pub. Acts 1881, entitled "An act to compel steam vessels navigating the waters of the state to provide fire screens for smokestacks, and to provide a penalty for its violation," being sections 2033 and 2034, How. Anno. Stat. On November 25, 1890, the plaintiff and Amasa Rust, since deceased, owned and had piled on the dock on the east bank of the Sheboygan river, at Sheboygan, a large quantity of pine lumber, of the value of $50,000 and upward. The lumber had stood upon the docks during the summer, and had become seasoned and dry. The defendant owned and operated a steamboat called the Minnie M., which was run between Sheboygan and Sault Ste. Marie, carrying freight and passengers, and which used wood for fuel, and had no fire screen of any kind attached to her smokestack. On the morning of November 25, 1890, the boat lay at McArthur's dock, on the west side of the river, some 1,200 feet above the lumber in question; and, about 5 o'clock in the morning of that day, she was fired up with pine slabs, left the dock, and passed down the river on her course and by the lumber in question. The river at this point was about 220 feet wide. At the time of her passing, a strong wind was blowing from the west, and, about fifteen or twenty minutes after the boat passed down, the lumber was seen to be on fire. It was entirely consumed.

The plaintiff, to establish his claim, called several witnesses, who testified substantially as follows:

Charles J. Kitchen: That he was master of the tug C. B. Strohn, which lay on the east side of the river, above the Minnie M.; that he saw the Minnie M. winding at McArthur's dock; that his attention was attracted to her by fire coming out of her smokestack; that there was a large volume of sparks escaping from the stack going across the river, eastward; that he watched her until she got around with her stern pretty well up the river, watched her five or six minutes, may be longer; that there were lots of sparks coming from the Minnie M. at that time, more than there ordinarily are when they are starting up the fire; and that there were more sparks than he ever saw coming out of the smokestack of a steamboat.

Paul Verette: That he was a policeman for nearly six years in Sheboygan, and while on his watch, about half past 4 o'clock on that morning, he was standing on the bridge which was above where the Minnie M. lay; that he saw her as she was just leaving McArthur's dock, and saw her four or five minutes; that the sparks coming out of her smokestack drew his attention; that there was a lot of them, and there was a pretty high wind right across the river from the northwest towards the southeast; that the sparks coming out of the stack were going across the river among the lumber piles on the east side of the river; that, when he last saw the boat, she was passing Nelson's mill (Nelson's mill and the Sheboygan Lumber Company's mill are the same), and was throwing sparks at that time which were going towards the lumber piles. The sparks were coming out very thick, just the full of the smokestack.

Reuben H. Mosher: That he was the captain of the tug Cuyler; that the tug passed down the river before the Minnie M., and came back, and tied up to the dock on the east side of the river, about 1,200 feet below the point where the fire broke out. He was lying down in the tug Cuyler when the Minnie M. went by him. About fifteen minutes after the Minnie M. passed, he was called by Jarvis, who was aboard of the tug, and got up, and saw the fire in the first pile next to the mill. It had just started, and was about 12 feet above the dock, and about 4 or 5 feet down from the top of the pile nearest to the front of the dock towards the river.

James Taunt: That he was fireman on the tug Cuyler, and that, while she lay at the dock below the lumber, he came up on deck, and saw the Minnie M. go down the river as he came up. She was somewhere about abreast of the Sheboygan Lumber Company's mill. Sparks were coming out of her smokestack about the full of the smokestack. He called the attention of Mr. Harrington, who also looked out. Taunt continued to look at the Minnie M. until she passed the Cuyler. The sparks which he saw coming from the smokestack were going right into the lumber on the east side of the river, into the two piles below the mill.

Dewitt C. Harrington, the engineer of the tug Cuyler, testified that Mr. Taunt called him out to see sparks coming out of the Minnie M. He went on deck, and saw sparks coming out of the smokestack of the Minnie M., an unusual amount coming out,—some big ones and some little ones. They were going across the river to the east side. He continued to watch the boat until she got past the Cuyler. The sparks continued to come out of her during the whole time she was going down the river. As the sparks went to the east side of the river, some of them went onto the piles, some of them went into them, and some over them. Some ten or fifteen minutes afterwards the alarm was given. He went on deck to see the fire. He saw sparks going in at about the place where the fire was in the lumber.

George Adams, who was engineer on the city waterworks, and was on watch at the waterworks at the time, testified that he saw the Minnie M. going down the river; saw her after she left the dock until she got out to the end of the lumber piles going out of the river; and saw her throwing fire out of her smokestack, quite a good deal of it, during the whole time he saw her. About fifteen or twenty minutes after the Minnie M. went down the river, he saw the fire in the lumber piles. The sparks, as he saw them coming out of the stack, were going across the river towards the lumber piles.

After the above witnesses had testified, the plaintiff called Thomas McGarraty, who had had twelve years' experience as captain of a tug, who testified to the use of fire screens to prevent the escape of fire, and on the subject of the different kinds of screens used. At this point the court interposed, and the following took place: "The court: Have you got any more testimony as to the cause of the fire? Counsel: Oh, yes, sir. The court: I went down on the bridge here [in Bay City] last night, and I looked up towards Twenty-Third street bridge. It is less than a mile and a half, and it seemed to me that the evidence in on that subject is too uncertain to base a verdict on it,—the evidence as to the setting of the fire to the lumber by the Minnie M. Counsel: We except to the statement of the court. The court: It appears that the night, while not intensely dark, was not a moonlight night, cloudy, and the sky full of scuds, and a heavy wind. I don't think that anybody from either the upper part of the river, or where his tug laid, as marked on the map, can tell with any degree or even probability that the Minnie M. set that fire, from the testimony in. Counsel: We have offered such direct testimony upon that subject as we have. The court: Have you offered it all? Counsel: We have not offered it all, but it is all of the same kind. There isn't any other testimony that we have that will bring it closer than that. We have evidence of other witnesses relatively in the same position that the witnesses who have sworn were to the same occurrences. If that is your honor's view, our testimony could only be made stronger by having more witnesses to the occurrences. Counsel: We except to the statement of the court. The court: What have you to say about the right of the jury to base a verdict on what there is of it? Counsel: We simply say we think it is sufficient to show the cause of the fire absolutely and conclusively. The court: Under the statement of counsel, I shall feel compelled— I don't think it would be doing my duty to allow a verdict on the testimony to stand in favor of the plaintiff, if one was obtained. You can take such course about it as you are a mind to with that intimation. I shall feel in duty bound to instruct the jury as to the totally unsatisfactory species of evidence as to the cause of the fire.

If boats on this river can be held liable upon such proof, there is no use of boats entering the Saginaw river. It would absolutely banish commerce upon this stream. Tugs are running around here, from here to the mouth of the river, and they never did, as a general thing, use spark arresters. The larger vessels never use them at all. They lie right here by the lumber dock, load lumber for days and weeks, and are passing up and down the stream every day; and I should want the most conclusive and direct proof of the fact of setting the fire, in order to allow a verdict in such case. Counsel: We except to the statement of the court. The court: It appears from the testimony that the cut in the harbor is something more than a mile and a half. Counsel: Not over a mile. The court: Very well. Twenty-Third street bridge is about a mile and sixty rods from the Third street bridge here. No mortal man can go onto the Third-street bridge, and tell anything about the setting of fire up there, from the mere fact that sparks are escaping. Counsel: Don't understand us to concede that the witnesses were a mile away from the place. The court. The first witness was on a bridge which was some nine hundred feet from the mill, and that was some four hundred feet from the place where the fire commenced. Counsel: No; one hundred and fifty feet. The court: I think it is some fourteen hundred from where the fire started. It is one hundred and fifty feet beyond the slip leading from the rear of the mill. He was looking down that way. The other witness,—that was on the Strohn,—he saw the Cuyler pass him, and watched her outside. He noticed the boat when she was considerably,—this fire casting out a great many sparks; and she went out of the harbor throwing out more or less sparks. Now, it is a fact that, while all coal don't make sparks like soft wood or pine slabs, there is fire there, and occasional fires are caught from coal sparks. Still, there is no proof that this boat emitted a spark within five hundred feet of the place where the fire caught in the lumber at all in either direction. It is totally lacking in definiteness and certainty. I don't see anything certain about it. It may have been so, and that is all you can say about it. Counsel: Under this statement, the only thing that is left for us to do is to put our testimony in shape to save the question, for, after what your honor has said to the jury, it would be useless for us to go to them on the question of fact. The court: You can put your offer or your claim in any shape you are a mind to, and I will pass on it. I cannot try another case to day unless the parties are ready. If you desire it, you can have time for conference together until later in the day. It may be that my experience with boats influences my judgment, but in my mind there is nothing to indicate that this boat set that fire. Counsel: Note an exception to the statement of the court. Counsel to witness: Where do I understand that you have used these spark screens on your tugs? A. At Muskegon, and in the Muskegon lake. Spark screens on tugs are generally used at Muskegon; used on the smokestacks or in the smokestacks."

Several witnesses were thereafter called, who testified to having seen sparks from this boat falling upon the lumber; but this testimony was no more direct as to the origin of the fire than that above quoted. No evidence was given nor attempt made to account for the setting of the fire other than by sparks from this boat. The only other boat passing down the river that morning was the tug Cuyler, which was burning coal for fuel, and which, plaintiff's testimony showed, did not throw sparks on that occasion.

Counsel for plaintiff then offered to show further, by several witnesses, that sparks were seen coming from the stack of the Minnie M., and passing over and upon the lumber, when the court remarked: "Another witness testified here that he saw the sparks going into or on the lumber, but his position was such that I don't regard it as of any consequence." Defendant then offered testimony tending to contradict plaintiff's testimony, and to show that no sparks were coming out of the stack on the Minnie M. on that occasion, and to show that she was equipped with a damper and flue cap, which were in order; that the damper was closed, and the fire cap open, when she passed down the river; and that, when in that condition, dangerous sparks would not escape from the smokestack. Although the court had so commented upon the testimony of the witnesses for plaintiff, he finally concluded there was some evidence which the jury might consider as to the origin of the fire, and stated to counsel that he would so submit it.

The plaintiff's case was so greatly prejudiced by these and other remarks of the court below that a new trial should be granted upon this branch of the case alone; and, in view of a new trial, we shall pass upon the other assignments of error.

The manager of the defendant company was called as a witness, and was permitted to testify that the Minnie M. ran in connection with the Detroit & Cleveland Steam Navigation Company (running from Detroit to Sheboygan and Mackinaw), the Northern Michigan Line, the Grummond Line (from Toledo, Cleveland, and Detroit), the Grand Rapids & Indiana Railroad (running from Indiana to Mackinaw), and the Michigan Central Railroad; that an arrangement for joint tariff had been arranged with the Grand Rapids & Indiana Railroad for carrying freight; that the Minnie M. carried freight and passengers on its line destined for points outside of Michigan, and from outside of the state destined for points along the line of its route in this state; also, that it had arrangements with each of these transportation lines in regard to carrying freight and passengers. This evidence was taken under the objection of plaintiff's counsel, and was introduced for the purpose of showing that the Minnie M. was engaged in interstate commerce, and therefore no recovery could be had.

This question was settled in Sheboygan Lumber Co. v. Delta Transp. Co., 100 Mich. 16. In that case evidence was given upon the same point, and the following requests presented by the defendant: "The Minnie M., on the day alleged in the declaration, being engaged in interstate commerce, is not liable for any damages she may have caused by reason of not having a fire screen attached to her smokestack, as required by Act No. 133 of the Laws of 1881, such act being an attempted regulation of interstate commerce; and the plaintiff cannot therefore recover." Also: "The laws and regulations passed by congress regulating steam vessels contain no provisions regarding fire screens to be attached to the smokestacks of steam vessels; and, the Minnie M. on the date alleged in the information being engaged in interstate commerce, her owners, and masters were not bound to have such an appliance on its smokestacks." These requests were refused, and this court, in considering that question, held that the fact that the boat was engaged in interstate commerce, and that it was enrolled and equipped and provided with all the machinery and mechanical appliances required by the act of congress and the regulations adopted thereunder by the board of supervising inspectors, did not relieve the owners of the vessel from their liability, under the common law, for injuries done by fire escaping from the smokestack of the vessel; and that they would be liable for such injury, arising from a failure to use a fire screen in the smokestack, although such fire screen was not required by the laws of congress or the rules of the supervising inspectors, if reasonable care at the common law required the use of such fire screens. After considering the provisions of the act of congress, it was said: "We cannot therefore hold that the act of congress relieves the defendant from its liability at the common law and its duty to use appliances which experience has shown to be required by common prudence for the protection of property on the banks of the public highways traversed by its boats." The principle in that case was that the legislation of congress had not excluded the application of the common law upon this subject in reference to the operation of steamboats; that the common law existing in this state continues in force, notwithstanding the legislation of congress, so long as the law enacted by congress and the law of the state do not conflict.

That case, however, was brought upon the common-law liability of the defendant to answer for its negligence in setting the fire. In the present case suit is brought upon the statute, which provides:

"Section 1. That all vessels using wood for fuel, navigating any of the waters of this state, shall be provided with suitable fire screens attached to the smokestack of such vessels to prevent the escape of fire. Such fire screens shall be of the best approved kind shown by experience to be proper and suitable for protection from fire.

"Sec. 2. That the owner or owners and master of any steam vessel navigating the waters of this state who shall neglect to provide his or their vessel with the fire screens attached to the smokestacks of said vessels, as mentioned in section one of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of one hundred dollars, or by confinement in the county jail not exceeding thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court. . . . The owner of such vessels shall also, when any person is injured in person or property by reason of fire occasioned by the neglect of such owner of such vessels to comply with the provisions of section 1 of this Act, be liable to the amount of damages sustained to the person so injured, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction in this state."

But the common law is no more and no less a particular law of the state than this act of the legislature; and, if the omission to employ means for the protection of property which are required by the common law creates a liability, the omission to employ the same means or like means required by the provisions of the statute of the state would create a like liability, since the statute is no more in conflict with the law of congress than is the common law of the state in conflict with it. The common law of the state and a statute of the state are in the same sense laws of the state. Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 475, 31 L. ed. 511. The principle has received abundant adjudication that the state may exercise its power to make regulations for the protection of the health, the lives, and the property of the people of the state against the dangers arising under interstate transportation and commerce, concurrent with the laws passed by congress in the exercise of the jurisdiction of congress over the same subjects, and that the laws of the state are valid and may be enforced so long as they do not conflict with the provisions of federal legislation. King v. American Transp. Co. 1 Flipp. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 7,787; New York v. Miln, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 102, 9 L. ed. 648, 13 Curt. Dec. 357; Goodrich Transp. Co. v. Gagnon, 36 Fed. Rep. 123; Johnson v. Chicago & P. Elevator Co. 119 U. S. 388, 399, 400, 30 L. ed. 447, 451; Parkersburg & O. R. Transp. Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 691, 700-707, 27 L. ed. 584, 588-590; Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238; Huse v. Glover, 119 U. S. 543, 30 L. ed. 487; Sands v. Manistee River Imp. Co. 123 U. S. 288, 31 L. ed. 149; Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. v. Louisville Board of Health, 118 U. S. 455, 30 L. ed. 237; Sherlock v. Alling, 98 U. S. 99, 23 L. ed. 819; Harrigan v. Connecticut River Lumber Co. 129 Mass. 580, 37 Am. Rep. 387; People v. Jenkins, 1 Hill, 469; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804.

It was held in Sheboygan Lumber Co. v. Delta Transp. Co., supra, that, by the common law of this state, appliances should be used which experience has shown to be reasonably effective in avoiding danger, and that it is apparent that none of the provisions of the act of congress show any intent to legislate upon or provide for the protection of persons or property on land. It was said: "If we look to the regulations adopted by the board of inspectors, the same purpose is manifest. Nothing enumerated in the certificate of inspectors conflicts with the common-law rule as to the duty which is imposed by the common law in regard to the protection of persons and property upon shore and within the jurisdiction of the respective states. It would seem, therefore, to be a reasonable conclusion that it was not the intention of congress to abrogate all the rules of the common law relative to liability for injuries inflicted by the negligence of vessel owners in not supplying their vessels with appliances which common experience has shown to be requisite for the proper protection of persons and property upon shore, and the use of which would not endanger the safety of persons and property on board." The act under which the present suit is brought was passed nearly fifteen years ago, and with the provisions of which, it is apparent, many vessels navigating the waters of the state have complied, and we find nothing in the acts of congress or the regulations of the supervising inspectors in conflict therewith; and what was said in Sheboygan Lumber Co. v. Delta Transp. Co. is equally applicable to the present case, though the action is brought under the statute, and not in reliance upon the common-law liability. Railroad companies running their trains are as much engaged in interstate commerce as is the defendant in running this steamboat between Sheboygan and Sault Ste. Marie. The various states have enacted statutes requiring specific precautions to be taken in running trains, for the purpose of protecting life and property in the state against dangers arising from the operation of railroads. These statutory regulations are upheld against the objections made that the railroads affected by such regulations are engaged in interstate commerce. Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 32 L. ed. 852, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 238; Union Pac. R. Co. v. De Busk, 12 Colo. 294, 3 L. R. A. 350; McCandless v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 88 S. C. 103, 18 L. R. A. 440; Henningson v. State, 90 Ga. 396, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 418; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Tyler, 90 Va. 297, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 481. The court was therefore in error in permitting this testimony, as it was wholly irrelevant and incompetent. It had no place in the case. There is nothing in the fact that the boat was engaged in interstate commerce which in any manner affected the question of the defendant's liability.

The plaintiff requested the court to charge as follows: "Third. It is admitted in this case by the defendant that on the 25th day of November, 1890, the defendant was the owner of the vessel called the Minnie M.; that she was then operated by the defendant and was engaged in navigating the Sheboygan river; and that her route extended from Sheboygan to Sault Ste. Marie, in the state of Michigan, and on that route carried freight and passengers, stopping also at intermediate points in the state. It is further admitted by the defendant that she had no fire screen attached to the smokestack of the vessel to prevent the escape of fire. The evidence in this case is undisputed that on the morning of November 25, 1890, she left McArthur's dock, in Sheboygan, passing down the Sheboygan river on her route, going by the place where the plaintiff's lumber was situated, and that, after she had passed by the lumber, fire was discovered in the lumber, which spread and consumed the lumber. If the jury find that by reason of the neglect of the defendant to provide the said vessel with a suitable fire screen attached to her smokestack, to prevent the escape of fire, fire or sparks escaped from the smokestack of the vessel, and fell upon the lumber, and caused it to be set on fire and to be burned and destroyed, the defendant is liable to the plaintiff to the amount of the damage thereby sustained by the plaintiff." The court declined to give the request as presented, but gave it with this additional qualification: "It appears from the testimony that this fire screen that is approved of by these masters who have testified about it has a mesh of iron three eighths to half an inch square. If a fire screen of that kind would totally prevent this fire, I give you that request. But, if this fire should be set by the smaller sparks, I could not give it to you, because the statute says that the injury must be occasioned by the lack of the fire screen, and, if the fire screen did not prevent the small sparks shown by the testimony, there would be no liability."

The testimony on the part of plaintiff in respect to the spark screens which were used on vessels, and the size of the mesh of those screens, was given by Charles J. Kitchen, who describes the butterfly screen as a screen placed inside of the smokestack, and opened and closed by a lever, the size of the mesh used being a quarter of an inch; Thomas McGarraty, who testified to the use of a bonnet screen, gives the size of the mesh as a quarter of an inch; James Smith, who testified in relation to the butterfly screen, gave the size of the mesh as a quarter of an inch; Charles Robinson gave the size of the mesh of the same kind of screen as about a quarter of an inch; and Albert Todd and John McLaughlin also testified as to the use of the butterfly screen, but did not give the size of the mesh,—from which evidence on the part of the plaintiff it will be seen that there was no foundation on the part of the court for the statement that "it appears from the testimony that this fire screen that is approved of by these masters who have testified about it has a mesh of iron three eighths to half an inch square." The request should not have been qualified by any such statement. The jury had no right to consider whether the fire would have been prevented by using a screen with a mesh half an inch square.

The latter statement of the court that, "if this fire should be set by the smaller sparks, I could not give it to you, because the statute says the injury must be occasioned by the lack of the fire screen, and, if the fire screen did not prevent the small sparks shown by the testimony, there would be no liability," taken in connection with the statement that the fire screen that had been approved by the masters who had testified had a mesh half an inch square, and, if a fire screen of that kind would totally prevent the fire, he would give the request, conveyed to the jury the idea that, if a fire screen having a mesh half an inch square did not prevent the escape of small sparks, there would be no liability on the part of the defendant, and put the case to them so they were required to find, not whether the fire was set by large sparks or small ones, but whether the use of a fire screen having a mesh half an inch square did or did not prevent small sparks from escaping. The request as framed covered correctly the question, and should have been submitted to the jury. The evidence describes two different kinds of screens,—the butterfly screen and the bonnet screen. It described screens having a mesh not exceeding one quarter inch, and also tended to show that by the use of such screens all dangerous sparks were prevented from escaping. The statute under which the action is brought required that vessels should be provided with screens that "shall be of the best approved kind shown by experience to be proper and suitable for protection from fire." It was for the jury to determine from the evidence which of the various screens shown to have been used was the best approved kind, proper and suitable for protection from fire.

After describing to the jury the size of the meshes of the screen which they were to take into account, the court charged the jury as follows: "Now, if from your judgment and experience and knowledge, or better understanding of the testimony, you can say that there were large sparks that ought to have been arrested by the spark catcher, you can find a verdict for the plaintiff; otherwise, you will find that there is no cause of action. The whole right to recover depends on this fire happening, being occasioned by sparks that would have been checked by this spark arrester." This charge is a direction to the jury that they may determine the question of fact involved as to whether the employment of a screen upon the smokestack would have prevented the fire, by acting on their own judgment and experience and knowledge. They should have been directed that they were to determine the facts in the case, not from their judgment or experience or knowledge, but from the testimony given by the witnesses on the trial of the case.

The court also charged the jury: "You will also consider in that connection the evidence in regard to the Cuyler. She went down the river, and she had banked up her fires in the evening before. She had put fresh coal on, and shut the damper. According to this expert from Milwaukee, the effect of that was to coke the coal, which rendered it light and easy for it to fly, to be burned and thrown up in sparks, and that these sparks would last a long time,—longer than wood, I think he stated." This evidence referred to as given by the expert from Milwaukee is in the testimony of the defendant's witness John V. Tuttle, the whole of which is as follows: "Q. Suppose a furnace has the fires banked in it,—a coal fire,—and it is allowed to remain banked for some hours, and then the fires are raked out upon the grates. What is the character of sparks that would be driven through the flues and out of the smokestack? A. The sparks in such a case would be in the nature of coke, or very much the same as charcoal; a little heavier than charcoal sparks when the fire is first started. When the fire is first raked down, probably for fifteen or twenty minutes, the sparks escaping from the stack, if there should any escape, would be in the nature of coke, light, much lighter than ordinary coal sparks. Q. Can you tell whether sparks of that character retain fire for any length of time? A. They do. In fact, so that I have known them sometimes to burn little spots on the deck of a boat where they came out of a stack and fell down. They would blow away from the boat if there was a high wind, and they would retain their heat longer than a wood spark." The only apparent object in referring to this testimony in the charge was to indicate to the jury that they might find from this that the fire was set by the tug Cuyler, and not by the Minnie M. The testimony in reference to the tug shows that her fires were banked down, and, when she started out on that morning, the fire was raked down, some fresh coal put on, and that no sparks were going out of her stack while on the way down. Several witnesses were called who testified positively that there were no sparks coming out of her stack. The court was in error in this statement, as it was unwarranted by the testimony in the case.

Counsel for defendant do not attempt in their brief to answer any of the errors claimed by the plaintiff and here discussed, but content themselves with a discussion of the provisions of the statute under which the action is brought, which they claim is unconstitutional, and for that reason no action could be maintained upon it.

1. It is contended that the act contravenes section 20, article 4, of the Constitution of this state, which provides: "No law shall embrace more than one object, which shall be expressed in its title." It has been uniformly held in applying this provision of the constitution that, if the title of the statute expresses a general purpose, all matters fairly and reasonably connected with that purpose, and all measures which are convenient or appropriate or fairly calculated to facilitate the accomplishment of that purpose, are properly parts of the statute. As was said in Kurtz v. People, 33 Mich. 262: "It is a very wise and wholesome provision, intended to prevent legislators from being entrapped into the careless passage of bills on matters foreign to the ostensible purpose of the statute as entitled; but it is not designed to require the body of the bill to be a mere repetition of the title. Neither is it intended to prevent including in the bill such means as are reasonably adapted to secure the object indicated by the title." It is contended, however, that no person reading the title to this act would expect to find provisions for recovery of damages occasioned for neglect to provide fire screens for smokestacks. But the title to Act No. 206, Pub. Acts 1893, was no more specific. The title specified several specific and particular acts to be done, to wit, to assess property, to levy taxes, to collect the same, to make them a lien, to establish and continue such lien, to provide for the sale and conveyance of the lands, and to provide for the inspection and disposition of lands bid off to the state. By section 185 it is provided that no deed shall be recorded until a certificate is furnished showing the payment of all taxes; and further: "A violation of the provisions of this section by the register of deeds shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, he shall be fined not to exceed one hundred dollars, and he shall be further liable to the grantee of any instrument so recorded for the amount of damages sustained, to be recovered in an action for debt in any court of this state." This act was under consideration in Van Husean v. Heames, 96 Mich. 504, and the objection made that it contravened this provision of the constitution. The act was upheld. We think the act in the present case is not void upon the ground stated. The following cases also sustain this principle: Grand Rapids v. Burlingame, 93 Mich. 472; Hall v. Burlingame, 88 Mich. 488, 440; People v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 57, 9 Am. Rep. 108; People v. Wands, 23 Mich. 385, 399; People v. State Ins. Co. 19 Mich. 392, 398; People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481, 495.

But it is said the object of the act is to compel the use of fire screens by steam vessels, and to provide a penalty for the violation of that requirement, and that the term "penalty," as used in this title, excludes the idea of the imposition of damages to be paid to the party injured. The term "penalty," as used in the title, is intended to include the liability to be imposed for damages, as well as the liability for fine and imprisonment. As was said in Grover v. Huckins, 26 Mich. 476: "The term 'penalty' is used very loosely in statutes in some cases, and might without much strain of its meaning be held to embrace all the consequences visited by law upon the heads of those who violate police regulations." The term "penalty" is used as covering and including the imposition of damages, in Act No. 813, Pub. Acts 1887, cited in Robison v. Miner, 68 Mich. 549, where, by section 20 of the Act, it is provided that persons violating certain provisions of the act "shall, in addition to all other penalties provided for by this act, be liable for both actual and exemplary damages therefor," etc. See also Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Raymond, 70 Mich. 499, in which it is said: "An act to regulate a business must of necessity visit some sort of punishment or penalty for violation of its provisions, as the penalty is the only lever that could give practical effect to the law."

2. The objection to the act that it is repugnant to the acts of congress on the same subject has been fully discussed, and need not be further referred to; and the objection that fire screens endanger the vessel was disposed of in Sheboygan Lumber Co. v. Delta Transp. Co., supra, in which it was said: "Of course, the first duty of a vessel owner is the protection of those on board and who are directly under his care. It follows that any device, appliance, or equipment which endangers them cannot be required by law, no matter how great the protection it would furnish to the property on shore. When the dangerous character of such devices is in issue, and the evidence is conflicting, the jury should be very carefully and clearly instructed in the direction above indicated. They should be distinctly told that if they find the device, upon the use or absence of which negligence is based, is dangerous to the boat and to the property and persons on board, the law does not require it." The requirements of this statute are no more imperative than the common law, and may be enforced under the rule laid down in the foregoing case, unless it appears as a fact, found in the case, that the use of fire screens endangers the vessel or the property or persons on board.

3. It is further contended that the act requiring a spark screen is unreasonable, and therefore void. The argument is that the requirement of the statute that the screens "shall be of the best approved kind shown by experience to be proper and suitable for protection from fire" is unreasonable, because the question whether the kind employed upon the boat, in the endeavor to comply with the statute, was such a screen, must be determined by a jury, and the owner could not beforehand determine how the jury would decide upon that subject; also, if a definite screen were specified, other states might require different screens, and thus the vessel owner be put to inconvenience in complying with the different regulations. Most of the cases referred to by counsel for defendant in support of this contention relate to city ordinances. Whether the ordinances of a city are valid or not involves the question of whether they are by the courts regarded as reasonable. This rule is applicable only to ordinances. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 319. The courts cannot, however, declare a statute unconstitutional and void solely on the ground of unjust and oppressive provisions, or because it is supposed to violate the natural, social, or political rights of the citizen, unless it can be shown that such injustice is prohibited or such rights guaranteed or protected by the constitution. Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 199. The learned author says further, at page 200: "The rule of law upon this subject appears to be that, except where the constitution has imposed limits upon the legislative power, it must be considered as practically absolute, whether it operate according to natural justice or not in any particular case. The courts are not the guardians of the rights of the people of the state, except as those rights are secured by constitutional provision, which comes within the judicial cognizance. The protection against unwise or oppressive legislation within constitutional bounds is by an appeal to the justice and patriotism of the representatives of the people." This doctrine is upheld in numerous cases cited in the note to page 201. The rule of the statute, however, is no more onerous than the rule of the common law, nor more difficult to comply with than are the requirements imposed by the courts to guard against danger arising to life and property by the operations of business which create such dangers.

In Hoyt v. Jeffers, 86 Mich. 181, the suit was against the owner of a sawmill for failure to have a spark screen upon the smokestack or chimney of his mill. After referring to the fact that the mill stood in the midst of a city, and contiguous to wooden buildings, and that the degree of care required depended upon the surrounding circumstances, it was said: "In fact, I think the true rule is that the defendant, in adopting means to check the flow of sparks and to avert the danger in question, under the circumstances of this case, was bound, not only to adopt means calculated to avert the danger, but the means which in the progress of science and improvement have been shown by experience to be the best, unless, indeed, it be some invention so recently made as not to be generally known, or which the defendant, by reasonable inquiry for the best means, might not fairly be supposed to have obtained a knowledge of."

In Jackson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 31 Iowa, 176, 7 Am. Rep. 120, the suit was brought for damages caused by fire set by a railroad engine. On the subject of the care required by the company to guard against fire, the court said: "Ordinary care and prudence required the use of the best contrivance known, and, unless such are used, it will be considered negligence. One who fails to use the best means within his reach to prevent the destruction of property does not exercise the care of a man of common prudence." The same rule is laid down in Metzgar v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 76 Iowa, 887; Steinweg v. Erie Railway, 43 N. Y. 126, 8 Am. Rep. 673; Spaulding v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 30 Wis. 121, 11 Am. Rep. 550; Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Pindar, 53 Ill. 447, 5 Am. Rep. 57.

In some of the states statutes have been enacted imposing absolute liability for damages arising from fires set by locomotives, and such statutes have been upheld. Ross v. Boston & W. R. Co. 6 Allen, 87; Martin v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 62 Conn. 331; Denver, T. & G. R. Co. v. De Graff, 2 Colo. App. 42; McCandless v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 88 S. C. 103, 18 L. R. A. 440. The legislature of this state, in the enactment of the statute under consideration, has imposed no greater burden upon the vessel owners navigating the waters of this state than the common-law rule imposes in most of the states upon railroad companies in reference to means to prevent damages to life and property by fires.

4. The objection further made by counsel is that the title of the act provides that steam vessels shall provide fire screens, etc., while section 1 of the body of the Act provides that all vessels shall have fire screens, etc., and that, therefore, the act is repugnant in its terms. The rule of construction of statutes requires that a reasonable interpretation be given to the language used in the provisions so as to accomplish the object sought to be reached. The aim and purpose of this statute are to compel steam vessels navigating the waters of this state to be provided with fire screens for smokestacks, and to provide a penalty for violation of this requirement. The object is clear, and the mere omission of the word "steam" before the word "vessels," in section 1 of the Act, does not render the act repugnant in its terms. Clearly, it means all steam vessels.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

The other Justices concur.

v.

Jonas H. SHIREY et al.

(168 Pa. 584.)

1. The duty to fix a time and place for holding the general conference of a religious organization is administrative when the laws of the organization provide for the holding of such conferences at regular intervals, and name the bodies which shall fix the day and place at which they shall be held.
2. The administrative duties of the supreme power of a religious organization may be delegated.
3. The appointment of the place of meeting of the next general conference of a religious organization, and giving notice thereof to the annual conferences in time for them to select delegates to represent them in the general conference, by a standing board of the general conference to which the duty was delegated by the conference, is a fixing of such place according to laws of the organization which place the duty upon the general conference, so as to prevent action by the oldest annual conference, upon which the duty is devolved in case the general conference fails to act.

4. Adherents to a general conference of a religious organization held at a time and place designated by an annual conference without authority after another time and place had been regularly designated under the laws of the organization place themselves outside of the organization, and, although in the majority, have no title to the property of the organization as against persons claiming under the regularly appointed general conference.
5. The laws of an ecclesiastical body will be recognized and enforced by the civil courts when not in conflict with the constitution and laws of the state.
6. Decisions of ecclesiastical courts which plainly violate the law they profess to administer, or are in conflict with the laws of the land, will not be followed by the civil courts.
7. Congregations or parts of congregations of a religious body which has adopted

NOTE.—In connection with the above case on the constitutional law of religious bodies, see the decisions respecting the similar organization of United Brethren in Philomath College v. Wyatt (Or.) 26 L. R. A. 66 and other cases cited in footnotes thereto.

as part of its polity the itinerant plan for pastoral supply of the churches, who refuse to accept the supply sent by authority of the regular ecclesiastical agencies acting in accord with the general conference, cease to adhere to the organization.

8. An exposition by the supreme judicial tribunal of a religious association of a provision of the discipline, to the effect that under it a second trial after one acquittal upon substantially the same charges is illegal, is binding upon the members of the association, and must be respected by the civil courts.

9. The question of the regularity and legal effect of the organization of an annual conference of a religious organization, after forcibly intercepting the entrance of the bishop appointed to preside over it because of his alleged suspension from his office under the discipline of the organization, raises an ecclesiastical question upon which the decision of the highest tribunal of the order is binding on the civil courts.

10. Appointments of preachers by an annual conference of a religious organization, which has been pronounced by the highest tribunal of the order to have been illegally organized, confer no rights and impose no duties in respect to members or congregations still holding their allegiance to the old organization.

11. An annual conference of the Evangelical Association organized by a bishop with less than a quorum of those entitled to sit as members in the conference is, under the discipline of that denomination, irregular and illegal, and its appointment of preachers will confer no authority and impose no duty on the churches.

12. The minority members of the annual conference of a religious denomination when confronted with a revolt from the association of a majority, of the members of the conference, for which condition the discipline makes no provision, may provide temporarily for the religious care of those adhering to the minority, which action may subsequently be ratified by the highest tribunal of the denomination; but neither alone nor both combined can give the action of the minority regularity which will make it binding upon the revolting members.

13. Ecclesiastical standing, and not numbers, determines the title to, and the right of control over, property held for the use of a religious denomination.

APPPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Berks County dismissing a bill filed to enjoin defendants from asserting authority over or interfering with the property of Immanuel Church in the city of Reading. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Meers, Cyrus G. Derr, Edward Harvey, Augustus S. Sassaman, and Ritchie & Echer, for appellants:

The Buffalo general conference (1887) had power, under the discipline, to refer to the board of publication the selection of a place for the session of 1891.

State v. Esher, 6 Ohio C. Ct. Rep. 819; Auracher v. Yergor, 25 Chicago Legal News, 197; Schweicker v. Husser, 44 Ill. App. 566, 146 Ill. 869.

The usage of both general and annual conferences favors such a construction of the powers of general conference in this matter.

McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 14; State v. Farrie, 45 Mo. 196; Smith v. Swormstedt, 57 U. S. 16 How. 308, 14 L. ed. 950; Gibson v. Armstrong, 8 B. Mon. 510; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 527; Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 691, 36 L. ed. 309; Burrows-Giles Lithographic Co. v. Sarony, 111 U. S. 57, 28 L. ed. 851; Pollock v. Bridgeport S. R. Co. 114 U. S. 415, 29 L. ed. 148.

The entire church construed this as a lawful exercise of power on the part of the Buffalo conference until disputes arose, which suggested to those interested that their interests would be best served by a different construction.

Schweicker v. Husser, 146 Ill. 427.

The act of fixing the place for the general conference session was not one which, in its nature, was incapable of delegation.

The rule invalidating an act performed in a mode different from that prescribed is not applicable here.

Schweicker v. Husser, 146 Ill. 421.

The general conference "combines within itself all the branches which constitute the elements of a complete government, viz., executive, legislative, and judicial."

Com. v. Green, 4 Whart. 531; State v. Farrie, 45 Mo. 188.

A constitution is to be interpreted so as to carry out the great principles of the government, not to defeat them; and to that end, its commands are to be construed as merely directory, whenever it is not said that the acts shall be performed at the time and in the manner prescribed, and no other.

Com. v. Clark, 7 Watts & S. 183; Schlichter v. Keiter, 22 L. R. A. 161, 156 Pa. 119.

If a law be, in its provisions, constitutional the courts will not inquire whether the special forms of procedure prescribed in the constitution for its enactment have been complied with, Miller v. State, 8 Ohio St. 475; Kilgore v. Magee, 85 Pa. 401.

The grant of a power to do a certain thing carries with it the power to use all the appropriate means for the performance of the act.

S. 678, 30 L. ed. 766; United States v. Reese, 92 U. S. 258, 23 L. ed. 577; Bladen v. Philadelphia, 60 Pa. 464; Pittsburg v. Coursin, 74 Pa. 400; Cooley, Const. Lim. 82.

Fixing a place was a mere matter of "temporal economy."

The Buffalo conference was not interfering with anything in the nature of a vested right of the "oldest" conference when it undertook to refer the selection of a place to the board of publication.

Schweicker v. Husser, 146 Ill. 418; Auracher v. Yergor, 25 Chicago Legal News, 198; State v. Esher, 6 Ohio C. Ct. Rep. 812.

The action of the Buffalo conference was a construction of its own disciplinary powers in a manner and upon a matter that is conclusive upon the civil courts.

The annual conferences over which bishops Esber and Bowman presided in 1890 and 1891 might lawfully elect delegates to general conference, even though those bishops were lawfully suspended.

The Indianapolis conference lawfully passed upon the alleged suspensions of the bishops.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The legal questions involved in this case are interesting and important, but they are no longer open in this state. The labor which it has been necessary to expend upon the case in the court below and in this court has been over the facts and the inferences that ought to be drawn from them. This labor is made no less burdensome by the character of the facts to be passed upon. The conduct of the parties and their sympathizers on both sides seems to have been hasty, uncharitable, and ill-tempered. It affords a travesty, rather than an illustration of the precepts of the religion of peace for the support and diffusion of which the church was organized and the parties on both sides profess to have devoted their energies and their lives. But our concern is with the legal aspects of the case presented to us, and to them we turn, leaving the moral side of the controversy to the consciences of the combatants. The Evangelical Association of North America is a religious body that had its origin early in the present century. Its history presents a rapid growth and a career of usefulness. Its statistics for the year 1891 showed a membership of about 150,000. These were gathered into more than 2,000 churches, and under the pastoral care of about 1,250 preachers. Its ecclesiastical organization rests on the individual church or congregation. A convenient number of these form a quarterly conference, the sessions of which are presided over by a presiding elder. Several quarterly conferences grouped together by the action of the general conference form an annual conference, of which there were twenty-five in existence in 1891. The annual conferences elect delegates, according to a ratio previously fixed upon, to represent them in the general conference, which meets once in four years, and which is the highest body, legislative and judicial, in the denomination. The bishops, of whom there were three in 1891, and certain executive officers, are ex officio members of the general conference. The powers of this body are defined by the book of discipline. Paragraph 74, p. 57, declares it to be "the supreme court of law in the church." It has appellate jurisdiction of cases heard in the lower church tribunals, and original jurisdiction over all controversies to which the annual conferences are parties or that affect the legality or regularity of their action. It has jurisdiction over the bishops to try, suspend, depose, and expel them. Paragraph 73, p. 56, declares it to be the supreme legislative body in the church, subject, however, to two limitations upon its power. It cannot disturb the articles of faith. It cannot abandon the itinerancy or change the forms of church discipline. It also possesses general administrative powers which are recognized in several paragraphs of the book of discipline, among which are Nos. 72, 73, 76, and 93. It fixes the number of bishops needed, elects them and directs and supervises their work. It organizes and fixes the boundaries and names of the annual conferences. It conducts, through boards and committees, the publication and missionary enterprises of the denomination. In 1887 this denominational body, with all its religious and ecclesiastical machinery, was in harmonious and successful operation. Its general conference was in session in Buffalo, N. Y., and the several annual conferences were represented therein. In 1891 there were two bodies in session at the same time, in different portions of the country, each claiming to be the general conference of the Evangelical Association. Each elected bishops and claimed jurisdiction over the annual conferences and publication and missionary boards of the church. The litigants in this case are adherents of these rival bodies; the plaintiffs claiming title under one of them, and the defendants under the other. The first and the controlling question in this case is thus seen to be one of ecclesiastical identity. Which of these contending bodies is the general conference of the Evangelical Association? The next question is, Which of the parties now before us adheres to and derives title under the body found to be the general conference? Now it must be borne in mind that the organization of a denominational body or church involves the adoption of a religious creed and an ecclesiastical polity. Adherence to a particular body requires, therefore, adherence to both the creed and the polity. To abandon or repudiate either is to abandon or secede from the body whose authority is thus disregarded. In this case both parties claim to adhere to the creed of the Evangelical Association, and it seems to be conceded that no question of religious belief enters into the controversy. The points of difference arose under the polity of the church and rested on conflicting interpretations of provisions of the book of discipline. The first of these was over the meaning of paragraph 71, p. 56, which provides for fixing the time and place of meeting of the general conference. This paragraph empowers the bishops in attendance upon the general conference to name the time and place for the next meeting of the body, subject to the approval or disapproval of the body itself. If the first suggestion of the bishop is not approved, they should make and submit another, and so on until an agreement is arrived at. If the bishops are not present, the general conference proceeds to fix the time and place in the first instance. If, for any reason, the time and place are not fixed in either of these ways, and the conference adjourns without action on the subject, then the duty falls upon the oldest annual conference, and must be discharged, and the necessary notices given to the other conferences, so as to prevent a failure of the session of general conference during the proper year. The questions raised upon this paragraph were: First. What is the nature of the duty imposed by it? Is it legislative or administrative? Second. If administrative, what shall amount to a performance? The laws of the church provided for a meeting of the general conference once in four years; but they did not, because they could not, fix in advance the particular day and place at which these quadrennial meetings should be held. But the laws could and did make provision for the fixing of both time and place, by naming the instrumentalities by which these details should be settled from time to time as the circumstances then existing might seem to require. It devolved the duty of naming the time and place, first, on the bishops and the general conference; next, on the general conference alone; lastly, in case neither of these instrumentalities discharged it, on the oldest annual conference. The act had the same character by whichever of these bodies it was performed. It was a settlement of a matter of detail necessary to the administration of the polity or ecclesiastical system of the church. It was, therefore, an act of administration, not of legislation. The general rule is that the power to perform such acts may be delegated, and that the acts, when properly done by the appointee, are valid as the acts of the principal.

We proceed, therefore, to inquire what the board of publication did under the authority given it by the bishops and the general conference of 1887. It appears that a usage exists in this denomination that prevails in most, if not all, religious bodies. It is to receive invitations from towns and churches willing to entertain the body, and then select from the list of places offered that which is most desirable. In 1887, when this order of business was reached, the general conference had no offer of entertainment before it. It seemed best, under the circumstances, to the bishops and to the conference, to authorize the board of publication to receive offers of entertainment after the adjournment, and to correspond with the annual conferences upon the subject; and, after full consideration, to decide upon the place for the next session. This board was one of the permanent executive agencies of the church. It included all the bishops in its membership, and eight other persons, each of whom was selected from one of the eight districts into which the whole church was divided for this purpose. After considerable inquiry and correspondence, this board named Indianapolis as the place, and gave notice of this fact to the annual conferences. This was a complete discharge of the duty imposed upon the board of publication. It fixed definitely the place for the holding of the next general conference, with the same effect as though the place had been named by the conference itself, and it afforded ample opportunity to all the annual conferences to be represented therein. Several months later, the annual conference of East Pennsylvania met in Ebenezer Church in the city of Allentown. Without pausing to inquire into the regularity of its organization, or its power, under the book of discipline, to perform the proper work of an annual conference, but treating this body as being what it claimed to be, we will consider its action. It was a subordinate tribunal, whose judgments were removable by appeal to the general conference, but it assumed the right to review and sit in judgment upon the action of its superior. It pronounced the action of the general conference of 1887, in relation to the place of its next meeting, to be a violation of the discipline and therefore absolutely null and void. It then proceeded, as the oldest annual conference, to fix upon Philadelphia as the place, and gave notice of its action to the several annual conferences. This action was unnecessary. The time and place had been fixed by, or under the authority of, the general conference. The annual conferences had been notified in ample time to enable them to arrange for the attendance of their delegates. The place had not been objected to as unsuitable or inconvenient. If the delegation of the power to fix the place to the board of publication had been questionable, it had been unanimously acquiesced in at the time it was made, and under the circumstances seemed the only practicable thing to do. It worked no injury to the ecclesiastical body and affected injuriously no interest or enterprise of the church. But this action was not only unnecessary, it was disrespectful, irregular, and insubordinate. It put the judgment of the annual conference of East Pennsylvania against that of the supreme judicatory of the denomination upon a question affecting the construction of certain provisions in the discipline. It not only overruled its ecclesiastical superior, but it proceeded to act upon its own interpretation of the discipline in opposition to the action of its superior, and to call upon the other annual conferences to accept its decision, and reject that of the supreme court of law of the church upon the same subject. This was not revolution within, but rebellion against the ecclesiastical organization. Most of the annual conferences seem to have regarded the subject in this light, for eighteen of them sent undivided delegations to Indianapolis, while but two sent undivided delegations to Philadelphia. The remaining five were divided in opinion, and sent delegates to each place. The general conference meeting in Indianapolis had not only a quorum, but a decided majority, of all the delegates to which the annual conferences were entitled. It had also the two acting bishops and the other ex officio members of the body. The alleged general conference that met in Philadelphia did not have a quorum of those entitled to sit in general conference, and, as the master has well found, was incompetent, under the book of discipline, to transact business. It nevertheless assumed to set aside the authority of the body that met in Indianapolis, and to exercise the powers and functions of a lawful general conference. In fact it claimed to be the lawful successor of the general conference of 1887, and the supreme authority in the church. This, as we have said, was an open revolt. The churches and conferences that participated in it have, from that time, kept up an independent organization, and refused obedience to the conference that represented the majority, and maintained the ecclesiastical organization of the denomination. The result has been a divided body, and, what is to be more regretted, divided local congregations, creating discord, litigation, and personal bitterness, throughout the East Pennsylvania and several other annual conferences, in which the general Philadelphia general conference had its supporters. It follows necessarily that those who adhere to the Indianapolis general conference constitute the Evangelical Association. Those that adhere to the hostile body that met in Philadelphia are, by their own acts, put on the outside of the ecclesiastical organization, and must remain there until they recognize once more the authority of the body from which they have separated. Winebrenner v. Colder, 43 Pa. 244; Kerr v. Trego, 47 Pa. 292; Roski's App. 69 Pa. 462, 8 Am. Rep. 275.

The title to the church property of a congregation that is divided is in that part of the congregation that is in harmony with its own laws, usages, and customs as accepted by the body before the division took place, and who adhere to the regular organization. McGinnis v. Watson, 41 Pa. 9; McAuley's App. 77 Pa. 397; Landis's App. 103 Pa. 467. It does not matter that a majority of any given congregation or annual conference is with those who dissent. The power of the majority is bound by the discipline, and so are all the tribunals of the church, from the lowest to the highest. McAuley's App. supra; Sutter v. First Reformed Dutch Church Trustees, 42 Pa. 503; O'Hara v. Stack, 90 Pa. 477; Schlichter v. Keiter, 156 Pa. 119, 22 L. R. A. 161.

The laws of the ecclesiastical body will be recognized and enforced by the civil courts when not in conflict with the constitution and laws of the state. A sufficient reason for this is that they have been made or assented to by the parties, who have agreed with each other, by the act of uniting with the body, to be governed by its laws and usages. Tuigg v. Treacy, 104 Pa. 493. An independent congregation may be governed by the majority of its own membership, but a congregation connected with any given denomination must submit to the system of discipline peculiar to the body with which it is connected. Ehrenfeldt's App. 101 Pa. 186; Fernster v. Seiber, 114 Pa. 196.

Upon questions arising under the discipline, as upon those arising under the articles of faith, the decisions of the ecclesiastical courts are ordinarily final, and they will be respected and enforced by the courts of law. German Reformed Church v. Com. 8 Pa. 282; O'Hara v. Stack, 90 Pa. 477; Schlichter v. Keiter, 156 Pa. 119, 22 L. R. A. 161. But if such decisions plainly violate the law they profess to administer, or are in conflict with the laws of the land, they will not be fol-

Now, the itinerant plan for pastoral supply of the churches is a distinguishing feature of the polity of the Evangelical Association. The individual congregation cannot select for itself, but is bound to accept, the ministerial supply provided for it by the proper authorities under the discipline. Their action in this regard affords a distinct test of obedience and of adherence to the ecclesiastical organization. Henderson v. Hunter, 59 Pa. 335. Those congregations, or parts of congregations, that refuse the supply sent them by authority of the regular ecclesiastical agencies acting in accord with the general conference, and receive a supply sent under the authority of an irregular minority body, do not adhere to the organization, but put themselves in open revolt against it. By such action, they subject themselves, as individuals, to suspension or expulsion from the church; as congregations and annual conferences they expose themselves to punishment by exclusion from the body with which they have ceased to be in harmony, and against the authority of which they have arrayed themselves. Upon the facts as they appear in the evidence, the learned master should have found that the general conference meeting at Indianapolis in 1891 was the regular and the duly constituted general conference of the Evangelical Association of North America, and that the body which met the same year in the city of Philadelphia was an irregular and hostile body, having no ecclesiastical authority whatever under the provisions of the book of discipline. He should then have found that those who adhere to the regular, general conference, and submit to its authority, constitute the Evangelical Association. He should also have found that those who adhere to the irregular and hostile body have by their own conduct placed themselves outside the denomination whose authority they reject. These conclusions we reach independently of the various questions which relate to the trials of the bishops and the organizations of the East Pennsylvania conference in 1891. But these questions are fairly before us, and we have no disposition to decline an examination of them; indeed, the reasons for the conclusions already reached will be made the more apparent by a brief discussion of these questions. Bishop Dubbs was tried before a properly constituted trial conference, found guilty, and sentenced to suspension from office until the next general conference. He denied the justice, but not the validity, of his conviction; and he acquiesced in the sentence pronounced upon him. No question affecting this trial and sentence is presented by this record, and an examination into the subject is unnecessary and irrelevant. The charges on which Bishop Dubbs was tried were formulated in November and December, 1889. The trial took place in February, 1890. In December, 1889, Bishops Esher and Bowman were separately examined by three elders on charges that had been made in certain religious periodicals, and brought to the attention of the examining elders by one who acted as a prosecutor. The examining elders found the charges to be without foundation in each case, and prepared a certificate showing the nature of the charges, the examination made by them, and their finding acquitting the accused thereon, and delivered a copy of such finding to each of the bishops. A few weeks later substantially the same charges were made by another prosecutor. Another examination was made by three elders summoned by him. This examination resulted in a finding that the charges were well founded, and the calling of a trial conference for the trial of each of the bishops upon them. From the beginning of this second proceeding, both Bishop Esher and Bishop Bowman set up the former examination and acquittal as a conclusive bar against it, and insisted that the second board of examiners, and the trial conference convened by their direction, were without jurisdiction. The examining elders, however, and the respective trial conferences called by them, promptly overruled the point raised by the bishops, asserted their jurisdiction, and proceeded with the trial. The bishops declined to appear, but in their absence, and with full knowledge of the previous examination and acquittal of each on substantially the same charges, the trial conferences heard testimony, found the accused guilty, and sentenced each to suspension from the episcopal office until the next general conference. Neither of the bishops acquiesced in the sentence. On the contrary, each insisted that his second examination, and the proceedings of the trial conference following it, were illegal and void; that the sentences were without authority, and might properly be disregarded by them and by the whole church. The decision of the question thus raised by the bishops depended upon the proper interpretation of certain provisions of the book of discipline. It was, therefore, a question of ecclesiastical law, to be decided by the highest ecclesiastical tribunal in the denomination. The trial conferences took the responsibility of deciding it in favor of their own jurisdiction. The bishops took the responsibility of deciding it the other way. The trial conferences knew that if the general conference overruled them upon this point all their proceedings must, necessarily, be held to be illegal and oppressive. The bishops knew that if the general conference did not sustain their point, their conduct in refusing to appear, and in disregarding the sentence pronounced upon them, must be held to be insubordinate, and their subsequent official acts to be invalid. Both sides were willing to take the risks, and to act upon their own interpretation of the discipline. The result was wide-spread discussion throughout the church, diverse conclusions, bitter dissensions, and finally, as we have seen, a disruption of the ecclesiastical body. For these unhappy consequences, which a more conciliatory course might have avoided, an impartial public will hold both the bishops and the trial conferences responsible. When the general conference met in 1891, it took notice of the dissensions and divisions that had grown up in the annual conferences, and in the congregations of which they were composed, and made inquiry into the cause that had led to such unhappy consequences. The result was an exposition of the discipline in accordance with the contention of the bishops, an indorsement of their conduct in disregarding the sentences imposed upon them, and an authoritative deliverance that the second examination, the trial, conviction, and sentence of each of the bishops were irregular, illegal, and void. This validated all the official acts of both the bishops, and invalidated the acts of the annual conferences and others, done on the theory that the convictions and sentences were legal. We have before us, therefore, the decision of the supreme court of law of the Evangelical Association upon the meaning and effect of one of the provisions of the book of discipline. This decision cannot be said to violate the constitution or the law of the land. It does not violate any law or usage of the ecclesiastical body. It is therefore binding on the Evangelical Association and its membership, and it must be respected by this court.

Whether the general conference disposed of this question in the wisest manner is not now for consideration. Its decision settled the law for the Evangelical Association, and we must recognize and apply it in this case. Here, again, the body that met in Philadelphia in 1891 put itself in open rebellion against the authority of the Evangelical Association. It decided that a charge preferred against a bishop, an examination into its truth by three elders, and an acquittal by them, had no significance whatever; but that the charge might be renewed and the examination repeated as often as a prosecutor could be found, or until a conviction and sentence could be obtained. It then approved the conviction and sentence of Bishops Esher and Bowman, and expelled both from the association. At the same time, it reversed the proceedings in the case of Bishop Dubbs, which had been approved by the Indianapolis general conference, relieved him from the sentence, and re-elected him to the office of bishop. In what manner the Philadelphia body could have made its antagonism to the general conference more open and pronounced, it is not easy to see.

It only remains to consider briefly the claims of the rival East Pennsylvania conferences. The time and place for the meeting of the annual conference of East Pennsylvania in 1891 had been regularly fixed. The place was Ebenezer Church, in the city of Allentown. The time was the 26th of February. This was about one year after the trial and sentence of Bishop Bowman, and after his position, and that of a large part of the church, upon the question of the legality of his suspension, were well known. Bishop Bowman came to Allentown to preside over the conference. The board of trustees of the Ebenezer Church, although without any ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the subject, met and decided that Bishop Bowman was incompetent to preside over the conference, because of his suspension by the trial conference. They then undertook to enforce the sentence of suspension by preventing him from entering the church edifice. A majority of the members of the conference was in active sympathy with this action, and co-operated with the trustees for the purpose of carrying it into effect. They signed a paper denying his right to preside, and by a committee from their number presented this paper and a copy of the action taken by the trustees, to the bishop. At the hour fixed for the meeting of the conference, the bishop approached the doors of Ebenezer Church. He was intercepted by the trustees and others, and prevented, by the use of force, from entering. Meantime the members of conference assembled in the building, and a majority of them, well knowing that the bishop was at the door and prevented, by force, from entering, treated him as absent and organized the conference by the election of a president to discharge his duties. They were well aware of the point raised by him affecting the legality of his sentence, and of the fact that a considerable portion of the whole church concurred with him in opinion. They knew also that the general conference would be in session within a few months, and that the question could then be decided. Notwithstanding all this, these persons acted, as the trial conferences had done, on their own exposition of the discipline, and took the risk of being overruled by the general conference. They deliberately staked their official action and their ecclesiastical position upon their own decision of a question that was not within their jurisdiction, and they lost. The general conference sustained the point taken by the bishops, held their sentence and conviction illegal, and the action of the conference of East Pennsylvania to be disorderly and in violation of the book of discipline. The organization effected by the forcible exclusion of the bishop was declared to be illegal, and the body itself, while so organized, to be without ecclesiastical character or authority. It is clear that the regularity and legal effect of the organization of the conference in the manner in which it was accomplished, raised an ecclesiastical question. Its decision depended upon an exposition of certain provisions of the discipline which it was the duty of the general conference to make. The decision actually made does not violate the laws of the state or of the church, and is conclusive upon the ecclesiastical body of which the general conference is the chief tribunal. For this reason it should be followed by the civil courts. Whatever authority may be conceded to the action of the East Pennsylvania conference by those who adhere to it, the judgment of the general conference leaves it without authority in the body with which it had been formerly connected. Its appointments, therefore, confer no right and impose no duty on preachers, church members, or congregations adhering to the general conference, and we cannot recognize a title derived like that of the defendants in this case, from the action of that body, as good against the general conference or its adherents. On the other hand, the action of Bishop Bowman and a few friends in organizing a rival conference was wholly unauthorized by the discipline, and the body so organized, not having a quorum of those entitled to sit as members of the East Pennsylvania conference, was an irregular body, without authority or ecclesiastical character under the discipline. The annual conference may sit without a bishop, and its acts be valid in all respects. A bishop cannot sit with less than a quorum, and make, by his presence, a legal conference out of that which would not have been such in his absence. If present, he presides, but he is not a necessary part of the body; and his presence, therefore, with those who, without him, would be without authority, can add nothing to them. If there had been no division in the conference, the presence of the bishop could not have given to a few of its members the character and power of a quorum. His conduct and that of his friends in suspending and expelling presiding elders and others, was a clear usurpation of power, and the sentences so pronounced had no force or effect.

The situation in Allentown in February, 1891, was certainly remarkable. A majority of the members of the annual conference was in one place, refusing the bishop admission, and proceeding upon the assumption that he was absent. The bishop and a handful of adherents were in another place, assuming the powers of a quorum, and fulminating their orders and judgments with the utmost complacency and in plain disregard of the discipline. The appointments made by this body gave no legal right to the appointees, and imposed no legal duty on the congregations concerned. But the meeting presided over by the bishop was a meeting of those who adhered to the ecclesiastical body whose legislative and judicial head was the general conference. Its members were confronted by a state of things for which the discipline made no provisions, viz., the revolt of a majority of the members of the conference with which they were connected. They were compelled to choose between adherence to the bishop and the body with which they had been connected, and adherence to the annual conference of East Pennsylvania, which had undertaken to put itself in an attitude of independence and hostility to that body. They chose the former. They were, as a consequence, practically outside of the annual conference to which they had belonged, and compelled to seek recognition in some capacity from the general conference. Their organization was therefore necessarily provisional. Their authority depended, in the first instance, on their own consent and that of the congregation, and individual members whom they represented, and their only appropriate business was to provide temporarily for the religious and ecclesiastical care of those who adhered to the organization until the general conference could meet and take appropriate action. The general conference met in October of the same year at Indianapolis. Its attention was drawn to the condition of the church in the East Pennsylvania conference, and to the action of the rival bodies claiming jurisdiction over the congregations within its bounds. It made a thorough investigation into the action and attitude of the majority body, and was led to recognize the revolt made by it as an accomplished fact. The Philadelphia conference, called by the East Pennsylvania annual conference, it recognized as a rival and hostile body, and declared officially that it was "a gross offense against our church," and that the persons engaged in holding and sustaining it had "thereby thrown off their allegiance to our church, and disenthralled themselves to any of the privileges of membership therein." So far the action of the general conference seems to have been regular, but when it came to consider the provisional gathering of its adherents it exceeded its powers under the discipline. It declared the minority body under the presidency of Bishop Bowman to be the only lawful and regular conference of the Evangelical Association and for the conference district of East Pennsylvania for 1891, and pronounced all its acts and proceedings regular and lawful. In so far as these acts related to the temporary care and supply of the congregations represented in the body, they were, as we have already seen, justified by the necessities of the situation; and their ratification by the general conference cured their original want of authority under the discipline, and clothed them with the authority of the general conference. But in so far as these acts dealt with the ecclesiastical positions or functions of those not members of the provisional body, or with congregations not represented therein, they were unauthorized assumptions of power that the general conference could not ratify, because, like the annual conferences, it was bound by the frame of government contained in the book of discipline. Out of the provisional body, the general conference could create an annual conference, assign its boundaries, and give it a name, and thereafter it would become one of the regularly constituted church tribunals. But until this was done it was a body for which the polity of the church had made no provision, which had no legislative or judicial power, and no ecclesiastical standing. Its assumption of authority over those represented in the body could be ratified and affirmed by the general conference. Its assumption of authority over those not represented in the body was incapable of ratification and affirmance. As to such persons and congregations, the want of jurisdiction was apparent and incurable.

We formulate our conclusions as follows:

1. The general conference that met at Indianapolis in 1891 was the regular successor of that of 1887, and was the general conference of the Evangelical Association of North America.

2. The alleged general conference that met in Philadelphia in 1891 was an unauthorized body, and its assumption of ecclesiastical authority was an act of rebellion against the organization with which its members had been connected, and whose name it adopted.

3. Those annual conferences, congregations, and individual church members that adhere to the general conference constitute the Evangelical Association.

4. Those annual conferences, congregations, and individual church members that adhere to the Philadelphia body are not within the Evangelical Association, but have become by their own acts an independent and hostile association.

5. The property which, prior to 1891, belonged to the Evangelical Association now belongs to, and must be controlled by, those who still constitute that organization.

6. The assignment of the plaintiff Krecker to the pastorate of the Immanuel Church in the city of Reading, having been made by a provisional body of adherents, without ecclesiastical authority, gave him no title capable of enforcement under the law of the church or the law of the land; but the subsequent ratification and adoption of the assignment by the general conference gave him a title from and after that date, good under the law of the church, and therefore good under the law of the land.

7. The assignment of the defendant Shirey to the same pastorate by the illegally organized annual conference of East Pennsylvania, or by the president of that body sitting without right, and the presiding elders, conferred no title upon him under the discipline and laws of the church as expounded by its court of last resort. He has shown, therefore, no title capable of enforcement under the law of the land against the Evangelical Association or its adherents.

8. The question is thus seen to be, not, Where is the majority of Immanuel Church or of the East Pennsylvania conferences? but, Which of the parties to this litigation adheres to the general conference? Ecclesiastical standing, and not numbers, determines the title to and the right of control over property held for the use of the Evangelical Association.

The decree of the court below is reversed, and it is now ordered, adjudged, and decreed that an injunction be issued to restrain the defendants from exercising control over the church edifice of the Immanuel Church in the city of Reading and from excluding the plaintiff, or any other person appointed to the pastorate of said church, under the discipline of the Evangelical Association and the decision of the general conference, from the pulpit to the said church, and from the exercise of his pastoral functions therein. It is further ordered that the defendants pay the costs accrued in this case.

Per Curiam:

Petition for a modification of final decree filed in this case on the 1st day of October last, so far as it relates to costs. And now, November 5, 1894, the decree of this court, filed on the first day of October last, is modified as to costs by adding to said decree the words: "And the said Immanuel Church of the Evangelical Association of the city of Reading, a corporation, under whose direction the individual defendants acted, shall be primarily liable therefor, without any right of contribution against Jonas H. Shirey, the accepted pastor, or the trustees, or other officers or employes, acting on its behalf, and joined as codefendants."

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

CHICAGO, BURLINGTON & QUINCY R.
CO., Plff. in Err.,

WEST CHICAGO STREET R. CO.

(156 Ill. 255.)

1. The facts that the tracks of a railroad company are laid across city streets, and its freight and passenger cars are permitted by the city to pass over such streets upon such tracks, give the company no exclusive use of the crossing, but only a use to be enjoyed in common with the public.

2. The permission to a street railway company to lay its tracks in a street already appropriated to public use is not a grant of the right to appropriate an addi-

NOTE.—Right of railroad company to compensation for laying street railway across railroad track on a street crossing.

The main case was followed by the same court in Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. West Chicago Street R. Co. 156 Ill. 385.

The question presented in these cases as to right of a railroad company to compensation when its track is crossed by a street railway within a public street has been directly decided only in a few very recent cases.

A direct precedent is found in Indiana where it is held that there is no taking of property of a railroad company and no right to compensation created by reason of the necessary hindrance and burden imposed by the crossing of its tracks by a street railway, which, in exercising its franchise in enjoyment of the public easement, is laying its tracks along the street. Chicago & C. Terminal R. Co. v. Whiting, H. & E. C. Street R. Co. 26 L. R. A. 337, 139 Ind. 297.

Compensation to a railroad company for the inconvenience to it is also held not to be a necessary condition to the crossing of its tracks at grade by an electric street railway under legislative authority. In New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Bridgeport Traction Co. (Conn.) ante, 367.

The right of a street railway company to extend its road along a turnpike to cross a railroad which intersects the turnpike is sustained in Elizabethtown, L. & B. S. R. Co. v. Ashland & C. Street R. Co. 16 Ky. L. Rep. 42, without making any compensation to the railroad company, even if the street railway imposes an additional servitude on the land of the turnpike company.

A steam-railway company which does not own the land in a highway, but has merely the right to operate its road across the highway at grade, does not suffer any such special damage by the establishment of a street railway operated by electricity along the highways across the railroad as will give the railroad company any right to an injunction against making such crossing. Morris & E. R. Co. v. Newark Pass. R. Co. 51 N. J. Eq. 379. The question of compensation does not seem to have been considered in this case.

The right of a street railroad company to cross a railroad was sustained, and an injunction denied without any discussion of the right to compensation, in Old Colony R. Co. v. Rockland & A. Street R. Co. 161 Mass. 416.

The constitutionality of the Pennsylvania Act of May 14, 1889, authorizing street railways to cross other railroads notwithstanding the fact that no right to compensation is given by the statute, is sustained in Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Wilkes Barre & W. S. R. Co. 1 Pa. Dist. Rep. 627; but this question does not seem to have been directly raised and passed upon in the supreme court of the state.

Without expressly presenting any question as to compensation, it was held in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Braddock Electric R. Co. 152 Pa. 116, that express authority "to cross at grade, diagonally or transversely, any railroad operated by steam or otherwise," given by the Pennsylvania Act of May 14, 1889, to an electric street railway company, does not defeat the power of the court, under the Act of June 19, 1871, to regulate grade crossings and prevent them when reasonably practicable.

Again the right of an electric street railway company to lay tracks across a railroad at a highway crossing is also sustained by denial of a preliminary injunction in Du Bois Traction Pass. R. Co. v. Buffalo, R. & P. R. Co., 149 Pa. 1, although the court said that on final hearing it might perhaps be its duty to require gates, watchmen, or other means to be provided for the protection of life at the crossing, at the expense of one or the other of the parties.

Under the same Pennsylvania Act of May 14, 1889, an injunction was refused against the connection of the tracks of a street railway on two streets by a track on a third street for 165 feet, although the latter street was occupied by another street railroad. Braddock & T. C. R. Co. v. Braddock Electric R. Co. 1 Pa. Dist. Rep. 44.

It is also held that the crossing at grade of the tracks of one street railroad company by those of another company in a curved line, and then running along a street parallel with the tracks of the former 220 feet to a street branching from the other street, is permitted by Pennsylvania Act of May 14, 1889, Pub. Laws, 211, authorizing both a diagonal and a transverse crossing at grade. Citizens Pass. R. Co. v. East Harrisburg Pass. Railway, 164 Pa. 274.

In New York a surface street railroad company is treated in a special term decision of the supreme court in People's R. Co. of Syracuse v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co., 22 Abb. N. C. 427, as on the same footing as a steam railroad company with respect to its right to cross the track of another steam railroad, under N. Y. Laws 1880, chap. 583. The court said: "I have been unable to find any authority suggesting an exemption of street railroads from the requirements of the above statutory provisions, since the Act of 1860, or at any time, relating to the crossing of steam railroads by a horse railroad." It was therefore held that such crossing could not be made without consent of the steam railroad unless the question of compensation and the manner of crossing had been first determined in proceedings under the statute. This decision was affirmed by the general term.

Again, the proceeding to fix the manner of intersection of two railroads where this is not agreed upon, provided by N. Y. Laws 1882, chap. 673, art. 1, § 12, is held in Buffalo, B. & L. R. Co. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 72 Hun, 568, to be applicable to street surface railroads.

And under N. Y. Laws 1883, chap. 239, the similar provision for the crossing by a street surface railroad of any railroad operated by electric, steam, or other power, which is laid across or upon the surface of any street in towns having less than 500,000 inhabitants, when agreement cannot be reached, upon executing a bond or undertaking conditioned for performance of all conditions and requirements which may be imposed by commissioners and affirmed by the court in respect to the lines, grades, and manner of crossing, and the amount of compensation, is sustained in Buffalo, B. & L. R. Co. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 72 Hun, 587. But it does not seem that either of the above cases tional easement in the soil of the street, but the construction of such road is merely a mode of facilitating existing travel, and of modifying or changing the existing public use, adding an additional mode of conveyance to those already upon the street, and inflicting no damage upon the owner of the fee of the street.

3. Erections upon a public street im necessarily determines the right of a steam railroad company to any compensation for the crossing by the street railroad, as the decision did not turn on that question.

So in Re Saratoga Electric R. Co., 58 Hun, 287, the rights of an electric street railway company to cross another railroad was considered as depending on the fact of its having acquired the consent of adjoining property owners and local authorities to build the road, but in this case the necessity of compensating the railroad company to be crossed was not discussed.

A similar question arises when a street railroad has been first built and a railroad company seeks to acquire a crossing. In such a case, in denying an injunction to a street railroad company against a railroad crossing it, it was said in Lynn & B. R. Co. v. Boston & L. L. Corp., 114 Mass. 88, that where a railroad by public authority is built across a highway it necessarily modifies to some extent the general use of the highway, but neither those who have occasion to travel over it, nor a street railway corporation which has a right to use it in common, can object. They hold their rights to use it in subordination to the power of the public authorities to determine what other use of it is demanded by public necessity.

The general right, under the constitution and laws of Missouri, of other railroad companies to intersect, connect with, or cross any other railroad, is held, in St. Louis Transfer R. Co. v. St. Louis Merchants Bridge Terminal R. Co., 111 Mo. 666, to extend to the crossing of the track of a city railroad laid in the streets but operated for the transfer of both property and persons between different parts of the city, especially for the transfer of cars between mercantile establishments and other railroads and ferries, where another company, which seems to have been organized for the same kind of business, had obtained municipal consent to lay its track in the streets. Here, again, the contest was as to the right to cross and not on the question of compensation.

In a Georgia case where no opinion was written it is stated by the court in the headnote that one railroad company cannot cross another even in a street without compensation. Georgia Midland & G. R. Co. v. Columbus Southern R. Co. 89 Ga. 206. But here the road was not a mere street railway for passengers, and no attempt is made in this note to answer the question as to the right of one street railroad company which has a track laid in a street to compensation for the crossing of the track in the street by another steam railroad which is not a mere passenger street railway company.

It is obvious that the street railroads of our cities and the trunk lines of railroad are constantly becoming more alike, and with the enlargement of the business of street railroads to include transportation of mail, baggage, freight, toward which a beginning has already been made in some places, the distinction between the two kinds of railroads may become much less than it is at present. But in this note only the right of a street railway company in the ordinary meaning of that term, when occupying the line of the street for its road to intersect other railroads which may cross the street, is considered.

But as closely analogous to the present question, and as apparently based on the same reasoning pose no additional servitude where they aid and facilitate its use for the purposes of travel and transportation.

4. The question whether a new method of using a street for public travel results in the imposition of an additional burden upon the fee must be determined by the use which such method makes of the street, that is adopted in the main case of CHICAGO, B. & Q. R. CO. v. WEST CHICAGO STREET R. CO., several other decisions about street railway crossings where both roads were ordinary street railways may be properly referred to in this connection. Thus in Brooklyn Cent. & J. R. Co. v. Brooklyn City R. Co., 38 Barb. 420, it was held that no injunction against crossing one street railroad by another would be granted, as the franchise of a street railway company was not exclusive. The court said: "The street was still to remain a public highway for public travel and public uses, and so long as the railroad company was not impeded or interrupted in running its cars and operating the road, it could not complain." It was also said "that the crossing of plaintiff's track by the rails and cars of the defendants is not an appropriation of the property of the former to the use of the latter, but a mode of exercising the public right of transit over the highway."

This case was followed in New York & H. R. Co. v. Forty-Second Street & G. Street Ferry R. Co., 50 Barb. 309, affirming 50 Barb. 285, 26 How. Pr. 66, in which it was said: "This crossing became necessary in an authorized use of the streets, the same as the crossing by ordinary carts. It is true that at the point of crossing the rail of the track which is crossed will be subject to some damage by wear and tear; but that is one of the damages which is necessarily incident in laying rails in a street, the concurrent use of which appertains to others."

In a Pennsylvania case also it is held that charter power to one street railway company to cross the track of another was to be exercised only when such crossing was necessary. Market Street Pass. R. Co. v. Union Pass. R. Co. 10 Phila. 43.

In Omaha Horse R. Co. v. Cable Tram-Way Co. of Omaha, 32 Fed. Rep. 727, where a horse railroad was crossed by a cable road, it was held that no damage was found by the commissioners to have been sustained, and the question was not discussed by the court.

In Market Street R. Co. v. Central R. Co., 51 Cal. 533, it is also held that the right of a street railway company to use a highway "does not exclude the public from the use of the street, nor does it prevent the crossing of its track by another railroad maintained for the same purpose, providing the crossing is effected with as little damage as may be."

In the Illinois case reported above the fact that the railroad company owned the fee of the street across which its track was laid made it necessary to decide the additional question whether or not a railway laid in the street at such place was an additional servitude upon the fee. On this question see note to Western Railway of Alabama v. Alabama Grand Trunk R. Co. (Ala.) 17 L. R. A. 475.

While there is not an entire agreement among the decisions on the doctrine that a street railway is not an additional servitude on the fee, this is the doctrine adopted to most states.

Excluding from the case the element of the railroad ownership of the fee of the street, the decision in the main case would seem to be unopposed by any direct decision yet made by any court, but supported by several cases and entirely in harmony also with the principles laid down in case of the crossing of one street railway by another.

and not by the motive power which it employs in such use.

5. A railroad company owning the fee of the street at the point where the street is crossed by its tracks is not entitled to compensation as for an additional burden, upon the construction of street railway tracks along the street under permission of the city, where its own tracks are not injured.
6. The interest of a street railway company in the street upon which its tracks are laid, although a valuable one, is part of the public easement in the streets, accessory and ancillary to the existing right in the public of passing over the street.
7. A railroad company which by city ordinances has acquired a permanent easement in streets crossed by its tracks is not entitled to compensation for the crossing of such tracks by a street railway laid along the street under permission from the city, as such easement is in subordination to the right of the public to pass along the streets, and the propelling of street-cars is only a form of the exercise by the public of such right of passage, and does not operate as an infringement upon such easement.
8. An injunction will not lie at the suit of an abutting owner who does not own the fee, to restrain the laying of a street railway in the street, as the damages which he may suffer are merely consequential.

ERROR to the Appellate Court, First District, to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enjoin the construction of street railway tracks along a public street over the tracks of complainant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Statement by Magruder, J.:

This is a bill filed by plaintiff in error, a steam railroad company, to enjoin the defendant in error, a street railroad company, from laying the tracks of the latter across the tracks of the former upon Ashland and Western avenues in the city of Chicago. The defendant company answered the bill admitting some of its allegations and denying others. Replication was filed to the answer. A preliminary injunction was granted upon the filing of the bill. The cause came on to be heard in the lower court upon motion by the defendant to dissolve the injunction on bill, answer, and replication, and a decree was entered dissolving the injunction theretofore entered, and dismissing the bill for want of equity. This decree has been affirmed by the appellate court, and it is here sought to review such judgment of affirmance by writ of error.

The bill alleges that plaintiff in error, a corporation organized under the laws of Illinois, operates the main line of its railroad from Chicago westward across the Mississippi river to Colorado and Wyoming, and southward into Missouri, and northward into Minnesota, and owns or controls branch lines in Illinois; that, under an ordinance passed by the common council of the city of Chicago on December 15, 1882, it was given permission to lay tracks on a certain alley, and on such lands south thereof, and of any continuation thereof, as it might thereafter acquire, westward from the south branch of the Chicago river to the city limits, "with the right to cross all intervening streets," that said ordinance was accepted by it, and thereunder in 1864 and prior thereto it constructed its main line from said branch to said limits and from time to time additional tracks, side-tracks, and switches; that among the streets crossed were Ashland and Western avenues, across which it has constructed and now operates two main passenger tracks and two main freight tracks, one of which tracks has been in use ever since 1864; that the West Chicago Street Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Illinois to operate street railways in the west division of said city, owns and operates, by cable and horse power, a system of street railways in said division; that the city council of said city, on March 10, 1892, passed an ordinance giving permission to said street railroad company to lay down and operate a single or double track street railroad in, along, and across certain streets in said city, among which are Ashland and Western avenues, including those portions of said avenues crossed by the tracks of plaintiff in error; that, by said ordinance, and another passed on the same day, said street railroad company was authorized to operate its cars with animal or cable or electric power, or such other noiseless motor or power as should be approved by certain of the city authorities; that, at the place where the tracks of plaintiff in error cross said avenues, the fee of the land in said avenues to the centre of the street is in plaintiff in error for a number of feet of the frontage on both sides, and for a certain other portion of the frontage on one side only; that the only right or title of the city or public in those portions of the avenues adjoining the land of plaintiff in error is "an easement to use the same as a street, acquired by dedication at common law, or by an alleged condemnation, and not under the statute;" that said street railway company threatens to lay its tracks across the railway tracks of plaintiff in error on said avenues without making compensation and without proceedings to condemn, and thereby to take and damage the property of plaintiff in error without just compensation, and for that purpose to tear up, displace, and disconnect the tracks of plaintiff in error; that plaintiff in error has private property rights in said avenues at the points of said crossings; that the laying of the tracks of defendant in error at said crossings will damage the business of plaintiff in error, and make the operation of its road more expensive and increase the danger to its employees and passengers and to the general public.

The answer does not admit the extent of business done on the tracks of plaintiff in error as alleged in the bill; it admits the passage of the Ordinance of March 10, 1892, and the authority thereby conferred as alleged; it does not admit the title of plaintiff in error in said avenues as alleged, but avers that whether the title of the city to the land in said avenues at said crossing is an easement or a title in fee, said avenues are public streets under the control of the city council; that said control of the council, and its right to grant permission to use said streets for a street railway, are not limited by the nature of such title; that defendant claims the right to lay its tracks under said Ordinance of 1892, and intends to lay its tracks and operate its street railroad cars by animal power on and along said avenues, including the portions thereof where complainant's tracks cross the same, but denies that it intends to take or damage complainant's property, or that it threatens to tear up, displace, or disconnect complainant's tracks, and avers that it intends to so lay its tracks and operate its cars as not to increase the danger in the public use of said avenues at said crossings, and that it has attempted to make an amicable arrangement with complainant, and has offered to construct said crossings at its own expense without disturbing complainant's tracks, and to keep the same in repair, and, at its own expense, to employ the necessary flagmen and policemen to guard said crossings so as to render them safe, but complainant refused to accept said offer or to make any agreement; the answer admits that complainant acquired a license to lay its tracks across said avenues under ordinances of said city, but denies that it has acquired any private rights therein, or that it will suffer any such damage in its business or property by the construction of said crossings as will compel defendant to make compensation therefor, or that complainant by its said license acquired the right to exclude defendant from crossing its tracks under proper authority granted by the city council, or that any exclusive use of said streets was granted to or vested in complainant; and avers that complainant's right in said streets is a right of use in common with the public, and subordinate to the use of the public, and subject to the control of the common council.

Messrs. Herrick, Allen & Boyesen for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Egbert Jamieson and George Hunt, for defendant in error:

Permission given by city ordinance to lay railroad tracks in the street is a license and not a franchise.

Chicago City R. Co. v. People, 78 Ill. 541.

While city authorities may grant the use of a street to a railroad company to lay its tracks and run its cars thereon, such authorities cannot thereby grant to a railroad company the exclusive use of the street. They cannot authorize such use of the street as will destroy it as a public thoroughfare.

No such grant, therefore, can imply that it is to be enjoyed at the unlimited discretion of the railroad company, but only that it shall be enjoyed with reference to the co-existing rights of others in the streets, and in subordination to the public welfare.

Ligare v. Chicago, 189 Ill. 46.

The right granted to a railroad company to lay tracks in a street does not grant an exclusive use, but one to be enjoyed in common with the public.

When complainants laid their railroad tracks across Robey street, Ashland avenue, and Western avenue, they did so with notice that the growth of the city would increase the ordinary public uses of those streets. They took the right, subject to all the rights of the public to the use of the streets, among which is the right of defendant, under authority from the city council, to lay its tracks in the streets, and use its cars thereon. Mere priority of use or occupancy gives no priority of right to that which is free to all.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By permission of the common council of Chicago embodied in an ordinance passed in 1863, the plaintiff in error, a steam railroad company carrying both passengers and freight, laid its tracks across Ashland and Western avenues in 1864, and has been operating its trains over said tracks ever since. It claims that the city owns a mere easement in those avenues or streets at the points where its tracks cross the same, and that it owns the fee subject to the easement in favor of the public. The defendant in error, a street railway company, under and by virtue of an ordinance of the common council of Chicago passed in 1892, has laid its tracks upon and along said avenues, and seeks to extend its tracks along said avenues across the tracks of plaintiff in error for the purpose of propelling its street railroad cars thereon by animal power. It appears, from the allegations of the bill, that Ashland and Western avenues were public streets under the control of the city of Chicago prior to 1862, and have been used as such public streets ever since that time. Plaintiff in error claims that, by reason of its alleged ownership of the fee, the crossing of its tracks by those of the defendant in error will impose an additional servitude which entitles it to compensation.

It is not contended, nor alleged in the bill, that the laying of the tracks of the street railroad company across those of plaintiff in error will injure the property of plaintiff in error which abuts upon the streets, or will cause it any damage as an abutting owner in the way of shutting out light or air or preventing ingress or egress. The contention is, that plaintiff in error will suffer damage as owner of the fee of the street itself by reason of the imbedding of the street-car tracks into the ground of the street. Counsel for plaintiff in error base the claim to damages upon two decisions heretofore rendered by this court, to wit: Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Hartley, 67 Ill. 439, 16 Am. Rep. 624, and Board of Trade Teleg. Co. v. Barnett, 107 Ill. 507, 47 Am. Rep. 453.

In the first case, the action was trespass against a steam railroad company, which constructed its road, under the authority of an ordinance of the city of Bloomington, diagonally across Front street in that city within six inches or a foot of plaintiffs' enclosure at one corner, and upon land the fee of which was in plaintiffs if they owned to the center of Front street, which had been an old highway before the limits of the city were extended so as to include it; in constructing the road-bed, the street was excavated four or five feet, necessitating the removal of a large amount of earth and the lowering of the grade in front of the enclosure of the plaintiffs, so as to leave their premises much higher than the grade, and rendering ingress and egress therefrom more difficult; it did not appear that the city owned the fee of the street, and the ownership by the plaintiffs of the fee of the land to the center of the old highway was not contested; the trespasses there complained of were committed before the adoption of the Constitution of 1870, and the right to recover was not affected by the provisions of that constitution. A distinction was there drawn between cases where the fee of the street is in the city, and cases where the fee of the street is in the adjoining proprietor and the city has only an easement; and it was held that, in the former cases, the owner of abutting property cannot enjoin the laying of railroad tracks in the street if the city authorities having control thereof have granted permission to do so, and that such owner cannot recover any damage or compensation for the use of streets so occupied; but that, in the latter cases, the railroad company, if, in laying its tracks, it causes a private injury to him who owns the fee in the adjoining premises, must make good the damages sustained. While the decision in the Hartley Case was based mainly upon the ground that the adjoining proprietor owned the fee of the street subject to the easement, yet the facts show that the injury sustained was not so much an injury to the land under the street, as to the land abutting upon the street, which was damaged by the lowering of the grade and by the consequent difficulty of ingress thereto and egress therefrom.

But, while the Hartley Case differs from the case at bar, in the fact that there then was damage to the abutting property, while here no damage to abutting property is claimed, yet the main distinction lies in the character of the railroad constructed in or across the street. The railroad constructed diagonally across Front street in the case cited was a railroad for the passage of steam cars carrying freight and passengers, while here the tracks proposed to be constructed across the tracks of plaintiff in error are those of an ordinary street railroad. Ashland and Western avenues, being public streets under the control of the city, are subject to use by the public. The facts that the tracks of plaintiff in error are laid across said streets, and that its freight and passenger cars are permitted by the city to pass over the same upon said tracks, give plaintiff in error no exclusive use of the crossing, but only a use to be enjoyed in common with the public. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Reich, 101 Ill. 157. A city has no right to authorize railroad tracks to be laid upon streets so as to exclude the other public uses of a street. Ligare v. Chicago, 139 Ill. 46. It will not be denied that pedestrians, and carriages, and wagons, and omnibuses, and other vehicles have a right to pass along these streets over and across the tracks of plaintiff in error. A street-car, running upon rails laid upon the surface of the street and used in the ordinary way under the regulations of the city authorities is merely another sort of carriage. The use of a street for a horse railway is such a use as falls within the purposes for which streets are dedicated, or acquired by condemnation. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 722. The proprietor, when he dedicates the street or is paid for property to be so used, will be presumed to have contemplated such improved and convenient modes of use as are reasonably consistent with the use of the street for ordinary vehicles and in the usual modes.

Ibid.

The weight of authority is in favor of the position that "a street railway is not an additional servitude even where the fee of the street is in the abutting owner." 3 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 723 (574), and cases cited in note 3. It is otherwise in the case of the construction of a steam railroad in a public street; a steam railway is regarded as an additional servitude. Id. § 725 (576). In his work on Municipal Corporations, Judge Dillon thus clearly states the distinction here indicated: "The weight of judicial authority undoubtedly is that, where the public have only an easement in streets, and the fee is retained by the adjacent owner, the legislature cannot, under the constitutional guaranty of private property, authorize an ordinary steam railroad to be constructed thereon, against the will of the adjoining owner, without compensation to him. In other words, such a railway, as usually constructed and operated, is an additional servitude. As to street railroads, constructed in the usual manner and operated under municipal regulation so as not to exclude the free passage of ordinary vehicles, the almost general, and, in the author's judgment, the sound, judicial view is, that they do not create a new burden upon the land, and hence the legislature, no matter whether the fee is in the abutter or in the public, is not bound to, although it may, provide for compensation to the adjoining proprietor." 3 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 725 (576). The courts of most of the states, except those of New York, hold that a street surface passenger railway, constructed at street grade in the usual manner, is not a new servitude upon the land for which the owners of the fee are entitled to compensation. Booth, Street Railway Law, § 83. The use of the street by such a street railway company being within the purposes for which streets are laid out and maintained, the abutting owner can recover no compensation for the damages resulting from such use, whether the fee is in him or in the city, provided the right of ingress and egress and of passage and of repassage is left reasonably free to him. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 124; Elliott, Roads & Streets, pp. 528, 529, 558. Streets are laid out in order that the public may enjoy the right of free passage in vehicles as well as on foot, and such vehicles may be carriages running on grooved tracks, or operated in the modes, or by the forces, which an advanced civilization may require for the general convenience. Pierce, Railroads, § 284; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 688. The laying of a street railway in the streets of a city, and the running of cars thereon for the transportation of passengers, must be regarded as among the uses contemplated when the street was laid out; hence, the owner of abutting land, even though he owns the fee of the street, can only recover damages for such special and material injury as may be shown to have resulted to his property from the construction and operation of such railway. 23 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 954.

It appears here that the defendant in error intended to lay its tracks and operate its cars by animal power only, although it had the right, under the Ordinance of 1892, to use cable or electric power or other motive power. It also appears that the tracks of defendant in error were to be laid without injury to the tracks or property of plaintiff in error and without expense to it. Where the crossing is made in the manner specified in the answer in this case, the usefulness of the railroad crossed is not in any manner impaired. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Chicago, 140 Ill. 809. "For the crossing of tracks at grade, without material injury, compensation is not allowed." Booth, Street Railway Law, § 114. Damages are not allowable for increased danger or delay in crossing. Damages must be real, tangible, and proximate, and not conjectural or speculative. Peoria & P. U. R. Co. v. Peoria & F. R. Co. 105 Ill. 110; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 149 Ill. 457.

It is to be remembered that when the Ordinance of 1892 was passed granting to the street railway company permission to lay its tracks and operate its cars across the tracks of the steam railway company, Ashland and Western avenues, upon which the street-car tracks were thus to be laid, already existed as public streets and had been used by the public for many years. Under its charter, the city of Chicago had the right to regulate the use of these streets, and to permit the construction of horse railroads therein, and to change the grade of railroad crossings. Rev. Stat. chap. 24, art. 5, pars. 9, 24, 25. The permission to a street railway company to lay its tracks in a street already appropriated to public use is not the grant of a right to appropriate an additional easement in the soil of the street, but the construction of the street railroad is merely a mode of facilitating existing travel, and of modifying or changing the existing public use. There is thereby added an additional mode of conveyance to those already in use upon the street, and, when the street railroad is properly constructed, it inflicts no damage upon the adjoining proprietor who owns the fee of the street. Atty. Gen. v. Metropolitan R. Co. 125 Mass. 515, 28 Am. Rep. 264; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Rosedale Street R. Co. 64 Tex. 80, 53 Am. Rep. 789. The street-car carries along the street such passengers as would otherwise be obliged to pass over it on foot or in other vehicles, and, therefore, the burden imposed upon the land under the street is the same in kind as was originally imposed on it when the street was opened. A steam railroad, as ordinarily operated, adds a new servitude to the street, because it prevents the use of the street in the usual modes and interferes with and embarrasses the usual modes of travel, whereas the ordinary street railway furthers the original uses of the street by relieving the pressure of local travel. Taggart v. Newport Street R. Co. 16 R. I. 669, 7 L. R. A. 205; Halsey v. Rapid Transit Street R. Co. 47 N. J. Eq. 880; DuBois Traction Pass. R. Co. v. Buffalo, R. & P. R. Co. 149 Pa. 1.

It will not be denied that, whether the fee of a street is in the city or in the abutting owner, the city may, in the exercise of its power to control such street and regulate its use, lay gas and water pipes therein, construct drains and sewers therein, and dig reservoirs and cisterns therein. 24 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 84, 114. Such uses more sensibly disturb the soil than the laying of street railway tracks. And yet it will not be said that a city cannot make improvements of this kind in a street, the fee of which is in the abutting owner, without a condemnation proceeding and the making of compensation to such owner.

The other case relied upon by counsel, Board of Trade Tel. Co. v. Barnett, 107 Ill. 507, 47 Am. Rep. 458, was an action of trespass, brought by an adjoining owner against a telegraph company to recover damages caused by the erection of telegraph poles upon an ordinary public highway, the fee of the highway being in the plaintiff subject to the easement of the public; the poles were erected under permission from the county board; it was held that the right to erect them was not a part of the public easement in the highway, but was a new and additional burden upon the fee, for which the owner of the fee might maintain an action. We think that the Barnett Case, like the Hartley Case, is clearly distinguishable from the case at bar. Telegraph poles erected upon a highway serve no useful purpose in regard to the highway, and telegraph and telephone poles erected upon a street are not directly ancillary to the use of the street as such; for this reason they are held to be an additional servitude in the street. But it is otherwise where such erections aid and facilitate the use of a public street for the purposes of travel and transportation. In the latter case they impose no additional servitude.

In Taggart v. Newport Street R. Co., supra, a bill was filed by owners of property abutting on certain streets in the city of Newport to enjoin a street railway company from erecting in the streets in front of their property certain poles and wires, the poles being erected to support the wires over the tracks or rails of the company for the purpose of conducting the electricity to be used as a motor for the passenger cars traversing said tracks; in that case it was contended that the use of electricity for the operation of the street railway, and the erection of the poles as ancillary thereto, could not be sustained upon the alleged ground that an additional servitude was thereby imposed upon the streets without providing for compensation to the owners of the fee of the streets; but the supreme court of Rhode Island there states the doctrine as being sustained by the greater weight of decision, that a railroad constructed in a street, and operated by steam in the usual manner, imposes a new servitude and entitles the owner of the fee to compensation, but that a street railway operated by horse power in the usual way does not impose a new servitude, or entitle the owner of the fee to additional compensation; and the court there extends the doctrine so as to apply what is said in regard to street railways operated by horse power to street railways operated by electricity. It was there held that a street railway operated by electricity was not an additional servitude, and that, although telegraph and telephone poles and wires erected on streets and highways might constitute an additional servitude entitling the owners of the fee to additional compensation, yet such was not the case as to poles and wires erected and used for the service of a street railway for the reason already stated, namely, that the former are not, and the latter are, "directly ancillary to the uses of the streets as such, in that they communicate the power by which the street-cars are propelled."

The ruling upon this subject in Rhode Island has been adopted in New Jersey in the case of Halsey v. Rapid Transit Street R. Co., 47 N. J. Eq. 380, where it was held that the placing of poles and wires in the street for the purpose of propelling cars by electricity did not impose a new servitude upon the land for the reasons, that the ownership by the abutting owner of the fee in the street, being subject to the public easement, is without beneficial interest; that, with respect to lands over which streets have been laid, the ownership for all substantial purposes is in the public; that, when lands are acquired for a public street, they are acquired for the purpose of providing a means of free passage common to all the people, and may be rightfully used in any way that will subserve that purpose, including such means as the improvements of the age and new wants, arising out of an increase in population or an enlargement of business, may render necessary; that the poles and wires, used to operate the street railway by electricity, form part of the means by which a new power, to be substituted for animal power, is to be supplied for the propulsion of street-cars; that such poles and wires are placed in the street "to aid the public in exercising their right of free passage over the street," and therefore impose no new burden on the land.

The same doctrine has been held by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in the recent case of Du Bois Traction Pass. R. Co. v. Buffalo, R. & P. R. Co. supra.

Under the reasoning in the case last cited, the question whether a new method of using a street for public travel results in the imposition of an additional burden on the land or not, must be determined by the use which the new method makes of the street, and not by the motive power which it employs in such use. The question depends more upon the effect that is produced than on the power that is used. "Perhaps the true distinction in these cases is not to be found in the motive power of the railway, or in the question whether the fee simple or a mere easement was taken in the original appropriation, but depends upon the question whether the railway constitutes a thoroughfare, or, on the other hand, is a mere local convenience." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 688.

In view of what has been said, we are inclined to hold that, whether the power to be made use of by defendant in error in propelling its cars across the tracks of plaintiff in error was horse power as alleged in the answer, or whether it was any other of the powers authorized to be used by the Ordinance of 1892, in either case the principles here discussed are applicable, and authorize the crossing of the tracks of plaintiff in error by the defendant in error, provided the crossing is made without injury to the tracks so crossed as stated in the answer herein.

The language used in Moses v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co., 21 Ill. 523, intimating that an injunction would lie against the laying of a street railroad, if it would lie against the laying of a steam railroad, in the streets of a city, was merely by way of argument, and was not necessary to the decision of that case, and, hence, cannot be regarded as controlling the disposition of this case.

Counsel for plaintiff in error refer to certain decisions of this court, holding that, where a street railway company lays its tracks in a public street under an ordinance of the city, it has an interest in the street which can be sold and conveyed and made subject to the burden of special assessment, and that, therefore, a grant to the street railway company of this interest is a taking of the property of plaintiff in error as owner of the fee. Under the authorities already discussed, the interest of the street railway company, although a valuable one, is a part of the easement of the public in the street; it is carved out of such easement; it is accessory and ancillary to the existing right, vested in the public, of passing over the street; by the granting of it no new easement is imposed upon the property of the owner of the fee, but the old easement, to which such property was already subject, is merely changed so as to be adapted to an improved mode of passage; "it is," as was said by the vice-chancellor in Halsey v. Rapid Transit Street R. Co., supra, "simply a user of a right already vested in the public, and consequently, by its exercise, nothing is taken from the abutting owners which can be made the basis of additional compensation."

It is also contended, on behalf of plaintiff in error, that, by the Ordinance of 1862 and its action under it, plaintiff in error acquired a perpetual easement in those parts of Ashland and Western avenues crossed by its tracks of which it did not own the fee, and that the crossing of its tracks by defendant in error will be an infringement upon the easement of plaintiff in error, which entitles it to compensation. This contention is disposed of by what has already been said. The plaintiff in error accepted the Ordinance of 1862, and laid its tracks across the avenues thereunder, in subordination to the right of the public to pass along the avenues and over those parts thereof where its tracks crossed them. Its rights to the crossing are, and always have been, subject to the public easement in the streets and subject to the right of public passage over the same. The propelling of street-cars over the crossing was only a form of the exercise by the public of its right of passage, and, therefore, did not operate as any infringement upon the rights of plaintiff in error, or entitle it to any additional compensation. The case of Chicago & W. I. R. Co. v. Englewood Connecting R. Co., 115 Ill. 375, has no application here. In that case there was a condemnation proceeding instituted by one steam railroad company against another to secure for the former the privilege of crossing the tracks of the latter, and the institution and prosecution of the proceeding admitted the right of the defending company to at least nominal damages, if no more.

Where the fee of the street is in the city, such damages as the abutting owner may suffer from the laying of a railroad track in the street are merely consequential, so far at least as they affect the property abutting on the street. In such case, as there is no physical taking of the land, injunction will not lie to enjoin the taking, the remedy being an action at law for damages. Sletson v. Chicago & E. R. Co. 75 Ill. 74; Parker v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 146 Ill. 158.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

WASHINGTON PARK CLUB.

1. Grounds on which a public exhibition of horse racing is given, to which the public are invited, must be kept in a reasonably safe and suitable condition for the spectators.
2. Negligence of the person conducting a public exhibition of horse racing cannot be presumed from the mere fact that a spectator was injured by a runaway horse while within the place reserved for spectators.
3. It is a matter of common knowledge that race-courses are visited by invited spectators, who drive into the grounds in their own carriages or other vehicles under the control of themselves or their own drivers.
4. A declaration does not sufficiently allege negligence of the person conducting a public exhibition of horse racing by stating an invitation to the public, and that a spectator, while in the place set apart for such persons and without fault on his part, was struck and injured by a runaway horse, without further allegations as to the place of the injury or defendant's control over the immediate cause of it.

ERROR to the Appellate Court, First District, to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The presumption of negligence is raised, subject, of course, to being overcome by the defendants "showing a cause consistent with due care."

The fact is one which is not likely to occur in case the defendant has used all ordinary care. The knowledge of its cause and origin is peculiarly within the possession of the defendant.

Plaintiff had the right to assume that due provision had been made by barriers, or posts with hitching straps or chains, or by a sufficient number of watchmen or guards, so that no horse would be apt to break loose and run among the spectators.

When such an occurrence does occur, the defendant must certainly should be required to show "a cause consistent with due care."

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action below was trespass on the case, brought by plaintiff in error against defendant in error. The declaration avers as follows: "For that whereas, heretofore, on the day commonly known as 'Derby Day,' on, to wit, the 25th day of June, 1893, said defendant, in said county, on the certain race-course then and there in its possession, gave and conducted a public exhibition of horse racing, and thereto invited the public at large, charging and receiving an admission fee. Plaintiff paid said fee, and attended said exhibition, and was then and there, and at all times thereabouts, in the exercise of all reasonable and ordinary care, and lawfully in and upon the ground in defendant's possession and control, set aside by defendant for the use of the spectators at said races. And plaintiff alleges that it then and there became and was the duty of defendant to use all reasonable and ordinary care to keep said grounds in a reasonably safe and suitable condition for the said spectators, and therein defendant made default, and so carelessly and negligently kept said grounds that a horse drawing a vehicle ran, unguarded, unattended, and unhindered, from a cause or causes which, upon diligent inquiry, plaintiff has not been able to learn, but which are to defendant well known, through and among the spectators, and in so doing ran upon and against the plaintiff, whereby he was violently thrown to the ground, and was thereby and then greatly bruised, hurt, and wounded," etc. The declaration was demurred to. The demurrer was sustained. Plaintiff stood by his declaration. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and has been affirmed by the appellate court. The present writ of error is sued out for the purpose of reviewing the judgment of the appellate court.

The question is whether the declaration was good on general demurrer. It is urged.

in favor of the sufficiency of the declaration, that proof of the injury as alleged will give rise to a presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant, and so establish a prima facie case, under the application of the maxim, res ipsa loquitur. It is claimed that the declaration avers all that is necessary, by stating that defendant invited plaintiff into its racing course, and accepted an admission fee from him, and that plaintiff was lawfully upon the ground set apart by the defendant for spectators, and, while there, was in the exercise of ordinary care, and that it was the duty of defendant to exercise reasonable care to keep the space set apart reasonably safe, and that plaintiff was struck by a horse and vehicle running unattended through such space. It is contended that the space reserved for spectators was not safe when a horse and vehicle thus ran through it, and that the fact of such running indicated negligence, and devolved upon the defendant the burden of showing how the accident happened, and that it had used all reasonable care to prevent such an occurrence. On the other hand, it is urged, against the sufficiency of the declaration, that it does not state facts sufficient, if proven, to create a reasonable presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant, or to justify an allegation that defendant owed a duty to plaintiff, or to support an averment that the defendant had knowledge of the cause or causes of the running away of the horse. It is claimed that the declaration is objectionable as not stating whether or not the plaintiff was in the grand stand, or in the space occupied by visitors in carriages or other vehicles drawn by horses, or in that occupied exclusively by pedestrians, and in not stating whether or not the horse which ran away belonged to the defendant, or was in the keeping of the defendant. It is contended, by the defendant in error, that the running away of a horse creates no presumption of negligence, except as against those whose duty it is to guard against such an occurrence, and that no fact is alleged in the declaration showing the duty of the defendant in this respect.

If an owner or occupier of land either directly or by implication induces persons to come upon his premises, he thereby assumes an obligation that such premises are in a reasonably safe condition, so that the persons there by his invitation shall not be injured by them, or in their use for the purpose for which the invitation was extended. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Bodemer, 189 Ill. 596; Campbell, Neg. § 43; 16 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 418; Davis v. Central Cong. Soc. of Jamaica Plains, 129 Mass. 367, 87 Am. Rep. 868. In Currier v. Boston Music Hall Assn., 135 Mass. 414, it was held that the proprietor of a hall to which the public is invited is bound to use ordinary care and diligence to put and keep the hall in a reasonably safe condition for persons attending in pursuance of such invitation, and if he neglects his duty in this respect, so that the hall is in fact unsafe, his knowledge or ignorance of the defect is immaterial. In the case at bar, the declaration avers that the defendant was in possession of the race-course, and conducted an exhibition of horse racing thereon, and invited the public at large to attend, and charged an admission fee, and that plaintiff paid the fee and attended the exhibition. These facts are sufficient to impose the same obligation upon defendant which rests upon any other owner or occupier of premises who invites people to come upon the same. Out of these facts necessarily arises the duty of the defendant to keep the grounds in a reasonably safe and suitable condition for the spectators. Counsel for defendant in error refer to a number of authorities in support of the proposition that a mere general allegation in the declaration, that it became the duty of the defendant to do that which the plaintiff complains of its omitting to do, is not sufficient, and that the sufficiency of the declaration in this regard will depend upon whether the facts stated show that the defendant was bound in law to do that which it is charged with having omitted to do. No fault can be found with the doctrine of the authorities thus referred to. Tested by the rule laid down in them, the declaration here, by averring defendant's occupancy of the grounds, and its invitation to the plaintiff to come thereon, states such facts as give rise to the general duty which the defendant is charged with failing to perform.

The question next arises whether the declaration makes such averments as show a breach of the duty arising out of the facts stated; or, in other words, whether negligence can be presumed from the running away of the horse within the space reserved for spectators. There are cases where the maxim, res ipsa loquitur, is applicable. The meaning of this maxim is that, while negligence is not, as a general rule, to be presumed, yet the injury itself may afford a sufficient prima facie evidence of negligence, and the presumption of negligence may be created by the circumstances under which the injury occurred. Where negligence is thus presumed from the occurrence of the injury, the defendant is called upon to rebut the prima facie case by showing that he took reasonable care to prevent the happening of such injury. Cooley, Torts, *661, 662; 16 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 449. Perhaps it may be more accurate to say that the presumption of negligence arises, not exclusively from the fact that the accident happened, but that it happened under given conditions, and in connection with certain circumstances. 3 Thomp. Neg. p. 1228. Negligence has been presumed, so as to throw the burden of explanation upon the defendant, where a plaintiff was passing along a highway under a railway bridge, and a brick fell from one of the pilasters upon which an iron girder of the bridge rested, and injured him (Kearney v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co., L. R. 5 Q. B. 411, and 2 Thomp. Neg. 1220); where a plaintiff, walking in the street, was struck and injured by a barrel of flour falling from the window of a warehouse belonging to the defendant (Byrns v. Boodle, 2 Hurlst. & C. 723); where a building adjoining a street fell into the street, and injured a plaintiff upon the sidewalk (Mullen v. St. John, 57 N. Y. 567, 15 Am. Rep. 580); where the plaintiff, while making an inquiry at the door of a house in which the defendant had offices, received a push from the defendant's servant, who was watching a packing case, propped against the wall of the house and belonging to the defendant, and the packing case then fell upon and injured the plaintiff. Briggs v. Oliver, 4 Hurlst. & C. 408. In Scott v. London & St. K. Docks Co., 3 Hurlst. & C. 596, it was said by the court: "There must be reasonable evidence of negligence. But when the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen, if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from want of care." This passage was quoted with approval in North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Cotton, 140 Ill. 486. In 1 Addison on Torts, § 83, the rule is thus stated: When the accident is one which would not, in all probability, happen if the person causing it was using due care, and the actual machine causing the accident is solely under the management of defendant, . . . the mere occurrence of the accident is sufficient prima facie proof of negligence to impose upon the defendant the onus of rebutting it." Upon the basis of these authorities the case of The William Branfoot, in 48 Fed. Rep. 914, holds that, "when an unusual and unexpected accident happens, and the thing causing the accident is in one's exclusive management, possession, or control, the accident speaks for itself, it is itself a witness,—res ipsa loquitur,—and, in a suit by any one having an action therefor, the fact of the accident puts on the defendant the duty of showing that it was not occasioned by negligence on his part."

In the present case it sufficiently appears from the declaration that the race-course and the grounds connected therewith were under the exclusive management and control of the defendant. But it is not alleged that the "runaway" horse which caused the injury was under the management and control of the defendant or its servants. It is matter of common knowledge that these race-courses are visited by invited spectators, who drive into the grounds in their own carriages or other vehicles under the control of themselves or their own drivers. The averments of the declaration do not negative the idea that the injury may have occurred through the negligence of one of these spectators in failing to properly control his horse. It was the duty of the defendant to provide sufficient barriers and watchmen and hitching posts, but a performance of this duty might not in all cases prevent accidents arising from the carelessness of those coming into the grounds with teams of their own. Moreover, the declaration does not sufficiently specify in what place the plaintiff was when he was injured,—whether in the space reserved for pedestrians, on what is called the "grand stand," or in the space reserved for spectators visiting the race-course in their own vehicles. While the question of the sufficiency of the declaration is not altogether free from doubt, we are inclined to think that its allegations are not specific enough, either as to the place of the injury, or as to the defendant's control over the immediate cause of the injury. In Conrad v. Clauze, 98 Ind. 476, 47 Am. Rep. 888, there was a demurrer to the first paragraph of a complaint alleging that defendants were the owners and managers of inclosed fair grounds, charging an admission fee, and while an agricultural fair was in progress, allotted a part of the grounds for shooting with a target gun, but gave no notice thereof to plaintiff, who attended the fair with his horse and buggy, and being ignorant of the location or existence of the gun, or that the portion of the ground reserved for target shooting had been so reserved, hitched his horse where others were hitched, and his horse was shot and killed. The demurrer was overruled; but it appeared from the complaint itself that the target shooting was a part of the exhibition or entertainment carried on at the fair, and so under the supervision and control of its managers, and that, although those engaged in the shooting were not strictly servants of the defendants, yet they were acting under the license and permission of the defendants, and bore such a relation to them as made the defendants liable for injuries resulting from their negligence in not properly controlling the management of that part of the exhibition. In Unger v. Forty-Second Street & G. Street Ferry R. Co., 51 N. Y. 497, it appeared that the plaintiff was run over in a public street by a team of horses running away, with a pole and whiffletree attached to them, and that the horses had become detached from a street-car which they had been drawing, and it was there held that the fact that the horses were unattended and unfastened in the street was, unexplained, evidence of negligence against the defendant; but it also appeared that the horses belonged to the defendant, the street railroad company, and had broken away from one of its cars, while driven by one of its employees. In Strup v. Edens, 22 Wis. 482, plaintiff's daughter was injured by horses running away, and it was said that "the fact that the horses got loose and ran away is some evidence of negligence." But the horses belonged to the defendant, and there was evidence tending to show that they were not properly hitched. So also in Hill v. Scott, 38 Mo. App. 870, it appeared that the "runaway" horse causing the injury belonged to the defendant, and had been securely hitched before he ran away. It was there said that "a horse does not ordinarily get loose if carefully hitched." While, in the case at bar, it might be presumed that the horse injuring the plaintiff would not have run away if he had been carefully hitched, yet the declaration does not state such facts as would lead to the conclusion that the horse belonged to the defendant, or was under its control, or that, if it belonged to a visitor to the race-course, the defendant had neglected such precautions, in the way of hitching posts, or barriers, or watchmen, as would affect it with responsibility for the accident. The fact that a horse is running away unattended affords some evidence that the horse has been left unfastened, or improperly and negligently secured, but does not necessarily indicate by whom he was so left, in the absence of proof as to what person had control of him.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

John DAVIS, Plff. in Err.,

v.

DODSON & MOON.

(.....Ga.....)

- *1. It is not within the scope of the business of a law partnership to collect choses in action without charging for services rendered in so doing. Therefore where one member of such a firm being the owner of a promissory note sold it to a third person, a part of the consideration of the sale being that the seller's firm would collect the note without charge, this contract was not binding upon another member of the firm. The seller had no power, by virtue of the partnership, to bind his partner by any such contract; and as to the latter it was also without consideration.
2. The verdict was demanded by the evidence, and the newly discovered evidence was not such as ought to change the result.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Walker County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action by attachment to reach property of a nonresident law firm to enforce payment of damages for alleged breach of contract. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Copeland & Jackson for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Payne & Walker for defendants in error.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff below, Davis, as executor of Hall, sued out an attachment against Dodson & Moon, a nonresident firm of attorneys at law, which attachment was levied upon land in Walker county as the property of Moon, one of the defendants. The case made by the declaration in attachment as amended was, in substance, as follows:

The defendants, as attorneys at law, received for collection from the plaintiff's testator a promissory note, at the same time giving him a receipt in the following words: "Chatanooga, Tenn., Dec. 23rd. 1886. Received of S. P. Hall a note on Larkin Payne, payable to E. M. Dodson, and indorsed by him, for fifteen hundred dollars, dated the 7th day of March, 1886, and due 12 months after date, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from date, and secured by a deed of trust on 230 acres of land, the home place of said Payne, made to said Dodson as trustee, with power of sale. If said note is not paid at maturity we agree to foreclose the deed of trust by the first Tuesday in May, 1887, free of cost to Mr. Hall, and not to charge him any fees, this being the agreement under which he purchased said note and deed of trust. Dodson & Moon, Attys at Law." The money due upon the note specified in the foregoing receipt was collected by the defendants, who failed and refused to pay the same over to the plaintiff. The defendant Moon pleaded, in substance, that he did not sign the receipt; that it was not signed by any one authorized by him; that neither he nor the firm of Dodson & Moon, as such, ever had the possession, custody, or control, for collection or otherwise, of any such note or paper as was described in this receipt; not did he or his firm, at any time or in any manner, collect or receive any money thereon, either as attorneys at law or otherwise; but that the giving of the receipt was the individual act of Dodson, for which neither Moon nor the firm was in any manner responsible. At the trial the plaintiff offered evidence to show that the receipt in question was signed by Dodson in the name of his firm, and that he afterwards collected the money due on the note, giving therefor receipts signed by him individually, and had failed to account for the money collected. No evidence whatever was introduced to show that Moon ever had any knowledge of the transaction, or had ever ratified the giving of the receipt to Hall. Nor was it shown that Moon ever had personal possession of the note, or recognized its possession by his firm, or that he took part in or knew of its collection by Dodson. On the contrary, as the receipt itself would seem to indicate, the truth of the matter probably was that Dodson traded to Hall a note payable to himself, and which he held in his individual capacity; and, as an inducement to Hall to purchase the same, undertook by the receipt to bind the firm of Dodson & Moon to collect the note free of charge. If the effect of giving the receipt was to obligate that firm to perform the service indicated, it is obvious that it would make no difference that Moon never took any active part in, or even knew of, the collection and misapplication of the money due on the note, for he would be responsible and liable for every act of Dodson while acting within the scope of his authority as a member of the partnership. Therefore the question presents itself whether Dodson, by virtue of his general authority to represent his firm, could, in a transaction such as that disclosed by the record now before us, make a contract binding alike upon his partner and himself as composing the firm of Dodson & Moon. We do not see how it can be seriously contended that it is within the scope of the authority of one member of a partnership, in a private transaction between himself and another, and in consideration of a benefit bestowed upon himself alone, and not shared in by his partner, to undertake to bind his firm to any agreement whatsoever. In a transaction of this kind, he would be acting solely in his individual capacity, and not as a member of his firm. We had thought it a very universally recognized fact that lawyers are in the habit of charging their clients for services, and that the main object of forming law partnerships was the avowed purpose of reaping a goodly harvest of fees. In fact, complaint has frequently been made that lawyers are sometimes too diligent and overzealous reapers. But in all seriousness it would defeat the very object for which a law partnership was formed if one of its several members were allowed, without the express assent of the others, to undertake to bind the firm to perform legal services without compensation either for the actual time and labor necessary to be expended or for the responsibility and liability the firm would incur by the undertaking. Certainly it is the right of an attorney, acting for himself alone, as a matter of charity or friendship, to collect a paper for another without charging a fee for his services; but the present case sufficiently demonstrates how serious and unjust a matter it would be if an attorney were permitted to thus bind his partner, without his consent, and with no remuneration for the risk incurred. We have yet to see the rare spectacle of an attorney at law, or a firm of them, rendering professional services gratuitously as a recognized and customary incident of the business in which they engage. We have long ago departed from the honorarium from which our ancient ancestors in this noble profession either wholly or partially derived their means of subsistence.

Under the facts shown on the trial, therefore, we have no hesitancy in saying the plaintiff failed utterly to make out a case. It was contended by counsel, however, that in the light of certain evidence, shown to have been discovered since the trial, a different result would be inevitable if a new trial were granted. The evidence relied on was a certain contract purporting to have been entered into between Dodson and Payne, and explaining how the former came into possession of the note sold to Hall, as follows: "This agreement made the 1st day of March, 1886, witnesseth: That Larkin Payne has this day given E. M. Dodson his note for the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, which is to become due one year after date, and has made a deed of trust on his lands in Dade Co., Ga., to secure the same. The agreement between us is that said Dodson is to negotiate said note to the best advantage possible, and for this purpose is to indorse the same, if necessary, and is to apply the proceeds of the note as follows: A judgment of about the sum of $350.00 in the superior court of Dade Co. in favor of the estate of E. W. Forester, dec'd, now controlled by M. A. B. Tatum; whatever interest may be found in settlement to be due from me (Payne) to Wm. Glass on the mortgage heretofore given to him, if any; any balance of fees that I may be owing to said Dodson or to Dodson & Moon; and the balance he will pay over to said Payne. Nothing will be paid to William Glass until further order from said Payne. This 1st of March, 1886. E. M. Dodson, Larkin Payne." Instead of being impressed that this paper would aid the plaintiff's case, we are the more strongly convinced that in no sense, either legally or morally, is Moon liable for the misapplication by Dodson of the money which the latter collected upon the note intrusted to him by the plaintiff's testator. Under this contract, it is plain that Dodson, in his individual capacity, became the trustee of Payne to raise money upon the note, and apply it as directed. Certainly, it was not an undertaking on the part of the firm of Dodson & Moon, and Payne could not have held that firm liable in the event Dodson violated the trust. The mere fact that Dodson & Moon were named among the beneficiaries thereunder amounts to nothing, for it might as well be said that either of the other beneficiaries named in the instrument thereby became responsible for Dodson's execution of the trust, simply because a benefit would be conferred upon him by its faithful performance on the part of Dodson. The only effect of this paper upon the present case is to show that Dodson, instead of owning absolutely and in his own right the note he traded to Hall, at that time simply held it in trust for Payne for the purpose of negotiation, etc. With the performance of the personal and private obligations of Dodson his firm had nothing to do; so we think the newly discovered evidence is favorable to the defendants rather than to the plaintiff, for it clears up the last doubt as to whether Dodson & Moon owned the note at the time it was traded to Hall, or had any interest in that transaction.

Judgment affirmed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

PULLMAN'S PALACE CAR CO., Piff.
in Err.,
v.
 Elise C. MARTIN.

(.....Ga.....)

*1. Without reference to the law regulating the liability of a sleeping-car company for the loss of property by a passenger, occasioned by the negligence of its employés, it is clear that in a case where the jury could reasonably infer from the evidence that the property lost by a passenger consisted of a sum of money and such articles as she might for her personal convenience and adornment have appropriately carried with her in the car, and that the same was stolen by an employé of the company while the passenger was under his protection, the company is liable.

2. The verdict is supported by the evidence, and the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing a new trial.

3. Where a proper and complete brief of evidence was presented to the judge for his approval, it was bad practice for him, on motion of the opposite party, to require a number of interrogatories and the answers to same, all of which were fully covered by the brief, to be attached to such brief; and, when it plainly appears that doing so was entirely unnecessary, the cost of bringing such superfluous matter to this court will be taxed against the party at whose instance it was added to the brief.

ERROR to the City Court of Savannah to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of certain jewelry and the amount of some money which had been stolen from plaintiff while a passenger in one of defendant's cars. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Barrow & Osborne and Jackson & Leftwich, for plaintiff in error:

When the sleeping-car company has exercised a reasonable degree of watchfulness to guard the passenger against the danger of loss through theft or robbery, it has discharged its full duty under the law.

A sleeping-car company is neither a common carrier of passengers nor an innkeeper. The degree of diligence incumbent upon it is not the same as that on carriers and innkeepers.

There is no presumption of negligence against a sleeping-car company from mere proof of loss.

The mere fact that money or valuables are in the clothing or the immediate belonging of a passenger, in a sleeping car, which are worn during the day and placed under his pillow or in his bed at night, does not make the sleeping-car company the custodian, and it will not be liable for the loss thereof, without some evidence of negligence.

The plaintiff is not to have a verdict for the loss of any money which he was not carrying as a passenger for the purpose of his journey.

Barrott v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 51 Fed. Rep. 797.

By the public exhibition of the earrings, Miss Martin had led every dishonest passenger on the car into temptation, as well as the employés of the company. She was parading valuable jewelry which could not be of the slightest service to her as a passenger. She thus manifestly contributed to her loss.

A sleeping-car company is not liable either as carrier or as innkeeper for property stolen from a passenger.

A sleeping-car company is not responsible as carrier nor as innkeeper, but bound, however, to keep watch, and take reasonable care to prevent theft.

A corporation running sleeping coaches with sections separated from the aisle only by curtains must have an employé charged with the duty of carefully and continually watching the interior of the car while the berths are occupied by sleepers.

Atkinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. According to the view we take of the questions made in this case, it is unnecessary for us to determine whether in Georgia a sleeping-car company should be held to the same degree of diligence as is imposed upon an innkeeper, or whether it shall be adjudged to be a common carrier; nor is it necessary specially to define its appropriate position among that class of persons denominated "bailees for hire." Whether we treat this defendant as a common carrier of passengers, or treat it as an innkeeper, or treat it as a simple lodging-house keeper, hiring its space, for an agreed consideration, for sleeping apartments for a determinate period, it would be responsible for personal jewels and belongings of a passenger, appropriate to his or her social position and financial standing, carried by such passenger while traveling thereon, and for his or her convenience, comfort, or personal adornment, to the extent, at least, of making good to such person any loss resulting from a theft of such property by its own employes while such person was under their protection. It guarantees, at least, that, while enjoying the comforts afforded by the car of the defendant, a person traveling thereon shall not be robbed by its employes. To what extent and under what circumstances it might be liable for the wrongdoing of other persons we do not think is involved in this case, and do not at present undertake to decide. By her declaration the plaintiff alleged that on or about March 2, 1892, she was a passenger for hire on defendant's sleeping car "America" from Chattanooga to Macon; that by the contract of hiring it undertook to use reasonable and proper diligence in guarding and protecting her from loss by theft while she slept, during the usual hours of sleep, in the berth assigned to her on the car by defendant; that she had with her reasonable money and jewelry, to wit, money to the amount of $35 and jewelry of the value of $700; that, upon retiring for the night upon the sleeper, she put the money and jewelry in a satchel, and placed the satchel between her person as she lay in her berth and the wall of the car, and then went to sleep; that defendant so negligently guarded and protected her while she was thus sleeping that, through its negligence, some person unknown to her, while she was asleep, and during the night, took the money and jewelry from the satchel, without her knowledge, and stole it, etc.

According to the evidence reported in the record, the plaintiff was a passenger upon defendant's car, and on the evening before she lost her property, in conversation with another passenger with whom she was traveling, she casually so exposed her pocketbook containing the money and jewelry sued for as that the porter of the car saw it in her possession, and saw her place it in a satchel. Upon retiring, this satchel was placed in the berth beside her, between herself and the wall of the car. She testified that she had not removed the pocketbook from the satchel, but, upon retiring, went to sleep, and so remained until the next morning, about daylight or before. That about this time she was awakened by a sensation as of some person intruding in her berth. That she awoke and recognized the head of the porter, a servant of the company, inside the curtain of her berth. That she asked what he meant, and, when ordered to close the curtain, he said he had come in to call her for breakfast at Macon, Ga. She, however, went to sleep again,—does not know how long she slept,—and then got up and dressed before she reached Macon. That when she finally awoke the satchel was at her feet, and open. That she closed the satchel, and several hours thereafter reopened it, to get some money with which to purchase fruit, and found that the money and jewelry were gone. That she called the attention of the conductor to it, and search was made, but it was impossible to recover the money and jewelry. The conductor testified that both the porter and himself were on watch until all the berths were made down, which was about 10:30 P. M.; that the porter then retired, and he remained on watch until 3:00 A. M., at which time he awoke the porter, who went on watch, and he then retired; that he arose between 6:30 and 7:00 A. M.; that from the time the berths were made down until he retired he was constantly watching the aisle between the berths, to see that the occupants thereof were not disturbed in their persons or property while they slept; that the plaintiff arose about 7:00 o'clock, but did not report her loss until about 11:30 A. M.; that she did not say where her satchel had been during this interval, whether she had left it unguarded for all or any portion of the time or not. The porter testified that he did not know anything of the earrings or money; that the conductor and himself were both on watch until the berths were made down, and then he went to bed, and the conductor remained on watch until 3:00 A. M.; that at that hour the conductor awoke him, and he stood watch alone until the passengers arose the next morning; that he kept a strict watch, did not go to sleep at any time, and was not out at any of the stations; that neither the plaintiff nor her property was interfered with by any one while he was on watch; that the other door was not locked, because it was not necessary, as he was on watch all the time, and could see it; that the car was an old one, and there was nothing to prevent him from seeing from one door to the other; that he did not go inside the curtain, nor put his head, his arms, or his shoulders inside the curtain, before the plaintiff got up; that he did not see her take her pocketbook out of her satchel at any time during the trip, or show her earrings or money to any one; that he remained on watch until the conductor and passengers got up in the morning, and then the conductor shared his watch; that he was in the car the entire time, but was in bed and asleep between 1 and 3 A. M.; that while on watch he was constantly awake and on duty, guarding the car, the property in it, and the passengers, and no one could have disturbed the passengers or their property without his seeing it; that he blacked shoes that night at the end of the aisle, in the body of the car, where he had a full view through the aisle; that this was an old-style car, and had no smoking room in it; that in making down the berths he closed both sashes of the windows; that the windows all had fastenings, to prevent their being raised from the outside; that there was no conversation between the plaintiff and himself; that in waking the passengers, if she was not already up, he woke her in the same manner as he awoke other passengers, by calling, and, if no answer was made, by putting his hand on the berth curtains and pushing them in until they touched her, so as to arouse her; that this was always the way passengers were waked up.

That this passenger lost her jewelry and money, and that she lost them while a passenger in this car, are both facts which may be taken as established beyond controversy by the evidence. The plaintiff's testimony places the porter, the servant of this defendant, in such a situation as that he might easily have purloined her property. According to his own statement, it was not necessary for him to have put his head inside her berth. According to her statement, he did put his head inside of her berth, and thereafter she found her satchel open and her purse gone. These circumstances, even in the face of a denial by the porter, would have furnished strong inferential evidence that he was the man who appropriated these goods. His guilt, we think, is practically demonstrated by his own testimony and that of the conductor. According to the conductor, he was constantly on guard from the time the passengers retired the evening before until 3 o'clock in the morning; and if his testimony be true—and it is not disputed by any one—it would have been impossible for any person without his knowledge to have intruded upon the privacy of this passenger during this interval, and stolen her property. According to the testimony of the porter, from 3 o'clock A. M. until the time when the passengers arose he was constantly on guard for the purpose of protecting the persons and property of the passengers against the depredations of other people; that he was in a position where he could have seen and would have seen any person who intruded upon the passengers in that car, and that no such thing was done. So that, according to his own statement and the statement of the conductor, it would have been impossible for any person other than one of these two to have robbed this plaintiff between the hour when she retired and the hour when she arose. But since she was robbed, and since, as we have seen, it would have been impossible for any person other than one of these two to have robbed her, then the inference is that she was robbed by the one or the other of these employes; and for the larceny of either the company would be responsible. We think the evidence of this plaintiff established beyond controversy that the porter intruded his head into her berth and stole her property. He was the person identified by the passenger as having intruded upon her privacy. According to his testimony, at the time she says it was done, it would have been impossible for any person other than he to have entered unobserved. This was the view the jury might have taken of this case in the court below. The only reasonable conclusion to be drawn from this evidence is that the servant of the defendant, whose duty it was to guard the person and property of this passenger while she slept, purloined the chattels sued for; and we therefore think that, without reference to the liability imposed upon the company for injuries resulting from the negligence of its employes, the jury were justified in finding against it because of the larceny committed by its servants.

2. It is unnecessary to discuss, further than is therein stated, the question of practice referred to in the third headnote to this opinion.

Let the judgment of the court below be affirmed.

(October 4, 1895.)

RESERVATION by the Superior Court for Bristol County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought to compel defendant to pay a portion of the damages caused by, and of the costs of maintaining, a dam used to raise a head of water for the operation of water powers, one of which was owned by defendant. Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. A. M. Alger for plaintiff.

Mr. G. E. Williams for defendant.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The parties have agreed upon all the facts deemed to be material. The Taunton Manufacturing Company built the reservoir dam on land owned by it in 1832, at a time when it was the owner of five mill privileges on the stream below, all of which were then in operation. This dam was for the sole use of the mills upon said mill privileges, and was essential to the reasonable enjoyment of all of the water powers, as the natural flow of the stream during much of the year would be inadequate for furnishing power. Under this state of things, the corporation, in the first place, on August 12, 1838, conveyed to the Bristol Print-Works Company the two lowest mills, the land being described by metes and bounds, "together with all the buildings thereon, and all the rights, privileges, easements, and appurtenances to the said land in any wise appertaining or belonging, and all the streams and water rights and power thereof, also the dam and force of water." On September 6, 1838, the corporation conveyed the next lowest mill to Charles Richmond, under whom, through mesne conveyances, the defendant claims. This deed conveyed the land and buildings "and the water power, dam, and all the appurtenances and privileges thereto belonging," and contained further provisions as follows: "First. This conveyance is made subject to the right and privilege granted by said Taunton Manufacturing Company to the Bristol Print-Works Company, their successors and assigns, to draw water from a reservoir of said Taunton Manufacturing Company through the premises herein described and conveyed, and to enter on said premises for the purpose of relaying and repairing the aqueduct and pipes leading through the same. Secondly. The said Richmond, his heirs and assigns, grantees of these premises, shall be held and obliged at all times to pay to the Taunton Manufacturing Company, their successors and assigns, one fifth part of all sums which they may be held or agreed to pay for flowage or damages to the proprietors of any lands by reason of any dam made, or which may be made, by said Taunton Manufacturing Company, or their successors or assigns of any part of the estate of the said Taunton 29 L. R. A.

Manufacturing Company, upon any stream or waters flowing to their mills. . . .

Fourthly. This conveyance is made subject to the reservations and privileges granted to the Bristol Print-Works by the Taunton Manufacturing Company. Fifthly. . . .

The said Taunton Manufacturing Company intending hereby to alien and assign unto the said Charles Richmond, his heirs and assigns, all and singular the rights, privileges, easements, and appurtenances to the said land in any wise belonging or appertaining, and all the streams, dam, waterpower, and privileges, and head and fall of water (excepting as above excepted), for the considerations above mentioned and set forth. To have and to hold the lands, buildings, waters, and works aforesaid, with all and singular the rights, privileges, easements, and appurtenances thereto belonging, and which have been or of right can be used or enjoyed therewith, unto him, the said Charles Richmond, his heirs and assigns, forever, except as above excepted." The defendant contends that the above deed conveyed no right in the reservoir, and that the clause requiring Richmond and his heirs and assigns to pay one fifth of the damages for flowing is not binding on subsequent owners; and these are the principal questions which have been argued in the case. It is not disputed that the title and rights of the Taunton Manufacturing Company to the upper mill and privilege have come through mesne conveyances to the plaintiff.

If the construction of a deed is doubtful, the practical construction put upon it by the parties and their successors may be looked at in connection with the deed itself and the circumstances existing at the time of its execution. Reynolds v. Boston Rubber Co. 160 Mass. 240, and cases there cited. Until recently the parties in interest have assumed and have acted on the theory that Richmond and his heirs and assigns had an interest in the additional water power created by the reservoir, and were bound to pay one fifth of the damages for flowing. This is shown by the following facts: On July 15, 1835, the Taunton Manufacturing Company conveyed to James K. Mills and others the upper mill and privilege on the stream. "with the dams and water privileges thereon, together with all the right which said Taunton Manufacturing Company have to flow the land between the premises hereby conveyed and the bridge where the old road to Boston crosses Canoe river; the dams, water privileges, and rights of flowage hereby intended to be granted and reserved being fully set forth in and subject to an agreement by and between the grantor and grantees, bearing even date with, and to be referred to always as a part of these presents." The said agreement provided, among other things, as follows: "First. The reservoir dam at White's bridge above Whittenton shall not be altered in any mode without the consent of the parties therein interested, or a majority of them: provided, however, that the proprietors of the Whittenton mill shall always cause to be let down from said reservoir a quantity of water sufficient to propel the present machinery of the Hopewell mills [the Hopewell mills were next below the Whittenton mill] until the water in said reservoir shall be drawn down to the level of the present Whittenton dam; and the proprietors of the Whittenton mill shall be entitled to a fair compensation from all the parties interested in the said reservoir for the time and labor of drawing the water as aforesaid. Second. The water between said reservoir dam and Whittenton mills shall be used hereafter as has been heretofore customary; that is to say, the Whittenton proprietors shall do no act to prevent the natural flow of water over their premises by raising their dam above its present height. . . . Fourth. The damages accruing from time to time for flowage shall be apportioned between the proprietors of the Whittenton mills and the mills now and formerly belonging to the Taunton Manufacturing Company by the award of judicious persons," etc.

The defendant derived his title as follows: The title of Richmond passed to Galen Hicks, under the foreclosure of a mortgage dated October 4, 1833, in which reference was made to the deed of the Taunton Manufacturing Company to Richmond. On March 1, 1848, Hicks conveyed to Dean & Morse with a similar reference; and they, in like manner, on April 1, 1849, conveyed to the Dean Cotton & Machine Company, which in its turn, on November 28, 1874, conveyed to the Taunton Cotton & Machine Company the land and water privileges, "together with all the rights of flowage appurtenant to said estate, and all the right, title, and interest of the grantor in the reservoir and flowage company [this company will be hereinafter described], and subject to all the liability on account of such rights; and, in relation thereto, reference may be made to an agreement between the Taunton Manufacturing Company and James K. Mills and others, dated July 15, 1835, and to the award," etc. On June 1, 1880, the Taunton Cotton & Machine Company conveyed the property to Park Mills, a corporation, with this provision: "This conveyance shall also include whatsoever rights, title, and interest, with the liabilities thereon, said corporation has in the Taunton Reservoir & Flowage Co." On July 19, 1889, the Park Mills conveyed to Staples, the defendant, with a similar provision. On the same day, the Taunton Cotton & Machine Company also executed a deed of the same premises to the defendant, "together with all rights of flowage appurtenant to said estate, and all the right, title, and interest of the grantor in the Reservoir & Flowage Co., and subject to all the liabilities on account of such rights. And, in relation thereto, reference may be made to three papers; namely, first, an agreement between the Taunton Manufacturing Company and James K. Mills and others, dated July 15, 1835, together with the award," etc.

The reservoir and flowage company referred to in some of the above deeds was established as follows: In 1852, the owners of the several mills, all being corporations associated together as a voluntary association, under the name of the Taunton Reservoir & Flowage Company, "for the purpose of aiding in the supplying themselves with water by the reservoir dam," and appointed Willard Lovering, one of the owners of the Whittenton mills, their agent, from time to time, as the damages for flowing should become due, to collect their proportions thereof, and to pay the same to the owners of lands flowed. The annual damages for flowing were in the same year fixed by agreements at $1,842.89, and have not since been changed. These damages are fair and reasonable. From that time to the present, Lovering (who died in 1875) and the successive owners of the Whittenton mills have continued without objection, in behalf of the owners, from time to time, of the several mills, under the name of the Taunton Reservoir & Flowage Company, to collect from said mill owners and to pay out said damages for flowing, and to repair the reservoir dam, and to draw water from the reservoir, and to collect from the several mill owners their respective shares of the expense thereof. The defendant, however, without assenting thereto or dissenting therefrom, otherwise than is herein stated, refused from time to time, as said charges accrued, to pay any part thereof, on the ground that he had not used the water. Bills for the annual expense of maintaining the reservoir dam as rendered to the several mill owners were usually made out under the general statement "To Flowage," without setting forth items for repairs or for drawing the water; but sometimes the bills were itemized. In 1885, the reservoir dam having been injured by a freshet, it was repaired at an expense of $12.12, and the owners of all of said mills paid their proportional shares of such expense. From the time of the execution of the above agreement to the present, the use of the reservoir dam, except as herein stated, has been in accordance with the terms of the agreement, and no person has objected thereto or made any claim inconsistent therewith; and all the mills, when operated, have had the enjoyment of the head of water created by said reservoir dam, and of the reserve waters thereby stored, and no person other than the owners, from time to time, has used the same, or had any interest therein. The water rights belonging to the two lower-mill privileges have been legally extinguished by abandonment. The defendant's mill buildings are standing; the water wheels are in position; but the dam at his mill was carried away by a flood a few months before the conveyance to him; and he has not operated the mill or used the water power, but he has not abandoned the same.

The defendant contends that the above agreement, whereby the Taunton Reservoir & Flowage Company was formed, was for a partnership, and was one which the corporations were not authorized to make, under the decision in Whittenton Mills v. Upton, 10 Gray, 582. We have no occasion to consider that question. This agreement is referred to for the purpose of showing the practical construction put upon the grant to Richmond, and for this purpose it may be looked at, whether valid or invalid. The right of the plaintiff to maintain the bill in equity does not depend upon that agreement. The owners of the defendant's mill, from the time of the conveyance to Richmond, in 1833, down to the time of its conveyance to the defendant, have annually contributed one fifth of the damages for flowing caused by the reservoir dam, and one fifth of the expense of repairing the same, and one fifth of the compensation for drawing the water from the same; and during said period, and from the time said reservoir dam was built, the motive power of said mill has been furnished by the water drawn from said reservoir, except that, since steam came into general use, steam power has also been employed. But since 1890 the defendant has refused to make such contribution. The owners of the two lowest privileges contributed in like manner their proportion as fixed by the award referred to, down to the time of the extinguishment of their water privileges; and the owners of the two upper privileges have also paid their respective proportions according to the award.

Such being the facts, we come now to consider the question of the defendant's right and liability. The reservoir would naturally be of some benefit to the lower-mill privileges, without any express grant. But upon the construction of the deed to Richmond, taken by itself alone, and without reference to what followed, there would be strong reason for holding that some right, the extent of which is not defined, in the water power created by the reservoir dam, was intended to be included in the grant. This water power was in actual use at the time of the grant, and was essential to the reasonable enjoyment of what was in terms granted. Moreover, the reference in the deed to the rights of the Bristol Print-Works Company under the deed (then recent) of the grantor to that company shows clearly that it was understood that some right in the water power created by the reservoir was included in that deed. The provision binding Richmond and his heirs and assigns to pay one fifth part of the damages caused by the flowing to some extent implies that a similar right was intended to be granted to Richmond and his heirs and assigns. The conveyance includes, in broad terms, "all and singular the rights, privileges, easements, and appurtenances to the said land in any wise belonging or appertaining, and all the streams, dam, water power, and privileges, and head and fall of water, 'with all' the rights, privileges, easements, and appurtenances thereto belonging, and which have been or of right can be used or enjoyed therewith." It would seem, therefore, even upon the deed alone, when construed in view of the facts then existing, that some right in the power created by the reservoir dam was by implication included. The plaintiff has cited several cases to show that there is an implied grant of whatever within the grantor's power is necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the thing granted; and others may be found collected in Case v. Minot, 158 Mass. 577, 585. In this respect the deed to Richmond is not like the deeds which were under consideration in Brace v. Yale, 4 Allen, 398, and Whitney v. Wheeler Cotton Mills, 151 Mass. 396, 7 L. R. 29 L. R. A.

A. 618, cited by the defendant. But this construction of the deed, if otherwise doubtful, is made very clear by the subsequent acts of the parties. The whole plan was to treat the reservoir as existing for the common benefit of all the mill privileges which have been mentioned. This is shown especially by the agreement in 1835, and by the voluntary association formed by the owners of the several mills in 1852, under the name of the Taunton Reservoir & Flowage Company. The deed of 1874, in the defendant's chain of title, refers to both of these. The two deeds to the defendant himself, in 1889, both contain a like reference. The action of all the defendant's predecessors in title, and of the owners of the other privileges, has from the beginning been in accordance with this view as to the title. We find nothing tending in any degree to show that any other view was ever taken till after the defendant's purchase, in 1889. Looking, therefore, at the deed itself under which the defendant's title is derived, and at the subsequent acts of the parties in interest, we are of opinion that a right to have the use and benefit of the reservoir was included in the grant to Richmond and his heirs and assigns, and that such right has descended to the defendant. The extent of this right, and the manner of defining and enforcing it, we need not now consider.

The question then arises, whether a court of equity should enforce against the present owner of the premises the stipulation in the deed that Richmond and his heirs and assigns should pay one fifth part of the sums paid for flowing or damages to the proprietors of lands above the reservoir dam. In England it seems to be the tendency of recent decisions to hold that the burden of a covenant, unless possibly one which amounts to a grant, never at law runs with the land, except as between landlord and tenant; and that in equity the court will not, as against assigns, enforce covenants calling for the payment of money, but only covenants which are merely restrictive as to the use of the land. Haywood v. Brunswick Permanent Ben. Bldg. Soc. L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 403; Austerberry v. Oldham, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 750; Olegg v. Hands, L. R. 44 Ch. Div. 504; Gale, Easements, 6th ed. 61, 62; Goddard, Easements, 4th ed. 24. This doctrine has not usually been accepted in the United States. It has been held in many decisions in this commonwealth and elsewhere that at law the burden of a covenant may run with the land. Savage v. Mason, 8 Cush. 500; Bronson v. Coffin, 108 Mass. 175, 11 Am. Rep. 385; Richardson v. Tobey, 131 Mass. 457, 28 Am. Rep. 288; King v. Wright, 155 Mass. 444; Joy v. St. Louis, 138 U. S. 1, 34, 84 L. ed. 848, 858; Fitch v. Johnson, 104 Ill. 111; Haletti v. Sinclair, 76 Ind. 489; Norfleet v. Cromwell, 64 N. C. 1; 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1295. It has also often been held elsewhere that a provision like that contained in the deed to Richmond is itself a covenant binding upon the grantee and his heirs and assigns; that it will run with the land; that it is valid in law; and that the relief granted by a court of equity is not to be limited to those covenants which are merely restrictive, but will be extended to covenants to do pos-live acts involving the expenditure of money. Burbank v. Pillsbury, 48 N. H. 476, 97 Am. Dec. 638; Kellogg v. Robinson, 6 Vt. 276, 27 Am. Dec. 550; Atlantic Dock Co. v. Leavitt, 54 N. Y. 85, 18 Am. Rep. 556; Bowen v. Beck, 94 N. Y. 86, 46 Am. Rep. 124; Finley v. Simpson, 23 N. J. L. 811, 53 Am. Dec. 252; Sparkman v. Gove, 44 N. J. L. 252; Maynard v. Moore, 76 N. C. 158; Georgia Southern R. Co. v. Reeves, 64 Ga. 492; Conduitt v. Ross, 102 Ind. 168; Mazon v. Lane, Id. 864. See, also, Rawle, Covenants, § 272, note. In this commonwealth, however, it has been held that such a provision in a deed poll does not constitute a technical covenant. Parish v. Whitney, 8 Gray, 516 Maine v. Cumston, 98 Mass. 817; Martin v. Drinan, 128 Mass. 516. In Kennedy v. Owen, 186 Mass. 199, the court followed the earlier decisions in saying that such a provision is not technically a covenant running with the land, because the grantee sealed nothing, but that it is rather "a mere personal obligation, imposed upon and assumed by the grantee, and binding upon him and his legal representatives as an implied contract entered into with the grantor."—"an obligation which, if enforceable at all against the purchasers, is to be enforced against them by a court of equity alone." That case did not call for the determination of the question whether such equitable remedy existed or not. The present case, however, raises that question. An ordinary easement binding the granted premises may be created in favor of the grantor, his heirs and assigns, by words contained in a deed poll. Atkins v. Borlman, 2 Met. 457, 462, 37 Am. Dec. 100; Bowen v. Conner, 6 Cush. 182, 185. The grantee's acceptance of the deed subjects the granted estate, both in his own hands and in the hands of all others who may come in under him, to the easement reserved. And we see no good reason why, under circumstances like those existing in the present case, an easement or servitude calling for the performance of positive acts may not also be created in like manner. This seems to be implied by the language of the court in Dyer v. Sanford, 9 Met. 395, 403, 48 Am. Dec. 399. See also Maine v. Cumston, 98 Mass. 817; Schroerer v. Boylston Market Assn. 99 Mass. 285, 297, 298; Woburn v. Henshaw, 101 Mass. 193, 3 Am. Rep. 338. It is binding upon the original grantee, and his assigns with notice are bound in like manner, at least to the extent that the performance of the duty may be charged upon the land to which they succeed. The general doctrine of the equitable enforcement of agreements concerning the occupation and mode of use of real estate is explained in the familiar cases of Whitney v. Union R. Co., 11 Gray, 859, 71 Am. Dec. 715; and Parker v. Nightingale, 6 Allen, 341, 38 Am. Dec. 632. We are brought, therefore, to the conclusion that the obligation imposed by the deed to Richmond may be enforced as an obligation in the nature of a servitude upon the estate of the defendant, though not as a personal obligation of the defendant.

The final question which we have to determine is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover one fifth part of the cost of repairs upon the reservoir dam and of the plaintiff's compensation for drawing the water, as well as one fifth part of the sum paid for flowing. The deed to Richmond does not in terms include such cost of repairs. The language is that Richmond and his heirs and assigns "shall be held and obliged at all times to pay to the Taunton Manufacturing Company, their successors and assigns, one-fifth part of all sums which they may be held or agree to pay for flowage or damages to the proprietors of any lands by reason of any dam made or which may be made by said Taunton Manufacturing Company, or their successors or assigns of any part of the estate of the said Taunton Manufacturing Company, upon any stream or waters flowing to their mills." This language does not admit of a construction which will bind Richmond and his heirs and assigns to pay for repairs of the dam. It is limited to sums paid for flowing to the proprietors of other lands. Independently of this provision, the relation of the parties growing out of the conveyance of the mill privilege and water power would not bind the grantees to pay any part of the cost of such repairs. The right which was granted in respect to the reservoir was not any interest in the dam, but merely some right in respect to the flow of water in addition to that which the grantees would take as riparian owner. The ownership and immediate control of the dam remained with the grantor. The duty of exercising due care to make it safe rested with the grantor alone. The grantor and grantees did not become joint owners of the dam, and would not be jointly liable for damages in case of its giving way, by reason of negligent construction. A right to have a quantity of water, in addition to the natural flow of the stream, sent down from the reservoir, does not carry with it an ownership in the reservoir dam. The agreement between the Taunton Manufacturing Company and James K. Mills and others, which was made a part of the deed from the former to the latter in 1835, is significant as showing the mode in which it was then understood that the water was to be used; but Richmond was not a party to it, nor does the agreement contain anything to show that it was understood that he was to bear a part of the cost of making repairs. The agreement entered into by the various mill corporations in 1852, under the name of the Taunton Reservoir & Flowage Company, contained nothing in respect to the cost of repairs, so far as is shown by the agreed statement of facts.

No distinct agreement or stipulation being shown calling for the payment of one fifth of the cost of maintaining the dam, we have to consider whether a servitude has been imposed on the defendant's land by prescription, requiring such contribution. It is agreed that the owners of the defendant's property, "from the time of its conveyance to Richmond, in 1833, down to the time of its conveyance to the defendant, have annually contributed one fifth of the flowage damages caused by the reservoir dam, and one fifth of the expense of repairing the same, and one fifth of the compensation for drawing the water from the same; and during said period, and from the time said reservoir dam was built, the motive power of said mill has been furnished by the water drawn from said reservoir." After describing the agreement of 1852 between the various mill corporations, the statement of facts recites that, from that time down to the present, Lovering and the successive owners of Whittenton mills have continued without objection to collect from the owners of the several mills "the flowage damages, and repair the reservoir dam, and draw water from the reservoir, and collect from the several mill owners the respective shares of the expense thereof." The one party collected the money as a right; the other paid it as a duty. It would seem that the evidence is sufficient to establish such a servitude by prescription, if in law such a servitude can be so created.

The duty is of the same character as that which is created by the provision in the deed to Richmond, binding him and his assigns to pay one fifth of the sum paid for flowing. Its connection with the estate and rights granted is equally close. A covenant to make the payments would run with the land. A duty imposed on the grantee and his assigns by stipulation in the deed would be enforced in equity against the land. We see no reason why the same duty may not be established by prescription. In Doane v. Badger, 12 Mass. 65, it was recognized, though not expressly decided, that, where the owner of a close had an ancient right to take water from a well and pump situated on another close, he might be bound by prescription to keep the well and pump in repair. It is well established that there may be a prescriptive duty to maintain fences (Bronson v. Coffin, 108 Mass. 175, 185, 11 Am. Rep. 335, and cases cited); also, ways (Middlefield v. Church Mills Knitting Co. 160 Mass. 267). See also Lynn v. Turner, Cowp. 86; Anonymous, Loft, 556, where it was held that there may be a prescriptive duty of keeping the bed or banks of a stream in order. So, where a reservoir dam is maintained for the benefit of several estates, the duty of repairs in whole or in a specified proportion may be established by prescription as a charge against one of the estates in interest. The duty of paying one fifth of the reasonable compensation for drawing water rests on the same grounds. For these reasons, in the opinion of a majority of the court, the payment of the whole sum claimed may be enforced against the land of the defendant.

Decree for the plaintiff.

Field, Ch. J., dissenting:

I am unable to agree to the opinion of a majority of the court. That opinion, in effect, is that there has been acquired by prescription an easement or servitude in the land of the defendant being the "Brick Mill," so called, and its appurtenances, whereby that land is bound to contribute one fifth part of the annual flowage damages caused by the reservoir dam as erected by the Taunton Manufacturing Company in 1833, and one-fifth part of the reasonable expenses incurred in repairing that dam, and one fifth part of a reasonable compensation for the time and labor expended in drawing water from the reservoir, in accordance with the requirements of the agreement of 1835. The case was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts. The defendant acquired his title to the brick mill and its appurtenances by two deeds, each dated July 12, 1889. At that time the dam on the estate conveyed to the defendant had been carried away, and had not been rebuilt, but the mill buildings were standing and the water wheels were in position, and this condition of things has remained to the present time. The defendant has never operated the mills or used the water power, although he has not abandoned any rights he may have in the water power or in the reservoir.

It is agreed, among other things, as follows: "The defendant, at the time he accepted his deeds, did not have actual knowledge of the contents of the award alleged therein to have been delivered to him, or of any of the agreements herein mentioned; but the said award and agreements, and the books of the Taunton Reservoir & Flowage Company, running back for more than forty years, were then, and ever since have been, in the possession of the plaintiff, and, upon inquiry, the defendant could at any time have ascertained all facts which are herein stated, although he had no actual knowledge of the existence of the said books or agreements. This statement shall not, however, be so construed as to exclude a finding on the facts stated of constructive knowledge." Neither the defendant nor any of his predecessors in title, while owners or occupiers of the estate, were parties to any of these agreements or to the award.

There is much discussion in the opinion of the majority of the court upon the effect of the deed of the defendant's premises from the Taunton Manufacturing Company to Charles Richmond, dated September 6, 1833, and of the mesne conveyances under which the defendant claims title, as well as of the two deeds to the defendant, although this discussion seems not absolutely necessary to the decision. In the deed to Richmond it is stipulated that the grantee, his heirs and assigns, "shall be held and obliged at all times to pay to the Taunton Manufacturing Company, their successors and assigns, one fifth part of all sums which they may be held or agreed to pay for flowage or damages to the proprietors of any lands by reason of any dam made, or which may be made, by said Taunton Manufacturing Company, or their successors or assigns of any part of the estate of the said Taunton Manufacturing Company, upon any streams or waters flowing to their mills." This provision is referred to in subsequent deeds. It covers, however, only one fifth part of the damages for flowage, and does not include any part of the expenses of repairs of the reservoir dam or of drawing off the water of the reservoir.

It is conceded by the majority of the court that, under our decisions, these stipulations on the part of the grantees in the several deeds do not constitute technical covenants on their part, because they are deeds poll.

The decision of a majority of the court does not proceed on the ground of any promise, express or to be implied, on the part of the defendant to perform the stipulations on the part of the grantees in the deed to Richmond, or the stipulations on the part of the grantees in any of the subsequent deeds which constitute the defendant's chain of title. The decree is not against the defendant personally, but it is a decree against his land; and it establishes a charge against this land, not only for one fifth of the damages caused by flowage, but also for one fifth of the expenses of the repairs of the reservoir dam and of drawing off the water. The decree proceeds on the ground of a right acquired by prescription more comprehensive than anything contained in any of the deeds under which the defendant claims title, which is in the nature of an easement or servitude inherent in the land, but which does not involve any personal obligation upon the owner of the land.

To establish this easement or servitude, the majority of the court rely upon the following statement of the agreed statement of facts: "The owners of the Brick mill, from the time of its conveyance to Charles Richmond, in 1833, down to the time of its conveyance to the defendant, have annually contributed one fifth of the flowage damages caused by the reservoir dam, and one fifth of the expense of repairing the same, and one fifth of the compensation for drawing the water from the same; and during said period, and from the time said reservoir dam was built, the motive power of said mill has been furnished by the water drawn from said reservoir, except that, since steam came into general use, steam power has also been employed." The effect of the decision seems to be that when any one buys a mill privilege on a stream which at the time of the purchase is unused, because the dam on the privilege has been carried away, if the stream has on it a reservoir dam belonging to other persons some distance above, and if, as a fact, his predecessors in title have maintained the dam on the mill privilege, and used the mill, and have also contributed to the maintenance of the reservoir for more than twenty years continuously, an easement or servitude is acquired by prescription in the land which constitutes the mill privilege, for the benefit of the owners of the reservoir, or as appurtenant to the reservoir, to have this contribution continued payable out of the land, even although the purchaser, at the time of the conveyance of the mill privilege to him, knew nothing of any such contribution, and the registry of deeds contained no information on the subject.

With, perhaps, one or two exceptions, easements in land are passive in their character, and, when acquired by prescription, consist in the right to use the servient tenement in a certain manner defined by an adverse user continued for the requisite period of time, 29 L. R. A.

and they are acquired by notorious acts done on the land under a claim of right. Payments of varying sums of money from year to year by an owner of a mill privilege to the owners of a reservoir situated on the stream some distance above the privilege are not in their nature notorious acts done on the mill privilege. It is said that there may be a prescriptive duty to maintain fences and ways; and Bronson v. Coffin, 108 Mass. 175, 11 Am. Rep. 335, and Middlefield v. Church Mills Knitting Co., 160 Mass. 267, are cited. The actual decision in Bronson v. Coffin was upon the effect of a covenant of the grantor in a deed. Middlefield v. Church Mills Knitting Co. was decided upon a demurrer to the declaration, and it was said that the duty of the defendant to maintain the highway was "sufficiently alleged for the purposes of the case at bar." The manner in which that duty originated did not appear in the declaration. But if it be conceded, without expressing any opinion on the subject, that a duty to maintain fences and repair ways can be established by prescription or by covenant, these are confessedly exceptions to the general rule that an active duty can be attached to land. To deduce from these exceptions the rule that an active duty can be attached to land by prescription to pay money from time to time for the maintenance of an artificial reservoir of water belonging to other persons, miles away from the premises, which is a permanent easement in the land, whether the water is used or not, is, so far as I know, attaching unusual incidents to land, for which there is no precedent. Secret liens or interests in land, a knowledge of which cannot be obtained by a view of the land itself, or by a search in the proper registry of deeds, certainly ought not to be extended. As the decision of the majority of the court rests upon the doctrine of prescription, I do not consider whether such incidents as are attached to the land of the defendant by the decision can be attached to land by covenants in a deed, or whether, in the present case, from the stipulations in the deed poll which concern the duty of the grantees, a promise can be implied against the present defendant to perform these stipulations, as a continuing promise, to whosoever maintain the reservoir, or whether the deeds can be construed as deeds upon the condition that these stipulations shall be performed. Neither do I consider whether a court of equity in this commonwealth will enforce stipulations for the payment of money contained in a deed poll against the assigns of the grantee. I dissent from the doctrine that, on the facts agreed in the present case, an easement in the defendant's land, of the kind described in the opinion of the majority of the court, has been established by prescription.

Holmes and Lathrop, JJ., concur in this dissent.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT

W. D. BLOXHAM, Comptroller, Appt.,
2.
CONSUMERS' ELECTRIC LIGHT &
STREET R. Co.

1. The word "railroad," in its broadest signification, includes a street railroad. When the word is used in a statute there is no definite rule of construction as to whether it includes street railroads. It may, or it may not, include them. The meaning of the word must depend upon the context and the general intent of the statute in which it is used.

2. Besides judicial construction of statutes there is known to the law another kind of construction. This kind of construction has especial application to statutes for the regulation of the different departments of the government, and is the interpretation put upon them by the actual administration of them by such departments. As distinguished from judicial construction, it is called the practical construction of statutes.

3. A practical construction of a statute by a governmental department, while not of such high authority as a judicial interpretation of the act, is, when not in conflict with the constitution or the plain intent of the act, of great persuasive force and efficacy.

4. The contention is made that a street railroad extending along the streets of a single city, and wholly located within a single county, is not a railroad in the contemplation of our statute requiring railroads to be assessed for taxation by the comptroller of the state, and that the same can be assessed for taxes only by the county tax assessor. For more than twelve years past the comptroller of the state has, under the act in question, or acts of similar import, assessed all railroads for taxation, including street railroads located in a single city and county. The taxes have always been paid to the state upon such street railroads, upon such assessments, without objection; the legislature with knowledge of such practice has several times repealed the statute containing such provision, and passed other acts containing similar provisions; thousands of dollars having been collected under such assessments, and no objection made, and no attack upon the validity of the same. Held, that such practical construction of the act by an executive department of the government is a matter of which the court can take judicial notice, and that under the circumstances stated the greatest deference and respect should be paid to the same, and that the same should not be interfered with.

5. The courts cannot enjoin an officer of the state from the collection of the state's taxes merely because they think he might adopt a mode which would be fairer and more equitable, if the mode he is pursuing is authorized by the statute. It is only when the tax is illegal, or is being illegally collected, that an injunction should be granted.

6. The state's lien for taxes, having attached by the assessment of the property, cannot be divested by a subsequent judicial sale in a proceeding in which the state is not a party, even though the decree under which the sale was made directs that the property be sold free from all liens and incumbrances. In such a case the lien continues until the taxes are paid, and a bill of complaint not alleging a payment or a tender of the taxes is demurrable.

7. Private parties have no right, in proceedings in which the state is not a party by consent, to have a decree entered which will divest it of its statutory tax lien upon the property involved in the suit, and force it to collect its taxes in some other manner than that prescribed by the statute. No court has jurisdiction or authority to enter a decree to such effect. The state, by its legislature, has ample power to choose its own method of collecting its taxes, and when the method chosen violates no constitutional provision no court can require it to adopt any other method.

Central Trust Co. of New York v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 80 Fed. Rep. 883; Booth, Street Railways, § 271.

The difference between street railroads and railroads for general traffic is well understood. The difference consists in their use, and not in their motive power. A railroad the rails of which are laid to conform to the grade and surface of the street, and which is otherwise constructed so that the public is not excluded from the use of any part of the streets as a public way; which runs at a moderate rate of speed, compared to the speed of traffic railroads; which carries no freight, but only passengers from one part of a thickly populated district to another, in a town or city and its suburbs, and for that purpose runs its cars at short intervals, stopping at the street crossings to receive and discharge its passengers,—is a street railroad whether the cars are propelled by animal or mechanical power.

Williams v. City Electric Street R. Co. 41 Fed. Rep. 556; Newell v. Minneapolis, L. & M. R. Co. 35 Minn. 112, 59 Am. Rep. 808.

Liddon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, who was complainant in the court below, brought its bill of complaint to enjoin the appellant (defendant below) from selling a certain line of street railroad for the payment of certain state and county taxes. The property in question is an electric street railroad located upon certain streets of the city of Tampa, and wholly situated within the county of Hillsborough. The taxes sought to be collected are for the year 1893, and have not been paid. The property was levied upon and a sale thereof advertised. A demurrer to the bill of complaint, for general want of equity, and upon other grounds, was overruled, and a temporary injunction granted, restraining the sale of the property. The appeal is taken from these orders.

Without attempting to give, even in a digested form, the allegations of the bill of complaint, it is sufficient to say that two principal grounds are set forth why the proceedings to sell the property should be enjoined. Inverting the order in which they are stated in the bill of complaint, these reasons, briefly stated, are as follows: 1. That the assessment of the property by the comptroller, under the statute regulating the assessment of railroads, was null and void, and that the same should have been assessed by the county tax assessor under the general statutes for the assessment of real and personal property. 2. That the property, after assessment, passed out of the hands of the parties owning it at the time of such assessment, and was sold at a judicial sale, in proceedings to which the state was not a party; that the order under which such sale was made directed "that the same be sold free from any mortgages, judgments, mechanics', laborers', materialmen's, and other liens or incumbrances of any kind whatsoever, and that all parties consented thereto." That the property sold for a large sum of money, which was paid into the registry of the court, where it still remained. That such sale was confirmed and a deed made to the purchaser, conveying the property to him in fee simple, free from all liens and incumbrances. That the complainant is now the owner of the property. That the property was sold pendente lite, and that it was the intention of said sale that the money for which said property should be sold should be brought into court and should represent the property, and that any liens and incumbrances whatever existing against the same should be paid out of said fund, and that said property should be sold free from any and all liens and incumbrances whatever. Wherefore it is claimed that the property should not be held liable for the taxes, but that the same should be paid out of the funds in the registry of the court.

Under the first objection, that the assessment of the property by the comptroller, under the statute regulating the assessment of railroads, was illegal and void, it is urged that a street railway extending over the streets of a single city, and wholly located within the limits of a single county, is not a railroad within the meaning of the word as used in the statute. If a street railroad is not a railroad in contemplation of the statute, the assessment is illegal, but if it is such a railroad, the assessment is legal and proper. The question presented requires an examination of the statute. Sections 48, 49, chapter 415, Laws of Florida, Acts 1893. The 48th section of the Act provides, among other things, in substance, that certain officers of a railroad company, or the "receiver of any railroad, whose track or road-bed, or any part thereof, is in this state," shall annually make a return to the comptroller of the state under oath, showing the total length and value of such road, including branches, side-tracks, lots, parts of lots, terminal facilities, etc., in this state; the total length and value thereof in each county, city, or incorporated town, and the number and value of all locomotives, engines, cars, etc. If such return is not made, or the same when made is not satisfactory to the comptroller, then he, with the assistance and advice of the attorney-general and treasurer of the state, have the power to assess the property from the best information obtainable, specifying the values in each county. The value of the rolling stock is apportioned to each county pro rata, the length of the track, branches and side-tracks in the same, and the respective county assessors and the authorities of cities and towns notified accordingly; and upon the valuation thus apportioned the taxes shall be assessed as upon the property of individuals. The 49th section, among other things, provides that the comptroller, upon certificates showing default of payment in any county, shall have the power to issue a warrant directed to the sheriff of any county where such defaulting railroad, or any part thereof, is located, by which such sheriff is authorized to sell the entire road, or such part thereof as may be necessary, to pay such taxes and the costs and expenses of sale. The proceeds of such sale are to be divided among the counties where such taxes are due. The legislature, especially in the 49th section, seems to assume that every railroad in this state extends into and is situated in more than one county thereof. The 49th section, however, implies that a railroad may be wholly located in one county. It is plain that the purpose and intention of the act, are that railroads, and the rolling stock and appurtenances used in the operation of the same, should be taxed as an entirety; that where it extends into different counties, there should be uniformity in the valuation and assessment thereof in such counties, and that the value of the rolling stock, which is almost constantly in motion, going from one county to another, should be properly taxed without double taxation or any dispute as to the situs of such property for taxation. The word "railroad," in its broadest significance, would undoubtedly include a street railroad; all railroads being more or less alike in their physical construction. It is said that when the word "railroad" is used in a statute, there is no definite rule of construction as to whether it includes street railways. It may or may not include them. The meaning of the word must depend upon the context, and the general intent of the statute in which it is used. 19 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 788; Chicago v. Evans, 24 Ill. 52. The word "railroad," as generally used, applies to commercial railways engaged in the transportation of freight and passengers for long distances, and, as a general rule, having steam engines for motive power, and making stops at regular stations for the receipt and discharge of freight and passengers. The term "street railroad" applies only to such roads, the rails of which are laid to conform to the grade and surface of the street, and which is otherwise constructed so that the public are not excluded from the street as a public highway, which runs at a moderate rate of speed compared with a commercial railroad, which carries no freight, but only passengers from one part of a thickly populated district to another in a town or city and its suburbs, and for that purpose runs its cars at short intervals, stopping at street crossings or other places irregularly, as the convenience of its patrons may require, for the receipt and discharge of its passengers. The cars upon such roads may be propelled by animal or mechanical power. Williams v. City Electric Street R. Co. 41 Fed. Rep. 556. No case has been pointed out to us by counsel, and after much investigation we have been unable to find a judicial definition of the word "railroad," occurring in any taxing statute similar to ours, as to whether or not it would include a street railroad.

Besides the judicial construction of statutes, there is known to the law another kind of construction. This kind of construction has especial application to statutes made for the regulation of the different departments of the government, and is the interpretation put upon them by the actual administration of them by such departments. As distinguished from judicial construction, it is called the practical construction of statutes. While not of such high authority as a judicial interpretation of the act, such practical construction of the class of statutes referred to, when not in conflict with the constitution or the plain intent of the act, is of great persuasive force and efficacy. The system of taxation of railroads by the state comptroller, in the manner prescribed by the sections of the act hereinbefore referred to, has existed in this state ever since the enactment of chapter 1713, Laws of Florida, Acts of 1869. Slight modifications have at various times been made by different legislatures, but the general system has remained unchanged. It is well known to all who are familiar with the history of the state, and with the method of taxation prevailing therein, that for at least twelve years past the comptroller of the state, under and by authority of the statute under which the action sought to be enjoined is taken, or statutes of similar import, has assessed all railroads, including street railroads, as being included within the general term "railroads," as the same is used in the law. Street railroads located in a single city have been no exception to the general rule. The taxes for many years have been paid to the state under such assessments without objection; thousands of dollars have been so collected, and no attack whatever has been made upon the validity of such assessment. This long prevailing construction is a matter of which the court can take judicial notice. Westbrook v. Miller, 56 Mich. 148. It is notorious that acts for the general collection of revenue are generally formulated by, or under the advice of, the comptroller of the state. Since this method of assessing taxes upon street railroads has been in force, the legislature has several times, repealing former acts, re-enacted the same provisions, thus giving legislative sanction to the practical construction of the act by the department of the state government which has charge of the assessment and collection of taxes from railroads. "Where there are different statutes in pari materia made at different times, or even expired and not referring to each other, they shall be taken and construed as one system and as explanatory of each other." Lord Mansfield, in Rea v. Loddale, 1 Burr. 445, cited in Doggett v. Walter, 15 Fla. text 367. The question of the force and authority of a practical construction of a statute has often been passed upon by the courts. In Westbrook v. Miller, supra, an opinion delivered by Judge Cooley, it is said: "The construction placed by an executive department upon a statute affecting the performance of its duties is not lightly to be questioned, especially when it has become established by long usage and relates to matters of form only. But practical construction must not be allowed to defeat the manifest purpose of the statute." Further it is said in the same case: "When, in the performance of executive duties, it becomes necessary for the executive department to construe a statute, great deference is always due to its judgment; and the obligation is increased by the lapse of considerable time before its acts are called in question." Many authorities from the Supreme Court of the United States and from subordinate courts of the federal system are cited to sustain the propositions announced.

The question involved is the method of taxation of the property in dispute. No question is raised of the liability of the property to taxation. No showing is made of any double assessment, or unequal, unjust, or oppressive taxation. The taxes on the property for the year for which the assessment was made have not been paid. The property has not discharged the burden of taxation which rests upon it as upon all other property in the state not specially exempted by law. In such a case we think the greatest deference and respect should be paid by this court to the long-prevailing construction of the statute made by the executive department of the state government, and we will not interfere with the same. We do not rest our conclusion upon the case of Westbrook v. Miller, supra, but have examined many other authorities upon the subject which practically unanimously agree with that case. Among other cases of similar import are, Johnson v. Ballou, 28 Mich. 379; Malonny v. Mahar, 1 Mich. 26; Solomon v. Cartersville Comrs. 41 Ga. 157; Scanlan v. Childs, 88 Wis. 663; Union Ins. Co. v. Hoge, 62 U. S. 21 How. 35, 16 L. ed. 61; Cheesnut v. Shiane, 16 Ohio, 599, 47 Am. Dec. 387; Wetmore v. State, 55 Ala. 198; Edwards v. Darby, 25 U. S. 13 Wheat. 206, 6 L. ed. 608; United States v. Gilmore, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 330, 19 L. ed. 396; Kiersted v. State, 1 Gill & J. 231; Brown v. United States, 113 U. S. 568, 28 L. ed. 1079, and various authorities cited therein; United States v. Lytle, 5 McLean, 9; People v. Dayton, 55 N. Y. 367; Wright v. Forrestal, 65 Wis. 341; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 809 et seq. In the case cited from 41 Georgia the court said, adopting the practical construction of a statute made by the executive department of the government, that if the matter were before them as an original, independent proposition, they would be inclined to hold differently, but yielded their own views to such practical construction.

This brings us to the consideration of the second ground upon which it was claimed that the injunction should issue. The allegation of the bill of complaint as to the manner of complainant's acquiring a title to the property is very vague and indefinite, there being no direct statement whatever that it acquired title through the judicial sale mentioned. We will consider the case, however, as if the bill contained such an averment. The property had been assessed for its taxes, and a lien for the same thereby acquired by the state before the judicial sale. The contention, however, is that although the state was not a party to the proceedings in which the sale was made, yet by virtue of the direction of the court that the property be sold free from any mortgages, judgments, mechanics', laborers', materialmen's, or other liens and incumbrances whatever, such sale divested the state's lien, so that it cannot subject the property itself to the payment of the taxes assessed against it, 29 L. R. A.

but must intervene by petition in the suit, and obtain payment of the taxes from the funds in the registry of the court. It is contended that it would be inequitable for the state to now subject the property in the hands of complainant to the payment of taxes, when there is a fund in court from which such payment can be secured. Disposing of this minor contention first, we will quote the language of the supreme court of Rhode Island in the case of People's Sav. Bank v. Tripp, 18 R. I. 621, text 622: "The complainant contends that the collector ought to be enjoined because the levy and sale are inequitable and unfair. But in our opinion we cannot enjoin him merely because we think he might adopt a mode which would be fairer and more equitable, if the mode he is pursuing is authorized by the statute. The collector is an official of the government, and has as much right as the court to use his own judgment in the execution of his office. It is only when the tax is illegal, or is being illegally collected, that the courts, which go furthest, grant an injunction." Other remarks applicable to this point will be used in disposing of other questions in the further course of this opinion.

The state's lien for taxes having attached by the assessment of the property, could not be divested by a subsequent judicial sale, even though the decree under which the sale was made should have directed that the property should be sold free from all incumbrances. The case of Meaker v. Koch, 76 Ind. 68, is very much like the present one. The complainants, in the case cited, alleged that they had purchased the property at a judicial sale. The firm against whom the property was assessed had gone into bankruptcy; that the taxes claimed were set forth in the bankruptcy schedule of indebtedness; that the same was a preferred claim, and that funds to pay the same had been in the hands of the assignee in bankruptcy, which fact was known to the treasurer. A demurrer to the bill was sustained. The court, affirming the decision, quoting Stokes v. State, 46 Ga. 412, 13 Am. Rep. 588, held "that the state can enforce the payment of its taxes by a sale of the property upon which they are a lien, though the owner has been adjudged a bankrupt, and the assignee has sold the property to a third party. . . . The state has the right to follow the property into whosoever hands found. . . . The bankrupt law does not attempt to deprive a state of this power. True, it makes provision for the payment of the state taxes, if the state chooses to come into the bankrupt court and claim them, but she cannot be compelled to come in. Hence, the assignee, by sale of a bankrupt's property, cannot divest the right of the state to enforce the payment of her taxes on the property, wherever it may be found." In the case of Stokes v. State, supra, the property had been sold under an order directing that the same be sold free from incumbrances. The trial court instructed the jury as follows: "That if it appears that the tax was assessed upon this land for the year 1868, as the property of Hunt and Bryan.

then the bankrupt court had no power to divest the lien of the taxes on the land in favor of the state, and that no sale or order of said court could interfere with the right of the state to collect said tax, and that said land, in whosever's hands it might be, was still liable for the tax." This charge was affirmed as a correct statement of the law by the appellate court. The principle stated in the cases quoted from are upheld by various authorities, among which are Black on Tax Titles, § 187; Freeman v. Atlanta, 66 Ga. 617; Atlanta & R. Air-Line R. Co. v. State, 63 Ga. 483; Osterberg v. Union Trust Co. of New York, 93 U. S. 424, 23 L. ed. 964; Isaacs v. Decker, 41 Ind. 410; Bodertha v. Spencer, 40 Ind. 353.

The sale under the decree of the court in the present case did not divest the state's lien for taxes. A proper interpretation of the decree of the court does not show that it intended to divest the state of its tax lien, even if it had the power so to do. Several classes of liens and incumbrances are expressly mentioned in the decree. The lien for taxes is not so mentioned. We need not invoke the doctrine of expressio unius exclusio alterius est, to show that a tax lien was not included in the decree, for it is well settled that such a lien does not stand upon the footing of an ordinary lien, and is not displaced by a sale under a pre-existing judgment or decree, unless so directed by statute. The lien continues until the taxes are paid, and the bill is demurrable unless it allege a payment or a tender of the taxes. Besides authorities above cited, see Rinard v. Nordyke, 76 Ind. 180; Hier v. Olson, 8 Neb. 381.

In reference to the contention that the state ought to intervene by petition in the suit pending in the court below, and collect its taxes from the money the proceeds of the property in the registry of the court, the undoubted weight of authority is, that while the state might so intervene if it chose, it cannot be compelled to do so. Private parties have no right, in proceedings in which the state is not a party by consent, to have a decree entered which will divest it of its statutory tax lien upon the property involved in the suit and force it to collect its taxes in some other manner than that prescribed by the statute. No court has jurisdiction or authority to enter a decree having such effect. The state by its legislature has ample power to choose its own method of collecting its taxes. When the method chosen violates no constitutional provision, no court can require it to adopt any other method. To compel it to intervene in litigation to become a party to suits between private individuals or corporations, would impair the functions of the state government, would involve expense of court costs and counsel fees, delay and inconvenience in the collection of the public revenues. In this way taxes might be lost, the collection of them endangered, and the costs of collection would certainly be swelled by the fees and expenses of litigation. Anely v. DeSousaure, 12 S. O. 488, text 511; Smith v. Gatewood, 3 S. O. N. 8. 838.

Petitioner, 149 U. S. 164, 37 L. ed. 689, and upon cases cited by the court in said opinion. What we have said disposes of the case before us, but in view of the earnestness with which the cases mentioned have been pressed upon our attention, we deem it not inappropriate to refer briefly to them. We cannot enter into any critical analysis of each case because such a course would extend this opinion to undue length. The case of Ex parte Tyler, Petitioner, was a habeas corpus proceeding to relieve from punishment for contempt a South Carolina sheriff who had levied a tax execution or warrant upon property in the hands of a receiver appointed by a United States court. An injunction had been previously issued against the levy, and the taxes sought to be enforced had been held illegal by the court. The supreme court denied the writ of habeas corpus upon the ground that the property in question was in custodia legis, and that the duty of the court to protect it from all interference extended to the levy of a tax warrant. Without expressing any assent to or dissent from the doctrine announced, it is sufficient to say that the facts of this case are entirely different from the Tyler Case. The property here levied upon is not in the custody of the court. It has been sold under order of court to private parties, and is in their exclusive ownership and possession. There is no ground for the contention in the present proceeding of an interference with the property in the possession of a receiver, an officer of the court. The money (the proceeds of the sale of the property) may be considered as in custodia legis, but the property itself is free and discharged from the care and custody of the court.

In the case of Central Trust Co. v. New York City & N. R. Co., 110 N. Y. 250, 1 L. R. A. 260, the converse of the proposition contended for by appellee was asserted. There the state intervened and sought to enforce the payment of taxes of a railroad that had gone into the hands of a receiver from funds in his hands arising from the operation of the road. The statute pointed out a different remedy, and it was claimed that the statutory remedy should have been pursued. The court held that the state was not confined to the statutory remedy, but that the court might order the taxes paid upon the petition of intervention.

Several cases cited by appellee show that where the proceeds of property subject to payment of taxes has come into the custody of a court, such court might, upon the intervention of the state, direct the taxes paid by the receiver or officer holding such funds. But none of them hold that the state, in a case where the property has been sold and discharged from the custody of the court, is compelled to seek payment of its taxes from the proceeds of the property in the custody of the court. On the contrary, one of the cases cited by appellee (Savannah v. Jeup, 106 U. S. 563, 27 L. ed. 276) shows that the course pursued by the state in the present instance is a correct one. In that case the court said: "If the city had a valid claim for taxes, . . . two courses were open to it,—to postpone action under its executions until the proceedings in the circuit court of the United States were concluded, and its possession of the property, by receivers, had ended; or, with leave of court, to file a petition pro interesse suo, submitting its claim for judicial determination. It adopted the latter course." It is useless to further cite or analyze the cases in appellee's brief. The most that can be claimed for any of them is that they forbid an interference by virtue of a tax warrant with property actually in the custody of the court. None of them are authority for the proposition that a tax warrant cannot be levied upon property which has been discharged from such custody. The doctrine is laid down in High on Receivers, section 602, that real estate which has been held by a receiver, where the title did not vest in him, after the termination of the possession of the receiver is subject to the lien of a judgment and execution against it the same as if there had never been any receivership. If this is true of the lien of an ordinary judgment, the reason is much stronger for applying it to the lien of the state for taxes, which is the highest of all liens.

The decrees appealed from are reversed, with directions to the court below to enter an order dissolving the temporary injunction granted in the cause, sustaining the demurrer, and dismissing the bill of complaint. The order dismissing the bill of complaint not to be entered if complainant desires to make a further case by amendment. In such event the usual course will be taken.

I. Before legal tender act.

An agreement to pay a certain sum in specie at a future date in consideration of a loan of paper money was sustained in Brachan v. Griffin, 8 Cal (Va.) 875 (1868), in a suit in equity for relief against the contract in which an injunction that had been granted was dissolved and the bill dismissed.

An early Kentucky statute, providing that when a note was made payable "in gold or silver" the judgment should specify that fact, was enforced in Webb v. Moore, 4 T. B. Mon. 428 (1827), and it was held that a note calling for dollars "in specie" came within the statute.

But without referring to such statute as controlling or existing, the effect of the words "in gold and silver" in a note calling for a specified amount in dollars and cents is also considered in Hart v. Myrna, 8 Dana, 126 (1838), in which it is said that such a note is for the direct payment of money, and cannot be discharged, or imply an undertaking to pay, 29 L. R. A.

bonds at a certain per cent is unlawful, where the notice of election, which the law requires to state the rate of interest, names such per cent payable annually.

2. The terms and conditions of municipal bonds, which the statute requires to be stated in a notice of election, including those as to rate of interest and the tax levy required for in bullion, bars of gold and silver, or old silver tea-pots, spoons, and rings, and that if such had been the intention the amount would not have been measured by dollars and cents, but by ounces and pounds.

In case of a due bill for $395 in dimes on demand, it was said that the fact that it was payable in dimes was perfectly immaterial, as it might be discharged by the payment of eagles, dollars, or dimes. Archafalaya R. & Bkg. Co. Comrs. v. Bean, 8 Rob. (La.) 414 (1848). But this seems to involve merely the denomination of the money, and not the kind of it.

II. Application of legal tender act to specific contracts for coin.

a. Decisions before Bronson v. Rhodes.

1. Denying effect to such contracts.

The leading case on the subject of specific agreements to pay an obligation in gold or silver is that of Bronson v. Rhodes, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 222, 19 L. ed. 141 (1869), reversing 24 N. Y. 649 (1866), in which it was decided that a bond to pay a certain sum in gold and silver coin lawful money of the United States, with interest also in coin, was payable only in coined money.

Some of the state courts, before this decision, construed the legal tender act to cover agreements which specifically called for payment in gold and silver, as well as other contracts which did not specify the medium of payment further than to name the number of dollars and cents that should be paid. These, although they may be regarded as now only of historical value, are here compiled to show the whole course of decisions on the subject. It will be seen, from subsequent portions of this note, that some of these decisions have been expressly overruled by later decisions of the same court.

Thus, in Illinois, it was decided in Whetstone v. Colley, 36 Ill. 526 (1865), in an action on a promissory note, that a contract for the payment of money specifically in gold could be discharged by the payment of the same sum in legal tender notes, and payment thereof, must substantially follow those stated in such notice.

3. Municipal bonds cannot be made payable "in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard of weight and fineness," where a statute provides that such bonds shall be payable "in gold coin or lawful money of the United States."

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Sonoma County affirming the validity of certain bonds proposed to be issued by the city of Santa Rosa. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Ordinance 153 is invalid.

Placerville v. Wilcox, 85 Cal. 21; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 818; Merriam v. Moody, 25 Iowa, 163.

The gold bonds should not issue.

The decision of the proper officials that the consent of the taxpayer was duly obtained, expressed in the recitals of the bonds, is conclusive, and an innocent purchaser may rely upon the recitals without looking further.

that in a suit upon such a contract a judgment could only be rendered for the amount due upon its face, which judgment would of course be payable in such notes.

In Indiana, in Reynolds v. Bank of State, 18 Ind. 467 (published in 1862), the supreme court of Indiana held that, although the charter of the bank provided that it should "not at any time suspend or refuse payment in gold or silver of any of its notes, bills, or obligations," a tender, by the bank, of United States treasury notes in redemption of its own notes or bills, was valid under the legal tender act of congress. But the court rendered this decision in deference to the action of the federal government and contrary to its own opinion, saying that as its decision was that of a vis prius court, which must be reviewed by the federal court, it had better err in acquiescing in than by declaring null the acts of congress. It does not appear from this case that the notes or bills of the bank expressly provided for payment in coin, but the charter of the bank, if construed as a part of the contract, would make the case substantially the same as if a provision for payment in gold or silver was included in the notes and bills themselves.

A promissory note to pay $500 "in gold" is held in Thayer v. Hedges, 23 Ind. 141 (1864), to require a judgment merely for $500 and interest, and not for the value of $500 of gold coin.

The decision in Thayer v. Hedges is followed in Brown v. Welch, 26 Ind. 116 (1866), denying recovery for more than the nominal amount of payment on a contract calling for gold, or, if paid in paper, the amount necessary to purchase gold.

In Iowa a note payable in "United States gold," made before the passage of the legal tender act, was held in Warnibold v. Schlotting, 16 Iowa, 244 (1864), to be merely a promise to pay money, and to be payable in any medium or currency declared by law to be a legal tender.

This case was followed by the same court in Troutman v. Gowing, 16 Iowa, 415 (1864), in a suit for the specific performance of a bond for the conveyance of land.

The law, as construed by the highest court of the state, at the time of the issue of the bonds, enters into and forms a part of the contract between the corporation and the bond holder.

Messrs. J. W. Goodwin and W. F. Cowan, for respondents:

All power that a city has to issue bonds is derived from the legislature, and as the legislature has prescribed only certain things of which the council was to apprise the electors, it is to be presumed that the expression of these things was the exclusion of all others.

Where bonds are made payable elsewhere than at the city treasury, they are not thereby invalidated.

Johnson v. Stark County, 24 Ill. 75; Sherlock v. Winnetka, 68 Ill. 580.

Where a city is authorized to issue bonds bearing a certain rate of interest, and issues bonds at a greater rate, the bonds will be void only as to the excess.

Quincy v. Warfield, 25 Ill. 317, 79 Am. Dec.

In Kentucky a note for a specified number of dollars, made in 1866, which includes the clause "this money is to be paid in gold or silver," is construed in Johnson v. Viokers, 1 Duv. 266 (1864), to have the same effect as if this clause was omitted, and to be enforceable only for the specified number of dollars, without any provision for payment in gold and silver. This decision was rendered without considering the effect upon the case of the legal tender act, and was based on the construction of the contract alone, and it made no reference to the case of Webb v. Moore, 4 T. B. Mon. 493 (1827), or to the early Kentucky statute therein referred to, recognizing the validity of a provision that a note should be payable "in gold or silver."

A note to pay a specified sum in gold is regarded as simply an undertaking to pay that sum in money, and nothing more, in the Kentucky case of Riley v. Sharp, 1 Bush, 348 (1866), and therefore no damages were allowed for failure to pay the debt in gold on account of the difference that had arisen between the values of gold and the legal tender notes.

Thus, it was held in Galliano v. Pierre, 18 La. Ann. 10, 89 Am. Dec. 643 (1866), that a charter-party calling for payment in gold could not be enforced in that particular, but that only the amount specified in lawful money could be recovered. This decision was followed in Olaner v. Blanchard, 18 La. Ann. 616 (1866), in case of a contract to pay francs or "their equivalent in gold currency of the United States."

In Massachusetts, in Wood v. Bullens, 6 Allen, 516 (1863), a promissory note payable in specie is held to be payable in any money which is legal tender, although specie was at a premium when the note was made.

In Tufts v. Plymouth Gold Min. Co., 14 Allen, 407 (1867), it was held that the salary of an agent, expressly made payable in specie, entitled him only to a judgment for the amount due expressed in dollars, and the fact that it was declared to be payable in specie did not alter the amount due.

So in the Michigan case of Buehgeger v. Shultz, 13 Mich. 420 (1865), it was held, Judge Cooley writing 330; Quincy v. Chapman, 25 Ill. 322; Byrne v. Luning Co. 8 Cal. Dec. 189.

An innocent purchaser could not place himself behind this recital in the bond, because if there is a want of power in the municipality this is fatal, and no recital can make up for want of legislative sanction.

Dill Mun. Corp. §§ 549-558.

The words "gold coin" are particular, whereas the words "lawful money of the United States" are general; and the rule is well established that particular expressions govern those which are general.

Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. p. 860; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 268.

A city, given power to issue bonds payable in gold coin, can add to the bond a provision that it should be payable in money of the same weight and fineness as that for which the bond was sold.

Judson v. Bessemer, 4 L. R. A. 742, 87 Ala. 240; University of Alabama Trustees v. Moody, 62 Ala. 389; Moore v. Walla Walla, 60 Fed. Rep. 963.

Per Curiam:

The controversy herein was submitted to the superior court upon an agreed case, under the provisions of section 1138 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The city of Santa Rosa, desiring to construct a system of waterworks, the estimated cost of which is stated at $165,000, proposed to raise that sum by the sale of the bonds of the city, to be issued under the provisions of the Act of 1889 authorizing the incurring of indebtedness for the construction of waterworks and other improvements. Stat. 1889, p. 399, as amended by Stat. 1891, p. 94, and Stat. 1893, p. 61. The several ordinances required by the statute were duly passed and published, the notice of election given, and the election held, at which more than two thirds of the electors voting thereat voted in favor of the issuance of the bonds. Ordinance 148, calling said special election, described the bonds proposed to be issued as serials payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States in the manner following: "One-fortieth part of the whole amount of said indebtedness so incurred, together with annual interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum on all unpaid sums thereof, shall be payable each and every year on a day in each year, and at a place to be fixed by the common council of said city, until the whole amount of said indebtedness shall have been paid." The notice of election contained the foregoing description of the bonds proposed to be issued, and in addition declared as follows: "Each bond shall have attached thereto a separate coupon the opinion, that a contract for "dollars" payable in gold may be discharged by payment of the specified amount in notes which congress has made legal tender.

So in Missouri a note for a certain amount "in gold" was held enforceable only for its face value payable in any lawful money, and a judgment including premium on gold was held invalid. Henderson v. McPike, 35 Mo. 255 (1864).

So a contract to be paid in the "current gold coin of the United States in full tale or count, without regard to any legal tender that may be established or declared by any law of congress," is held not to be enforceable, as the contract plainly regards gold as money, and as such no distinction can be made between gold and legal tender notes. Appel v. Woltmann, 38 Mo. 194 (1860).

So in Nevada the courts at first denied the force of a provision for gold coin in a contract made before the Nevada specific contract act, and denied the right to a judgment for gold coin. Burling v. Goodman, 1 Nev. 314 (1865).

As to the effect of state statutes authorizing judgment for coin when a contract specifically provides for such money, see infra, II., a, 4.

In New Hampshire, in a case of assumpsit for money had and received where gold coin had been pledged as security and afterwards went above par, it was held that the damages must be limited, in that form of action, to the amount of money received, excluding any premium on the gold; and that, even if the action was in the form of trover, only the value at the time of conversion could be allowed as damages. Frothingham v. Morse, 45 N. H. 545 (1864).

In New York, in an action on a foreign judgment which would be payable only in gold or currency equal to gold at the place where it was rendered, it was held in Swanson v. Cooke, 30 How. Pr. 385 (1866), that premium on gold could not be included; and, as the parties agreed that a pound sterling was equal to $4.84, the judgment was rendered on that basis without allowing any premium on gold.

freight "in silver or gold dollars," if discharged in the United States, is held in Wilson v. Morgan, 30 How. Pr. 386, 4 Robt. 58, 1 Abb. N. S. 174 (1866), to be satisfied by tender of the freight in United States notes, where the contract was made after the passage of the legal tender act.

In Murray v. Gale, 5 Abb. Pr. N. S. 236, 52 Barb. 427 (1868), affirming Murray v. Harrison, 47 Barb. 424, 33 How. Pr. 90 (1867), it was held that the words "in specie, gold, and silver coin," in an obligation for the payment of a certain number of dollars, did not affect the right to discharge the contract by paying the stipulated amount in legal tender notes.

In Jones v. Smith, 43 Barb. 552 (1867), it was held to follow inevitably, from the legal tender act as interpreted by Rodes v. Bronson, 34 N. Y. 649 (1866), that a bill of exchange payable "in specie or its equivalent" could be paid in legal tender notes called greenbacks.

In Pennsylvania an express contract to pay "specie, current gold and silver money of the United States," was held to be within the operation of the legal tender act, in Shoenberger v. Watts, 5 Phila. 51 (1862).

So ground rent payable in "dollars, lawful silver money of the United States, each dollar weighing 16 pennyweights, 6 grains, at least," is held redeemable in legal tender notes. Mervine v. Sailor, 52 Pa. 9 (1866).

The same is held in case of ground rent payable in "dollars, lawful money of the United States of America," in Shollenberger v. Brinton, 52 Pa. 9 (1866).

Likewise as to ground rent payable in "lawful money." Davis v. Burton, 52 Pa. 9 (1866).

So where the provision was for ground rent payable in "lawful money of the United States." Kroener v. Colhoun, 52 Pa. 9 (1866).

The same doctrine is held in case of a certificate of deposit of "gold payable . . . in like funds, with interest." Sandford v. Hays, 52 Pa. 9 (1866).

A note for a sum of money with the amount marked "specie" on the margin, which by bank-for the interest for every year that such bond has to run, and each of said coupons shall be made therein payable, and shall be payable, at the office of the city treasurer of said city of Santa Rosa, on the first Monday of December of the year for the interest whereof it is given. Each of said bonds shall therein be made payable, and shall be payable, at the office of the city treasurer in the city of Santa Rosa on the first Monday in December of each year." The notice of election also stated the precise amount of the annual tax to be levied to pay the annual interest, and the series of bonds falling due each year, thus: "First year, $10,725; second year, $10,560;" and so on down to the "fortieth year, $4,390,—the aggregate tax levy for the forty years being $300,800." On June 6, 1893, after the result of the election was ascertained, the city council adopted ordinance No. 149, which recited all the previous proceedings and prescribed the form of the bonds, in exact conformity to all the particulars stated in the notice of election. The agreed statement then recites the steps taken to sell said bonds, and adds: "That neither said legislative body, nor said city, nor any of the officers, received any bids for said bonds in answer to the notice so published; that said legislative body used strenuous efforts to sell such bonds, but was unable to find any purchaser therefor." The statement then recites that, in view of the great needs of the city for a system of water-works, the city council, on November 17, 1894, passed ordinance No. 156 rescinding ordinance 149, and changing the form of the bonds so as to make them payable at the Chemical National Bank in the city of New York "in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard of weight and fineness," with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, "payable semi-annually in like gold coin." The bonds in this new form were executed, and on December 1, 1894, Robert Effey (a party to this agreed case) bid for said bonds their face value in United States gold coin, and the city council, having accepted his bid, were about to deliver the bonds to him, when W. G. Skinner, describing himself as a taxpayer of said city, served upon the city council and each of the officers of said city a protest against the sale of said bonds to Effey, in which he notified them that he would use every lawful means to resist the collection of any tax levied for their payment, and that he would apply to the court for an injunction to restrain the collection of a tax levied on October 5, 1894, of 25 cents on each $100 to pay the principal and interest due on said bonds for the year 1894 and the interest due June 1, 1895. The city council thereupon passed a resolution ers' rules meant silver or gold coin, was held in Graham v. Marshall, 52 Pa. 9 (1866), to be payable in legal tender notes, and the same decision was made in respect to a note for dollars "in gold," in Laughlin v. Harvey, 52 Pa. 9 (1866).

In Texas a note for "$300 in gold" was held, in Shaw v. Trunler, 30 Tex. 390 (1897), to be dischargeable by the payment of legal tender notes, on the grounds that congress had made them legal currency, and that judgment on such a note could not be rendered for specie.

In the case of Flournoy v. Healy, 31 Tex. 590 (1899), where the contract provided for payment of $500 in specie, or $894 in United States currency, it was held that the word "specie," in a judgment for a certain number of dollars in specie, was surplusage, but nevertheless an error which might be struck out on appeal.

b. Supporting such contracts.

But some decisions of the state courts sustained these specific agreements to pay in coin before the Supreme Court of the United States decided to that effect.

Thus in Georgia a promise to pay a certain number of dollars "in American gold coin" is held, in Myers v. Kaufman, 37 Ga. 600, 95 Am. Dec. 387 (1888), to be enforceable, and not to be discharged by tender of the nominal value in depreciated legal tender notes. In the case of Taylor v. Green, passed upon at the same time and by the same opinion, a contract to pay "in gold" is likewise sustained.

In several states distinctions were made which have since become unimportant.

In the decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts in Essex Co. v. Pacific Mills, 14 Allen, 389 (1867), it was also held that a contract to deliver a certain number of ounces of silver of a certain fineness in payment of rent, or its equivalent in gold, was a contract for the delivery of a commodity the breach of which required a judgment for the market value thereof payable in United States notes.

A loan of $10,000 in gold, on an agreement to repay in gold, was held in Bank of Commonwealth 29 L. R. A.

v. Van Vleck, 40 Barb. 506 (1897), to be valid and subject to discharge only by payment in gold, and the legal tender act of congress is held to be inapplicable to such a contract. This case is distinguished from the decision by the court of appeals in Rodes v. Bronson, 34 N. Y. 649 (1866), on the ground that in the latter the obligation was to pay "in lawful money," and that the words "in gold and silver coin" were surplusage, while in the present case the agreement was not to pay an ordinary debt, but to return articles of the same kind that were received.

Upon a bill of exchange drawn in Prince Edward's Island, "payable in United States gold coin," the holder is held, in Bank of Prince Edward's Island v. Trumbull, 53 Barb. 459, 36 How. Pr. 8, 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 82 (1866), to be entitled, in case of nonpayment, to an amount equal to the value of the gold in legal tender notes at the time of the trial.

A bond for payment "in gold coin of the United States" of a particular "fineness, notwithstanding any law which now may or hereafter shall make anything else a tender in payment of debts," was held in Dutton v. Pailaret, 52 Pa. 103, 91 Am. Dec. 136 (1866), to be enforceable according to its terms, and judgment rendered thereon for the value of the gold in currency. The court said: "When parties stipulate for specific chattels, and expressly exclude the legal tenders which government has prescribed, the bargain must be presumed to rest upon an adequate consideration, and neither legislative nor judicial power can pluck the fruits that belong to one of the parties for the mere purpose of giving them to the other." The court distinguished this case from Graham v. Marshall, 52 Pa. 9 (1866), on the ground that there the ordinary legal tenders of the country were stipulated for.

Ground rent payable in "21 Spanish coined time silver pieces of 84 part of a piece of 8, each piece weighing 17 pennyweights and 6 grains, or so much lawful money of the said province of Pennsylvania as shall be sufficient to purchase or procure" the specified coin, is held, in Mather v. Kinike, 51 Pa.

directing the city attorney to take immediate steps to unite with such officers and persons as were interested in submitting an agreed case, "so as to obtain as soon as possible the judicial determination of said question, case, and controversy in and by the supreme court of this state."

The foregoing outline of the statement, as originally prepared, contains all of it that is material. It closed with the statement that "the foregoing is a full, true, and correct statement and case, containing all the facts upon which the controversy depends," and signed by counsel for the respective parties, and followed by the affidavit of Skinner to the effect that the controversy is real, and the proceedings in good faith.

The contention on Skinner's part, as appears in the agreed case, is: (1) That the city council have no power to issue the bonds in the form prescribed by ordinance 156. (2) That the city council had no power to levy the tax of 25 cents per $100 on October 5, 1894, the bonds then authorized under ordinance 149 not having been sold. (3) That ordinance 153, authorizing the city marshal to collect delinquent taxes by sale of the property, is invalid because in conflict with the city charter which makes it the duty of the city attorney to collect them by suit, the marshal having advertised his property for sale on December 17. Certain amendments were afterwards made to the statement, viz.: That the said tax levy of 25 cents, together with other city taxes levied for the current year, do not exceed 1 per cent of the assessed valuation, and are less than the limit fixed by law; that Skinner had tendered all other taxes; that there had been a sufficient amount of said 25-cent tax voluntarily paid into the city treasury to meet the semiannual interest accruing prior to the next annual tax levy; and "that at the time of the levy of said 25-cent tax an offer to purchase for the face value thereof, in United States gold coin, said bonds to be issued under ordinance No. 149, had been presented to said common council, which offer was thereafter withdrawn." Judgment was rendered that bonds issued under ordinance 156 would be valid, and also affirming the validity of said 25-cent tax, and from this judgment said Skinner appeals.

The question, "Are the bonds which the city council intended to issue valid in the form proposed?"—must be answered in the negative.

No question is made as to the regularity of the proceedings up to and including ordinance No. 149, nor that bonds issued under that ordinance and in the form therein prescribed would have been valid, but the bonds proposed to be issued under ordinance 156 do 425 (1886), to be a specific article called for by the covenant, and not to be payable in currency.

Ground rent, payable in "Spanish milled silver dollars which weigh 17 pennyweights and 6 grains at least," was held not legally represented by United States legal tender notes, but to be payable only in coin according to the contract. Christ Church Hospital v. Fuechsel, 54 Pa. 71 (1867). The court distinguished this case from that of Mervine v. Sallor and others, decided by the same court, in which the rent agreed upon, although specified as gold or silver, was further described as "lawful money," but this distinction was subsequently abandoned by the court, which was constrained by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States to sustain the stipulation in either form when coin was agreed upon. See also, as to effect of state statutes, infra, II. a, 4.

The supreme court of Nova Scotia also sustained such contracts, and held that on a lease of property in the British dominions, payable in "dollars and cents of United States currency," made before the passage of the legal tender act, payment could be made only in coin. Nova Scotia Teleg. Co. v. American Teleg. Co. 4 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 365 (1865).

3. In equity cases.

The power of equity to give effect to a specific provision for payment in coin, when this was not enforceable at law, was a question on which the courts were not agreed.

The power of equity to give effect to a specific provision in a contract for payment in gold is denied in Humphrey v. Clement, 44 Ill. 299 (1867), following Whetstone v. Colley, 36 Ill. 323 (1865) on the general doctrine that specific agreements for payment in gold are not valid.

In Howe v. Nickerson, 14 Allen, 400 (1867), it was held that a bill in equity would not lie to enforce specific performance of an award to pay a certain number of dollars in gold.

But, on the other hand, it was held in Kentucky that in an equity suit for specific enforcement of a contract, made in 1863, to pay the price of land in gold, where the difference between gold and legal tender notes was taken into account in fixing the price, the provision would be sustained. Hort v. Miller, 2 Duv. 103 (1865). The court allowed the debtor time to make the payment in gold with a warning that on default thereof the value of the gold would be estimated in paper currency and the amount adjudged against him enforced by sale of the land.

4. Effect of state statutes.

A specific contract law, providing that judgments may be made payable in coin in actions on contracts which specifically call for such money, is sustained by the supreme court of Nevada, and declared not to be repugnant to the legal tender act of congress, in Linn v. Minor, 4 Nev. 462 (1864). This case overrules several prior cases to the contrary, which were Milliken v. Sloat, 1 Nev. 573 (1861); Mitchell v. Bromberger, Id. 604; Fox v. Barnstow, Id. 612.

Such a statute in California has been the subject of numerous decisions. That it does not conflict with the legal tender act of congress was decided in Carpenter v. Atherton, 26 Cal. 564 (1864), and its validity is assumed by the later cases.

That such a contract relates to actions or proceedings on the contract itself, and not to an order in supplementary proceedings for repayment by a borrower of gold from funds in court, is decided in Hathaway v. Brady, 26 Cal. 581 (1864), because this proceeding is not "an action" within the meaning of the statute.

That a specific contract act applies to contracts made before its passage, is decided in Otis v. Hestline, 37 Cal. 80 (1864); Galland v. Lewis, 26 Cal. 6 (1864).

A tender of legal tender notes at par was held insufficient to discharge a note payable in coin, in the case of Vilhac v. Biven, 28 Cal. 410 (1865).

A purchaser of goods under an oral contract to pay for them in gold is enforceable under the California statute, where after the liability accrued and suit was commenced, a written contract was not conform to the ordinance calling the election, nor to important particulars specified in the notice of election, and in one of these particulars they do not conform to the statute under which it is proposed to issue them.

The ordinance calling an election and the notice of election each provided that the bonds to be issued, if the qualified voters should authorize their issue, should bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, and the principal and interest should be payable "in gold coin or lawful money of the United States," and the notice of election specified, in addition, that the bonds, as well as the interest, should be payable at the city treasury. The statute under which said bonds were proposed to be issued is the Act approved March 19, 1889 (Stat. 1889, p. 399), and the amendments thereof hereafter noticed. By section 2 of said Act, as amended in 1891 (Stat. 1891, p. 94), it is provided, among other things, as follows: "The ordinance calling such special election shall recite the objects and purposes for which the indebtedness is proposed to be incurred, the estimated cost of the proposed public improvement, and that the bonds of the municipality shall issue for the payment of the cost of such improvement, as in such ordinance set forth, if the proposition be accepted by the qualified voters as hereinafter provided." Section 3 of said Act (Stat. 1889, p. 400) provides for the publication of said ordinance calling such election, and that after such publication there shall be published, not less than two weeks, "a notice of such special election, the purpose for which the indebtedness is to be incurred, the number and character of the bonds to be issued, the rate of interest to be paid, and the amount of the tax levy to be made for the payment thereof." By section 6 of said Act, as amended March 1, 1893 (Stat. 1893, p. 61), it is provided, among other things, that such bonds "shall be payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States." Section 7 (Stat. 1889, p. 401) provides: "The legislative branch of any city, town, or municipal corporation issuing bonds under the authority of this act shall have the right to determine the rate of interest such bonds shall bear; provided, that in no case shall it exceed 7 per cent per annum, and to name the date and place where such bonds and interest shall be paid; provided, that the place of payment shall be either at the office of the treasurer of the municipality, or at some designated bank in San Francisco, Chicago, New York, or Boston."

From this review of the statute it will be seen that the rate of interest the bonds shall bear, and the amount of the tax levy to be made to pay the gold. Meyer v. Kohn, 30 Cal. 378 (1885).

In an action on a judgment rendered prior to the specific contract act, judgment cannot be entered for gold coin. Reed v. Eldredge, 37 Cal. 346 (1885).

But where the complaint in an action on a judgment alleges that such judgment was rendered payable in coin, the new judgment thereon may be for coin. Wallace v. Eldredge, 37 Cal. 498 (1885).

As to action on judgment, see also supra, Swanson v. Cooke, 30 How. Pr. 385 (1886).

As to pleading under such statute, see note to Belford v. Woodward (Ill.) post, —.

b. Doctrine of Bronson v. Rodas and later cases

1. Federal cases.

The case of Bronson v. Rodas, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 229, 19 L. ed. 141 (1869), has already been referred to as the leading case on the subject. It established the doctrine that express provisions for payment in gold or silver were valid, and enforceable as if they were for payment in wheat or any other valuable thing.

The case of Butler v. Horwitz, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 238, 19 L. ed. 149 (1869), applied the doctrine of Bronson v. Rodas to a contract made in 1791 for rent payable in English golden guineas weighing 5 pennyweights and 6 grains at 35 shillings each, and other gold and silver at the present weights, and rates established by act of assembly. The court regarded the contract as obviously intended to require payment of the rent in gold and silver for the purpose of avoiding fluctuations to which currency was subject.

Chief Justice Chase said, in Butler v. Horwitz, supra: "A contract to pay a certain sum in gold and silver coin is, in substance and legal effect, a contract to deliver a certain weight of gold and silver of a certain fineness, to be ascertained by count." The chief justice also said: "It was not necessary in the case of Bronson v. Rodas, nor is it necessary now, to decide the question, whether the acts making United States notes legal tender are warranted by the constitution. We express no opinion on that point."

The case of Bronson v. Kimpton, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 444, 19 L. ed. 438 (1869), followed Bronson v. Rodas and Butler v. Horwitz, and held that a mortgage to secure a bond for the payment of a certain sum in gold and silver coin was not satisfied by a tender of United States notes equal in nominal amount to the sum due on the bond and mortgage.

On a contract to pay yearly rent of 4 ounces, 3 pennyweights, and 13 grains of pure gold in coined money, judgment should be entered for coined dollars and parts of dollars, instead of treasury notes equivalent in market value to the value in coined money of the stipulated weight of pure gold. Dewing v. Sears, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 379, 20 L. ed. 139 (1871), reversing the decision of the Massachusetts supreme court in Sears v. Dewing, 14 Allen, 413 (1867), which held that the gold should be delivered by the lessee as a commodity, and that in default thereof judgment should be rendered for the market value thereof, estimated in United States treasury notes.

Freight money for transportation from Whampoa to New York, fixed at 168 pounds, 4 shillings, 4 pence sterling, was held to be payable in United States gold and silver dollars of equal value. Forbes v. Murray, 3 Ben. 498 (1869).

The validity of a note payable in coin was also sustained in Re Elder, 1 Sawyer, 81, 3 Nat. Bankr. Rex. 678 (1870), in a case of bankruptcy, where it was held that it was properly proved against the bankrupt's estate according to its terms, although a new note for its equivalent in currency would not be invalid.

A note and mortgage calling for pounds sterling of Great Britain was held, in Re Surplus and Remnants of The Edith, 5 Ben. 446 (1871), to be payable only in coin.

An award by the attorney-general under act of congress, "payable in gold," was held in Tyers v. United States, 5 Ct. Cl. 509 (1869), to be payable in coin instead of currency. And where the claimant accepted depreciated currency under protest, declaring that he would take it only at its value in made for the payment thereof, are expressly required to be stated in the "notice of election," while the place of payment and the kind of money in which they are to be paid are not. The ordinance calling the election and the notice of election fixed the rate of interest at 4 per cent, payable annually, while ordinance 156, under which the bonds in controversy are proposed to be issued, fixes the rate at 4 per cent, payable semiannually. It is contended by respondents, if we correctly understand them, that as section 7 of the Act above cited leaves the determination of the rate of interest to the common council, and as by section 6 it is provided that interest may be payable annually or semiannually, making the interest payable semiannually instead of annually is a "mere matter of detail, to be arranged between the buyer and the city, and, being confided to the discretion of the council, it was not within their domain to limit or circumscribe that discretion in any way, but that it was their duty to use their best judgment when they were called upon to act." That the payment of interest semiannually increases the rate is obvious. If it did not, purchasers would not be likely to insist upon it. It therefore becomes part of the rate, and, while the council are authorized to fix the rate, the rate of interest, as well as the main question of incurring the indebtedness for the purposes specified, is required to be submitted to the voters. The maximum rate authorized by the statute is the legal rate of interest allowed in this state, which is now 7 per cent. Putting an extreme case, it will not be contended that if the proposition submitted to the voters at such election specified the rate to be paid at 2 per cent, the common council might, in their discretion, issue bonds bearing 7 per cent. But if the common council can depart at all from the rate of interest submitted to the voters, no limit, save the rate fixed by the statute, can define their power. Counsel for respondent cite the case of Yosler v. Seattle, 1 Wash. 308, and quote four or five pages therefrom. In that case the ordinance of submission fixed the rate of interest at 5 per cent. So far as the rate of interest is concerned, that case is not in point, inasmuch as the statute there did not require the rate to be stated in the ordinance of submission or notice of election. In that case, however, other particulars not required to be stated in the ordinance of submission were specified, and some of them were conditions not named in the statute. As to these particulars, which were not required to be submitted to the voters, the case supports respondent's contention, and is in point so far as the place of payment is concerned. The gold, and was permitted to take it without his agreement to accept in full, it was held not to preclude his claim for the balance.

But accepting other legal tender notes in lieu of gold on redemption of such notes, though under protest, where there was no deception, mistake, or undue advantage, was held in Savage v. United States, 92 U. S. 832, 23 L. ed. 600 (1876), to be a waiver of any right to payment in gold on the redemption.

By peculiar mistake the authors of some textbooks of the law have asserted that the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, sustaining and enforcing contracts for payment in specie or in coin, were overruled by the Legal Tender Cases, so called. This statement has been accepted and repeated by other persons. But it is utterly unjustifiable. The Legal Tender Case—Knox v. Lee, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 457, 20 L. ed. 287 (1871)—which overruled Hepburn v. Griswold, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 603, 19 L. ed. 518 (1870), deciding that the legal tender notes constituted lawful tender or payment in case of contract made before the passage of that statute as well as later contracts, did not so much as imply a doubt of the correctness of the previous decisions sustaining the validity of express contracts to pay in coin or specie. On the contrary, in a dissenting opinion Mr. Justice Clifford cites Butler v. Horwitz, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 258, 19 L. ed. 149 (1869), as deciding that, when the intent of the parties as to the medium of payment is clearly expressed in a contract, damages for the breach of it, whether made before or since the enactment of this law, may be properly assessed so as to give effect to that intent; and he adds: "No doubt is entertained that that rule is correct."

Not only was there an entire absence, in the opinions of the justices in the so-called Legal Tender Cases, of any intent to overrule Bronson v. Rodas, but that case was expressly followed and its doctrine reiterated after the legal tender act in Knox v. Lee, supra, was held constitutional as to ordinary contracts made before its passage.

Thus, in the year following, the case of Trebil-

cock v. Wilson, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 687, 20 L. ed. 460 (1872), was decided, again sustaining the validity of a contract to pay "in specie," requiring it to be paid in gold or silver coin, and expressly declaring that the act of congress "was not intended to interfere in any respect with existing or subsequent contracts payable by their express terms in specie."

In the latest of the legal tender cases, Juillard v. Greenman, 110 U. S. 421, 28 L. ed. 204 (1884), in which it was decided that congress has constitutional power to make the treasury notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of private debts in time of peace as well as in time of war, the opinion of the court clearly implies that the statute does not apply where there is an express stipulation for payment in a particular kind of money. The summing up of the doctrine in the opinion is as follows: "A contract to pay a certain sum in money, without any stipulation as to the kind of money in which it shall be paid, may always be satisfied by payment of that sum in any currency which is lawful money at the place and time at which payment is to be made."

The truth is, every case decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, or in fact by any federal court, has recognized the validity of such contracts.

That a person, who has expressly undertaken to discharge his obligation by payment in gold or silver, will be held to his contract as specifically made, is also recognized to be the law in Maryland v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 80 U. S. 22 Wall. 106, 22 L. ed. 713 (1874), but that case turned on the fact that there was no express undertaking to pay in coin, and that none could be implied, since the implication was not apparent upon the face of the contract.

2. State decisions generally.

Even after the decisions in Bronson v. Rodas, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 229, 19 L. ed. 141 (1869); Butler v. Horwitz, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 258, 19 L. ed. 149 (1869); and Trebilcock v. Wilson, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 687, 20 L. ed. 460, (1872), but without mention of them, a promisor argument upon which that decision rests is that the legislature delegated to the common council, the municipal legislature, with the assent of its constituents, the power to contract the indebtedness, "it being the sole judge of the proper method, whether by bonds or warrants or open account, confidence being reposed in the wisdom and honor of its members that they will act for the best interest of the community. Nor does the law permit the council of a city to delegate to the popular vote the determination of any matter before it, unless the right to so delegate it has been expressly conferred or enjoined by statute. . . . Therefore we conclude that the council could lawfully submit to vote only those matters directed to be submitted by its superior authority,—the legislature." We cannot assent to the conclusion reached by the learned justice who wrote the opinion, nor to the argument by which it is reached. The opinion concedes that under the constitution and laws of the state no indebtedness can be incurred beyond a certain limit, without authority expressed at an election duly held for that purpose; so that the real question to be determined is, Has that assent been given? It is quite true that in that case, as in this, particulars were inserted in the submission which the statute did not require to be submitted; but these particulars having been submitted, the vote authorizing the indebtedness to be incurred imports the particulars named as the conditions upon which that assent has been given, and hence no one can say that, without these favorable conditions, the result of the election would have authorized the indebtedness to be incurred. The rate of interest, the place of payment, the kind of money in which payment must be made, would influence any business man in determining whether he should incur a personal debt, and must do so when he is called upon as a voter to determine whether he will favor his municipality's incurring a debt, for the payment of which, in common with others, his property is liable to taxation. He might readily consent, upon very favorable terms being offered or proposed, and strenuously oppose it if the terms were unfavorable or were uncertain. If the terms and conditions submitted to the electors may be departed from, and such election held to authorize the issuance of bonds under other terms and conditions, a door will be opened authorizing the common council to submit a proposition so favorable as to secure beyond question a favorable vote, and then change the conditions as to rate of interest and otherwise, even without any fraudulent purpose or intent, so that, if again submitted, an overwhelming defeat would result.

note made in 1866 payable "in gold" was given effect in the case of Munter v. Rogers, 50 Ala. 288 (1878), only as an obligation for the specified number of dollars in lawful money. This case follows the legal tender cases, Knox v. Lee, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 457, 30 L. ed. 237 (1871), and Norwich & W. R. Co. v. Johnson, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 195, 21 L. ed. 178 (1873), which decide only the question of the constitutionality of the legal tender act as to prior contracts in general, and do not touch the question of specific agreements to pay coin. It is quite plainly based on an inadvertent error of the court.

In Reinback v. Crabtree, 77 Ill. 182 (1875), it is said: "Neither the Supreme Court of the United States, nor this court, recognizes two legal standards of value. A dollar is a dollar, whether payable in gold or in national currency; and 10 per cent interest payable in gold may be lawfully paid, dollar for dollar, in any currency which the general government has declared to be a legal tender in the payment of debts." But this statement is made by way of recital, and the question was not before the court for decision.

All other decisions by state courts since the cases of Bronson v. Rodes, Butler v. Horwitz, and Trebilcock v. Wilson, supra, have recognized the doctrine of those cases, and sustained contracts for payment in coin when such cases were presented to them.

A contract to pay a certain number of dollars in gold is sustained as lawful and enforceable, in Hittson v. Davenport, 4 Colo. 169 (1878).

A note for a certain number of dollars, with a provision that at maturity it shall be paid in currency equivalent in value to the specified amount of currency at the date of the note, is sustained in Whitaker v. Dye, 56 Ga. 380 (1876). The court says, in dealing with it, the value of gold was involved to find out how much currency was due, but for that purpose only.

The case of McGoon v. Shirk, 54 Ill. 408, 5 Am. Rep. 122 (1870), decides that a promissory note payable in terms in American gold cannot be discharged by a tender of United States treasury notes, although the contract was made after the passage of the legal tender act. This decision is based on those in Bronson v. Rodes and Butler v. Horwitz, and declares that these overrule Hull v. Kohlsaat, 36 Ill. 130 (1864), Whetstone v. Colley, 38 Ill. 328 (1865), and Humphrey v. Clement, 44 Ill. 299 (1867), in which cases the supreme court of Illinois had decided that express provisions for payment in gold would not avail to prevent the discharge of the contract by a tender in legal tender notes.

That debts payable specifically in coin are not affected by the legal tender act was also expressly decided in Churchman v. Martin, 54 Ind. 350 (1870).

In Proctor v. Heaton, 114 Ind. 250 (1887), a deduction from the amount of a note was claimed, because, on a judgment of 1865 that a renewal note be made payable in gold coin, a new note in settlement of the dispute was made for "two and a half times the debt," but the decision of the court was chiefly based on the fact of long acquiescence in this settlement.

On foreclosure of a mortgage for $4,000 "in gold coin, or its equivalent value in current money," where the mortgagee sought to have money that had been paid into the custody of the clerk of the court applied on his mortgage debt as an allowance for improvements, and it did not appear in what kind of money it was paid to the clerk, it was held that this money would satisfy an equal number of dollars of the mortgage debt, but that the balance must be paid in gold coin. Stark v. Coffin, 105 Mass. 328 (1870).

That an express agreement to allow gold payments to be applied with 20 per cent premium is valid, was held in Wright v. Jacobs, 61 Mo. 19 (1876).

A draft for a certain number of gold dollars, drawn in Canada on a bank in New York, was held in Chrysler v. Renois, 43 N. Y. 209 (1870), to be negotiable, and the payment thereof enforceable according to its terms.

A contract to deliver "$10,000 current funds of the United States at 15 cents on the dollar, to be delivered in ten months from this date," is construed in Cooke v. Davis, 53 N. Y. 320 (1873), to be a con-

The logical inference from the case above cited is, however, that, as to all matters required to be submitted, such submission measures the authority of the common council. The case of Moore v. Walla Walla, 60 Fed. Rep. 961, so far as the above questions are concerned, follows the decisions of the state court, which are of binding force in the federal court, and is therefore not an independent authority, and lends no weight to Yesler v. Seattle, supra, which it cites. What has been said applies as well to the place of payment and the exact statement of the amount to be levied each year of the forty years, as to the interest, so far as its influence upon the vote is concerned.

Upon the question as to the change made in the kind of money in which the bonds and the interest thereon are to be paid, it should be observed that, prior to the amendment of March 1, 1893 (Stat. 1893, p. 61), the statute was silent as to the kind of money in which payment should be made, but that amendment requires that the bonds and interest "shall be payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States." Several cases are cited by counsel for respondents to the effect that a grant of power to a municipal corporation to issue bonds, without limitation as to the kind of money in which they shall be payable, confers authority to make them payable "in gold coin of the United States, of the present standard weight and fineness." Judson v. Bessemer, 87 Ala. 240, 4 L. R. A. 742; University of Alabama Trustees v. Moody, 62 Ala. 389; Moore v. Walla Walla, 60 Fed. Rep. 961. Prior to the amendment of 1893, above stated, the power to make the bonds payable "in gold coin of the present standard of weight and fineness," or in any other kind of coin or currency, could not be controverted. There was no restriction. The power to determine that question was as ample as that of a natural person to stipulate in what his personal obligation should be paid. The amendment must therefore have been intended to restrict that power, and this was done by expressly stating the kind of money in which alone they "shall be" made payable. Whether the increased value of the bonds caused by the stipulation that they shall be paid in gold coin of the present standard of weight and fineness would equal or exceed any probable appreciation of gold, cannot control the express provision of the statute in that regard.

But it is contended that if the act gave the council no power to make the bonds payable in gold coin of the present weight and fineness, the premium on silver coin in addition to the nominal amount of the debt was held invalid on the ground that a part of the debt was not payable in specie, and it was said that the exact amount of the part that was due in specie could not be ascertained from the record. Townsend v. Jennison, 44 Vt. 315 (1872).

Payments in currency on a contract specifically calling for payment in gold, if this provision is not waived, are to be computed at the value of such currency estimated in gold at the date of payment. Hittson v. Davenport, 4 Colo. 169 (1873); Walkup v. Houston, 65 N. C. 501 (1871).

A covenant, in a lease, to pay a yearly rent of 6 pence sterling for every acre of land "in current money of the state of New York equal in value to money of Great Britain," is held in Stranaghan v. Youmans, 65 Barb. 382 (1872), to be a contract for payment in coined money of the United States, and if payment is made in legal tender notes enough of them must be paid to equal in value the stipulated amount of coin.

Also among the cases which have followed the doctrine of Bronson v. Rodas, and recognize the validity of express contracts to pay obligations in coin, although in some of them the questions have been chiefly as to the form of judgment or procedure, are the following: Sheehy v. Chalmers (Cal.) 36 Pac. Rep. 514 (1894); Watson v. San Francisco & H. B. R. Co. 50 Cal. 523 (1875); Warren v. Franklin Ins. Co. 104 Mass. 521 (1870); Foster v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 1 Mo. App. 390 (1876); Smith v. Peabody (N. Y. Super. Ct.) (1870), cited in Ransford v. Marvin, 3 Abb. Pr. N. S. 432 (1870),—on the same question; Lillie v. Sherman, 39 How. Pr. 237 (1870); McCalla v. Ely, 64 Pa. 264 (1870); Calhoun v. Pace, 37 Tex. 454 (1872); Smith v. Wood, 37 Tex. 616 (1872). These cases are not more particularly set out in this note, but are further considered in a note to Belford v. Woodward (Ill.) post, —, on the subject of judgments and procedure in cases of this sort.

A promissory note "to be paid in gold or silver" is held, in Phillips v. Dugan, 21 Ohio St. 468, 8 Am. Rep. 68 (1871), to be enforceable according to its terms.

The validity of such contracts is sustained in Walkup v. Houston, 65 N. C. 501 (1871), in case of a note payable in specie.

Ground rent payable in "gold or silver money of the United States" is held in Rankin v. Demott, 61 Pa. 263 (1869), following Bronson v. Rodas and Butler v. Horwitz, to be payable only in coin or its equivalent. The court remarks that the distinction taken in prior cases between contracts for a specific article and for lawful money is now unimportant.

But when a bond for a certain amount in "lawful silver money of the United States" was secured by a recorded mortgage reciting that it was payable "in lawful money," it was held insufficient to make the mortgage a lien for anything but payment in lawful money. Eagle Beneficial Soc's App. 75 Pa. 226 (1874).

On notes payable in specie without any specification of the kind of specie, a judgment including the validity of such contracts is also assumed in a decision that an agreement by one employing another to procure a loan, to give notes and mortgage "in your usual form," does not make a provision of the latter's customary form for payment in gold a part of the contract, so as to exclude evidence that the employer had previously by like application procured loans upon notes and mortgages without such provision, as the expression as to form does not bind him to make payment upon unusual terms and conditions printed in such forms. Peabody v. Dewey, 37 L. R. A. 322, 158 Ill. 657 (1894).

ness, that clause would be void, and that in such case it would be the duty of the treasurer in paying the bonds to pay them in the kind of money required by the statute, and cites the case of Bayfield v. Jordan, 119 U. S. 680, 30 L. ed. 528. That case, however, related to the place of payment. The court said: "The objection that the bonds are illegally made payable at a bank in Chicago does not invalidate them. The agreement to pay at that place is void, but the balance of the coupons and bonds are not rendered invalid for that reason. In paying the interest, the treasurer should not obey that agreement in the bond, but pay it at the village treasury." But this does not, nor do any of the cases cited by counsel, meet the question here presented as it is presented. The question in that case, as in the cases cited from the supreme court of Illinois, arose between holders of municipal bonds and the municipality that had issued them and received the value of them. Two of these cases related to the place of payment, and two involved bonds purporting to bear a rate of interest greater than that authorized by the statute, and in these cases it was held that the holder could recover the authorized rate, and no more. The question whether the bonds, if issued, would be void in the hands of a holder for value, is not the test or measure of the right of a taxpayer of the city to enjoin the issue of them. It may well be that the purchaser is bound to know whether the rate of interest specified in the bond is within the limit fixed by the statute; but the rate being within the statutory limit, it does not follow that he may not rely upon the recitals in the bond as to the regularity of the proceedings by the municipality in fixing the rate specified, or that such recitals will not, in favor of the bondholder for value, bind the corporation. The distinction between the question now under consideration and that which would arise in an action by a bona fide holder of one of these bonds is noticed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the leading case of Knox County Comrs. v. Aspinwall, 62 U. S. 21 How. 539, 16 L. ed. 208, where, after quoting the recitals of the bond showing that it was issued by authority, it was said: "The purchaser was not bound to look further for evidence of a compliance with the conditions to the grant of the power;" and afterwards further said: "We do not say that the decision of the board would be conclusive in a direct proceeding to inquire into the facts previously to the execution of the power, and before the rights and interests of third parties had attached; but, after the au-

A South Dakota statute to the effect that it shall be unlawful to require payment in any certain kind of money (S. Dak. Laws 1891, chap. 85) is recited in Jones on Mortgages, §90; but this does not seem to have been passed upon in any adjudicated case.

3. Alternative provisions; coin or equivalent.

Some lack of agreement appears as to the effect of a provision for payment in coin, when there is added a provision for "its equivalent," or some provision as to the damages in case of default in the payment agreed. But the logic of the decisions sustaining agreements for payment in gold or silver requires that the effect intended by the parties should be given also to these alternative provisions, and such is the decision in nearly all the cases. Yet there are two decisions to the contrary.

On a contract made before the California specific contract act to pay gold "or the equivalent of such gold coin if paid in legal currency," it was held in Reese v. Stearns, 29 Cal. 273 (1885), that it was not enforceable in gold, but was a contract to pay a given number of dollars in any kind of lawful money.

So, on a note payable in gold coin or the equivalent thereof in legal tender notes, it was held in Killough v. Alford, 32 Tex. 457, 5 Am. Rep. 249 (1870), to require payment only in lawful money, as the legal tender notes are by law the equivalent of the gold. The court cited Bronson v. Rodas, but considered that it was not in conflict with that decision.

But, on the contrary, a note for "gold coin or its equivalent in United States legal tender notes" was held to be valid according to its terms, in Wells, F. & Co. v. Van Sickle, 6 Nev. 45 (1870), disapproving Reese v. Stearns, 29 Cal. 273 (1885). The court in this case declared that no specific contract act was necessary to give effect to such a contract.

So a note payable "in gold, or its equivalent in the currency of the country" is held to be valid and enforceable, in Mitchell v. Henderson, 63 N. C. 643 (1869).

Stearns, supra, held that a note promising to pay a certain sum in gold coin of the standard value of 1860, and in default thereof to pay as damages such further amount as may be equal to the difference in value in the San Francisco market between such gold coin and paper money, is within the California Specific Contract Act of 1863, and enforceable according to its terms. Lane v. Gluckauf, 28 Cal. 288, 87 Am. Dec. 124 (1865).

Also an agreement in notes secured by mortgage to pay a certain number of dollars in "United States gold and silver coin," and, in case of failure, to pay a further sum or percentage as damages equal to the actual difference in value in the San Francisco market between such coin and United States treasury notes or other legal tender, is sustained in Burnett v. Stearns, 33 Cal. 468 (1897) following Lane v. Gluckauf, holding that such a contract was within the provisions of the California specific contract act. The alternative provision for damages in case of default is held not to defeat the specific agreement to pay in gold.

The right to judgment payable in gold coin on a note specifically providing for payment in such coin is not defeated by an unperformed condition in the note, that, if paid at maturity or before suit thereon, it shall be payable in any lawful money of the United States. Churchman v. Martin, 54 Ind. 380 (1876).

The validity of a contract to pay in gold or its equivalent is also sustained in Atkinson v. Lanier, 69 Ga. 460 (1882), and Bond v. Greenwald, 4 Helsk. 458 (1871), in which cases the question of difficulty was as to the amount of recovery when the relative value of gold and legal tender notes changed between the time when the obligation matured and the time of judgment. On this question, see the note to Belford v. Woodward (Ill.) post, —, as to judgments and procedure in case of liability to pay in coin.

The alteration of a note payable in gold or its equivalent without the knowledge or consent of a surety on the note is held to release the surety, in Church v. Howard, 17 Hun. 5 (1879).

So it was a material alteration to add the words "in gold coin." Wells v. Wilson, 3 Or. 308 (1869).

thority has been executed, the stock subscribed, and the bonds issued, and in the hands of innocent holders, it would be too late, even in a direct proceeding, to call it in question." Knox County Comrs. v. Aspinwall, supra, has been cited and followed in a very large number of cases in that and other courts, and, as applied to the facts of that case, has not been doubted. In a later case, Coloma v. Hayes, 92 U. S. 484, 23 L. ed. 579, the rule was more cautiously stated, thus: "Where legislative authority has been given

4. Municipal and state contracts.

Power to make city bonds payable in gold coin is held, in Judson v. Bessemer, 4 L. R. A. 742, 87 Ala. 240 (1889), to be included in the express and general power to a city to issue negotiable bonds, as this implies power to make them payable in any constitutional legal tender.

Following this case it is held in Farson v. Louisville Sinking Fund Comrs., 16 Ky. L. Rep. 856 (1895), that municipal bonds are not invalid because made payable, both principal and interest, in gold coin of the United States, without any especial provision for it in the act authorizing their issue.

Likewise it is held that under municipal authority to sell negotiable bonds for public improvements, they could be made payable "in gold coin of the present standard weight and fineness." Moore v. Walla Walla, 60 Fed. Rep. 961 (1894). Although a possible advance in the value of gold coin would make the city debt exceed the legal limit, while the city received its income in money of less value.

That city bonds may lawfully provide for interest payable in gold was also decided in Pollard v. Pleasant Hill, 3 Dill. 196 (1874).

But, on the other hand, bonds payable "in gold coin" issued by a levee district in Mississippi under a statute authorizing the issuance of bonds for $1,000,000, were held in Woodruff v. State, 66 Miss. 298 (1889), to be void for want of authority to issue them. It is said that the legislative use of the term "money" must have meant that legal tender which constituted the basis of the general business of the country.

Even if a provision in a contract for a street improvement requiring the work to be paid for in gold coin is not authorized by statute, it will be ineffectual, and therefore will not invalidate the contract in other respects. N. P. Perine Contracting & Paving Co. v. Quackenbush, 104 Cal. 684 (1894). See also the main case of SKINNER v. SANTA ROSA.

State railroad bonds payable on their face in gold and silver were sustained according to their terms, in State v. Hays, 50 Mo. 34, 11 Am. Rep. 402 (1873). It was decided that, although the legislature had directed payment in legal tender notes, they were not sufficient to discharge the obligation. Yet as the state officers had been ordered by the statute to pay in these notes, the court would not issue a mandamus to pay in coin.

Where the governor was authorized to indorse railroad bonds on behalf of the state, which should bear 8 per cent interest, it was held he might lawfully indorse such bonds bearing 8 per cent interest in gold. Young v. Montgomery & E. R. Co. 2 Woods, C. C. 608 (1876).

In a suit to enjoin the issue of municipal bonds "payable in gold or lawful money of the United States at the option of the holder," it was said in Heilbron v. Outhbert (Ga.) 28 S. E. Rep. 206 (1895). "No reason now occurs to us, nor was any stated, why it would be unlawful" to make the proposed bonds thus payable.

III. Implied contracts or obligations imposed by law.

a. In general.

The fact that payment in coin was the only mode of payment recognized by law at the time a contract was made, and therefore the parties doubtless expected payment in coin to be made, is not sufficient to raise an implication that payment in coin is intended, whereby such payment may be enforced after the passage of the legal tender act, if nothing in the language of the contract indicates an intent that payment shall be made in coin. Maryland v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 39 U. S. 23 Wall. 105, 22 L. ed. 718 (1874).

The fact that the consideration of a promissory note was a loan of gold and silver does not make it payable in coin unless expressly stipulated to that effect. Curcio v. Abadie, 25 Cal. 502 (1884).

The words "American gold," following the words "value received" in a promissory note, were held in Hull v. Kohlhaas, 36 Ill. 130 (1864), to be insufficient to show an intent to pay in gold.

In an action for services rendered without any agreement as to the price, the court refused to instruct the jury that they must not take into account the difference in value of currency. Spencer v. Prindle, 28 Cal. 276 (1865).

A policy of a mutual insurance company, providing for payment of losses as well as premiums in gold, does not imply a provision for payment of dividends declared upon such premiums in gold. Luling v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. 51 N. Y. 207 (1872), affirming 50 Barb. 520, 30 How. Pr. 60.

Judgment for duties on imports should be for gold. Sun Cheong-Kee v. United States, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 320, 18 L. ed. 72 (1866).

So a state statute requiring taxes to be paid in gold or silver coin is not affected by the legal tender act, as such taxes are not debts within the meaning of that act. Lane County v. Oregon, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 71, 19 L. ed. 101 (1868).

b. Bailment and conversion of coin.

The right to allowance for the depreciation of gold which was wrongfully withheld by a person holding it as security, was allowed in Gibson v. Groner, 68 N. C. 10 (1868).

That a judgment for gold may properly be rendered in an action for conversion of gold, was held in Phillips v. Speyers, 49 N. Y. 653 (1873).

In an action against an agent for the value of gold, where defendant admitted that the gold had been changed into currency, it was held that judgment might be rendered for the amount in currency which would be equivalent to the value of the gold. Greentree v. Roenstock, 61 N. Y. 533 (1875). The court says, in respect to the validity of a stipulation for payment in gold coin, that the rule is perfectly well established in the case of express contracts, and that the principle extends to such cases as the present, where the right to recover is based on an implied contract.

In an action against an agent who had collected in gold certain premiums due to an insurance company, it was held in Independent Ins. Co. v. Thomas, 104 Mass. 122 (1870), that a specific judgment should be rendered for gold coin and execution should be issued accordingly, on the authority of Bronson v. Rodes, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 229, 19 L. ed. 141 (1869), and Butler v. Horwitz, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 253, 19 L. ed. 149 (1869).

In an action by a guest against a hotel keeper, for the theft of gold coin from a safe which was delivered to the clerk of the hotel for safe keeping, it was held that the guest was entitled to a judgment for the same amount in gold coin, and not for the currency value of the gold. Kellogg v. Sweeney, 46 N. Y. 291 (1871), 17 Am. Rep. 333.

In an action against a common carrier for failing to deliver a canvass bag containing 90 double eagles of the coinage of the United States, which it received for transportation, it was held in Cushing v. Wells, F. & Co., 98 Mass. 550 (1868), that the recovery should be for $1,800 with 30 per cent additional as the amount of the premium, since, under the legal tender act, treasury notes could be tendered in payment of the judgment.

c. Bank deposits.

Since a deposit of gold in a bank without express agreement creates merely the relation of debtor and creditor, the depositor may be repaid in legal tender notes, unless there was an express agreement to the contrary. Gumbel v. Abrams, 20 La. Ann. 568, 96 Am. Dec. 426 (1868); Chesapeake Bank v. Swain, 29 Md. 438 (1866); Thompson v. Riggs, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 668, 18 L. ed. 704 (1867).

And marking the character of the deposit as coin on the margin of bank books against the entry of deposit is insufficient to establish an express contract to repay the deposit in specie, where there is no proof that this was the purpose of the marking. Thompson v. Riggs, supra.

But evidence of usage may show a contract to repay a gold deposit in gold, though a usage of only two or three banks in a city is not enough. Chesapeake Bank v. Swain, supra.

In the absence of a binding contract for the payment of gold coin by a bank in which such coin was deposited, it was held that the depositor was entitled only to lawful money. Davis v. Mason, 8 Or. 154 (1869).

Also that the custom of a single bank to repay gold deposits in gold was not sufficient to make it a part of the contract of deposit.

In Kupfer v. Bank of Galena, 34 Ill. 323, 85 Am. Dec. 309 (1864), it was held that a deposit in American gold in a bank which had a rule that a depositor could only draw for currency if he deposited currency, constituted a special contract for the return of coin or its equivalent in value, and therefore the deposit could not be applied to checks for currency without allowing for the premium.

Where coin has been deposited as a specific article, and not merely as money, its value is open to inquiry, and may be ascertained by evidence, and allowance therefor in full be made in a judgment for converting it. Bank of State v. Burton, 27 Ind. 426 (1867).

d. Accounting for trust.

An administrator is chargeable with the premium on gold or gold notes which he actually received, in addition to the nominal or face value of the paper. Cunningham v. Cauthen, 37 S. C. 123 (1863).

But an administrator, who charges himself with cotton at a specified price in gold when gold is at a premium, will not be required to add any per cent on account of premiums received upon the notes taken for such cotton, in an accounting when gold is at par. Cunningham v. Cauthen (S. C.) 31 S. E. Rep. 800 (1865).

An executor is chargeable only with the amount of gold purchased at a premium to satisfy a debt which was due in gold, when at the time of his settlement gold was not at a premium. Re Sander-son, 74 Cal. 199 (1867).

So it is held in Re Shipman, 83 Hun, 106 (1864), that an executor cannot be charged, upon final settlement, with a premium upon gold at the time it came into his possession. This decision was rendered when gold was not at a premium.

In Halliburton v. Carson, 100 N. C. 110 (1888), it is 39 L. R. A.

held that an executor is justified in paying a judgment on a bond payable "in United States coin," where it included the amount of premium on the gold, without further resisting the recovery, since this method of conversion of the debt in gold into another form was in accordance with the decision of that court in Robeson v. Brown, 68 N. C. 554 (1869), although it is said to be at variance with that of the Supreme Court of the United States, as shown by Bronson v. Rodes, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 229, 19 L. ed. 141 (1869), and Butler v. Horwitz, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 258, 19 L. ed. 149 (1869).

A judgment for gold cannot be rendered on the bond of a surety which does not expressly provide for payment in that kind of money. Fox v. Min-er, 32 Cal. 120, 91 Am. Dec. 566 (1867).

e. Other actions for damages.

Where a person was required to discharge his debt in gold before he could rightfully take possession of certain property, but, without making such payment, wrongfully took possession, it was held that the damages must be the amount of his obligation in gold or its equivalent in currency. Gregory v. Morris, 96 U. S. 619, 24 L. ed. 740 (1878).

In a collision case the value of goods shipped from Canada, when estimated in Canadian currency, was held recoverable according to the value of such currency in legal tender notes. The Telegraph v. Gordon, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 258, 20 L. ed. 807 (1872).

Judgments for trespass cannot be made payable in coin. Livingston v. Morgan, 53 Cal. 23 (1878).

Neither can a judgment for slander. Chamberlin v. Vance, 51 Cal. 75 (1875).

So, a judgment for costs cannot be made payable in gold coin in an action of forcible entry and detainer. More v. Del Valle, 38 Cal. 170 (1865).

In estimating damages on dissolving an injunction, the difference between gold and legal tender notes cannot be considered. Riddlebarger v. McDaniel, 38 Mo. 138 (1866).

Questions as to the form of judgment to be followed when a valid obligation to pay in coin exists, and also as to the procedure to be followed in such cases, are considered in a note to Belford v. Woodward (Ill.) post, —.

The consideration of all the authorities on the subject shows that since the case of Bronson v. Rodes, the validity of specific agreements to pay obligations in coin has been established, although one decision in Alabama in 1873, assuming to follow the so-called Legal Tender Cases, and ignoring the decision in Bronson v. Rodes, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 229, 19 L. ed. 141 (1869), and others following it adopted the contrary doctrine. All other decisions of both federal and state courts rendered since those of Bronson v. Rodes, supra, Butler v. Horwitz, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 258, 19 L. ed. 149 (1869), and Tebbloock v. Wilson, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 637, 20 L. ed. 460 (1872), sustain the validity of such contracts.

That the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States effectually overrule as well as disapprove the decisions of the state courts to the contrary, is shown by Tebbloock v. Wilson, supra, in which it was expressly decided that a decision by a state court sustaining a tender of legal tender notes on a contract providing for payment in specie was reviewable by the Supreme Court of the United States. Such decision by a state court was in fact reviewed and reversed in that case. The result is to establish the doctrine of the United States Supreme Court as the law in every state, whatever contrary state decisions may have been rendered. B. A. R.

made in the bonds issued by them and held by a bona fide purchaser, is conclusive of the fact, and binding upon the municipality; for the recital is itself a decision of the fact by the appointed tribunal."

Respondents' argument that the bonds would be valid, at least to the extent of 4 per cent annual interest, payable "in gold coin or lawful money of the United States," at the office of the city treasurer, is a virtual concession that the bonds in the form prescribed in ordinance 156 are not authorized by the proceedings, and if that be true, they should not be issued; while, if they would be valid in the hands of a bona fide holder so that he could compel payment in gold coin of the present standard of weight and fineness, with interest in like coin payable semiannually, in the city of New York, a burden would be imposed upon the taxpayers to which they have not assented, and they should not be allowed to issue. Counsel refer to the case of the controversy between Derby and Modesto, 104 Cal. 515. In that case the bonds had been sold, the purchase money paid into the treasury, and the controversy arose more than a year afterwards. One point then urged by the taxpayer was that the bonds provided for the payment of semiannual interest. In reply to this contention it was said: "The statute provides that the trustees shall have the right to determine the rate of interest such bonds shall bear, provided that in no case shall it exceed 7 per centum per annum. The time at which the interest is to be paid, whether annually or semiannually, affects the rate of interest, and is within the power conferred upon the board by the statute, and the rate being within the statutory limit, the bonds are valid as against this objection." The facts should have been more fully stated upon that point. The ordinance of submission and the notice of election both provided for semiannual interest, precisely as stated in the bonds, but the statute at that time was silent as to the payment of interest semiannually, and the contention was that in providing for semiannual interest the statute had not been followed. In the case at bar, where the question arises before the bonds have been delivered, we hold that the city has no power to issue them in a form which does not substantially comply with the terms stated in the ordinance of submission and notice of election, and with the statute under which the proceedings were had.

It becomes unnecessary to discuss the remaining questions, brought up by the record. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that so much of the judgment appealed from as affirms the validity of the bonds proposed to be issued under said ordinance 156 be reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to enter a judgment enjoining the sale and delivery thereof.

Charles P. SCHULTZ.

(.....R. L.....)

1. There can be no property right in the shape, size, color, or arrangement of signs without regard to the letters which they bear.
2. No exclusive right can be acquired to the use of the words "scientific dentistry at moderate prices."
3. Names which are not trade-marks strictly speaking may be protected as property if they are taken by others with fraudulent intention, and are so used as to be likely to effect such intention.
4. The use of the words "U. S. Dental Rooms" and of the letters "U. S." upon the windows of a dental office may be enjoined at the suit of one who has adopted them as a trade-name, against another who by their use is plainly attempting to convey the idea that he is carrying on a branch of the former's business, and so profit from his advertising and business reputation.

(September 19, 1895.)

BILL for an injunction to restrain defendant from the alleged wrongful use of plaintiff's trade-name. Injunction granted.

NOTE.—On the question, What may be appropriated as trade-marks? see notes to Alff v. Radam (Tex.) 9 L. R. A. 145; Bumford Chemical Works v. Muth (C. C. D. Md.) 1 L. R. A. 44; Prince Mfg. Co. v. Prince's Metallic Paint Co. (N. Y.) 17 L. R. A. 122, 29 L. R. A.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles A. Aldrich, for complainant:

The complainant by extensive advertising has built up a large and lucrative business under the name of the U. S. Dental Association, which is merely a fancy designation for his business. Where a geographical or other name is used simply as a fancy designation, its use will be protected.

Barrows v. Knight, 6 R. I. 494, 78 Am. Dec. 452; Sanders v. Utt, 16 Mo. App. 822; American Solid Leather Button Co. v. Anthony, 18 R. I. 388; Colton v. Deane, 7 N. Y. S. R. 78; Lauferty v. Wheeler, 11 Abb. N. C. 220.

If the trade-name is designated or calculated to mislead, its use will be restrained.

In this case it is submitted that the respondent's signs and trade-name were so calculated and designed. The coloring and lettering on the signs is practically the same. The use of the letters "U. S." across the windows shows clearly an intent to deceive.

Barrows v. Knight, American Solid Leather Button Co. v. Anthony, and Colton v. Denne, supra; Colton v. Thomas, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 308; Sanders v. Utt, supra; Alexander v. Morse, 14 R. I. 153, 51 Am. Rep. 389; Sanders v. Jacob, 20 Mo. App. 98; Davis v. Kendall, 2 R. I. 566. Mr. Isaac H. Southwick, Jr., for respondent.

Douglas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant is engaged in the practice of dentistry, having offices and rooms for that purpose in Providence, in this state, in Baltimore, Md., and in Washington, in the District of Columbia, and employing assistants to attend to patients at these places. In the prosecution of this business for four years or more he has used as a trade name the words "United States Dental Association," and has displayed this name, or abbreviations of it, upon signs affixed to his place of business in Providence, and in advertisements and cards widely distributed through Providence, Pawtucket, and Attleboro, so that the business of which he is proprietor has become known in the city of Providence and in the adjacent city of Pawtucket by that name. The defendant, who is likewise a dentist, formerly had an office in Providence, near the complainant's rooms, and about December 1, 1894, removed to Pawtucket, and opened an office there, and displayed upon his windows and upon the walls of the building signs in close imitation in size, shape, and color of those used by the complainant. We have no doubt from the evidence that these imitations were intentional. Indeed, this is not denied, and we can conceive of no motive for the use of these similar signs except to take advantage of the advertisements of the complainant, and to induce customers to patronize the defendant. The complainant presents instances where customers were actually misled by them; and the defendant says that people have come into his office supposing it to be controlled by the United States Dental Association, though he asserts that in all cases he has undeceived them. The complainant particularly urges that the use of the words "U. S. Dental Rooms," as displayed upon the defendant's signs, and the letters "U. S.," painted upon the defendant's windows in the same color, size, and shape as the same letters are shown upon the complainant's windows, is an illegal use of these words and letters, and the defendant should be restrained from so employing them. He also claims that he is the inventor of the phrase "Scientific dentistry at moderate prices," and that defendant cannot lawfully display this legend on his signs, and generally he asks that defendant may be enjoined from using similar signs to those he uses.

We are of the opinion that the complainant can have no property in the shape, size, color, or arrangement of signs, without regard to the letters which they bear; nor can he claim any exclusive use of the words, "Scientific dentistry at moderate prices." The characteristics of the signs do not differ from those which ordinarily appear on business signs placed as these are. The statement that a dentist does his work scientifically, and charges moderate prices for it, is one which any dentist may make and disseminate if he can do so truthfully. It ought not to be inapplicable equally to all members of the profession. Neither of these things tends to injure unlawfully the complainant's business. But we think the use of the words "U. S. Dental Rooms," and the use of the letters "U. S." upon the windows of defendant's office, is a plain attempt to convey the idea that the business carried on there is a branch of the complainant's business, and should be restrained. The argument of the defendant has been directed to the point that the name adopted by the plaintiff lacks the elements of a lawful trade-mark. It consists of a geographical name, coupled with a descriptive term of wide application, and no doubt the defendant is right in contending that such a name is objectionable if intended to be used as a trade-mark. It would be almost impossible to use the name of the United States within the limits of the country itself so as to devalue it of territorial significance and make it a mere fancy mark. But the argument ignores certain discriminations which should be made in discussing cases of this character. A trade-mark is a symbol arbitrarily selected by a manufacturer or dealer and attached to his wares to indicate that they are his wares. In selecting such a device he must avoid words merely descriptive of the article or its qualities, or such as have become so by use in connection with known articles of commerce. He must also avoid words—e. g. geographical names—which are descriptive of the local origin of the goods, if other persons have the right to deal in goods of a similar origin. When it has become generally known in the trade that this symbol or word has been taken by one dealer or manufacturer to indicate his goods, he acquires a title to it for that purpose, and no one else can use it, even innocently. A trade-name is of a different character. It is descriptive of the manufacturer or dealer himself as much as his own name is, and frequently, like the names of business corporations, includes the name of the place where the business is located. If attached to goods, it is designed to say plainly what a trade-mark only indicates by association and use. The employment of such a name is subject to the same rules which apply to the use of one's own name of birth or baptism. Two persons may bear the same name, and each may use it in his business, but not so as to deceive the public and induce customers to mistake one for the other. The use of one's own name is unlawful if exercised fraudulently to attract custom from another bearer of it. Trade-marks, properly so called, may be violated by accident or ignorance. The law protects them, nevertheless, as property. Names which are not trade-marks, strictly speaking, may be protected likewise, if they are taken with fraudulent intention, and if they are so used as to be likely to effect such intention. A leading and instructive case upon this subject is Croft v. Day, 7 Beav. 84, in which Lord Langdale, M. R., says (at page 88): "It has been very correctly said that the principle, in these cases, is this,—that no man has a right to sell his own goods as the goods of another. You may express the same principle in a different form, and say that no man has a right to dress himself in colors, or adopt and bear symbols, to which he has no peculiar or exclusive right, and thereby personate another person, for the purpose of inducing the public to suppose either that he is that other person or that he is connected with and selling the manufacture of such other person, while he is really selling his own. It is perfectly manifest that to do these things is to commit a fraud, and a very gross fraud. I stated, upon a former occasion, that in my opinion the right which any person may have to the protection of this court does not depend upon any exclusive right which he may be supposed to have to a particular name, or to a particular form of words. His right is to be protected against fraud, and fraud may be practiced against him by means of a name, though the person practicing it may have a perfect right to use that name, provided he does not accompany the use of it with such other circumstances as to effect a fraud upon others." The same principle is applied in Sanders v. Utt, 16 Mo. App. 322; Sanders v. Jacob, 20 Mo. App. 98,—where the name "N. Y. Dental Rooms" was protected. In all such cases it is obvious, as defendant urges, that the effect of imitation depends very much upon propinquity. In many cases the use of a similar trade-name, in localities not very remote from each other, would not justify an inference that the establishments were those of a common proprietor, and so would not result in damage, or justify an allegation of fraud. The character of the name adopted by the complainant suggests a distribution of offices. It would be natural for a person reading the advertisement of the complainant in a Pawtucket paper, and seeing the signs of the defendant displayed there, to suppose that they indicated a branch office of the same concern; and this we have no doubt the defendant intended should happen. It is the only result which he could anticipate from his contrivances.

We conclude, therefore, that the complainant is entitled to an injunction restraining the use by the defendant of the words "U. S. Dental Rooms," or the letters "U. S." upon his signs or windows, and all words, letters, and symbols tending to indicate that his business is conducted or managed by the plaintiff.

1. The only notice to taxpayers of an assessment required by Pub. Stat., chap. 43, is that required by section 6 in respect to the time and place of meeting at which each taxable person is directed to bring in an account, and no subsequent notice of a time to hear objections is required.

2. Requiring every taxable person to bring in an account of his ratable estate to the assessors at a time and place of which he has notice, upon which he may be examined and heard, is sufficient to constitute due process of law in a tax assessment.

3. The exemption of property from taxation is beyond the power of a town in the absence of constitutional legislative authority.

4. The omission by assessors to include property in an assessment solely by reason of their mistake as to the binding effect of an agreement for an exemption, and not by any intentional disregard of law or other wrongful or fraudulent purpose, will not make their assessment void.

SUIT to enjoin defendants from enforcing the payment of taxes which were alleged to have been illegally levied. Bill dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bassett & Mitchell, for complainants:

The provision in regard to notice being of vital importance to the taxpayer is mandatory, and a compliance with it is a condition precedent to the legality of the tax.

Cooley, Taxn. ed. 1879, pp. 216-218, 265-266; Black, Tax Titles, §§ 90, 130; 1 Desty, Taxn. p. 541.

The law is mandatory, and every portion of it must be complied with.

R. A. 493, 123 N. Y. 142; Doughty v. Hope, 1 N. Y. 79.

The contract for exemption, made by the town in town meeting, was entirely unauthorized by any act or authority from the general assembly, and therefore clearly ultra vires and void.

Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. p. 200, and cases cited; State v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 75 Mo. 203; Green's Brice's Ultra-Vires, p. 746; 2 Beach, Pub. Corp. § 1443; Austin v. Coggeshall, 12 R. I. 329, 34 Am. Rep. 648.

The resolution of April 11, 1892, cannot be strengthened by the Act of May 21, for that act does not purport to be and therefore cannot be retroactive.

Bowen v. Newell, 16 R. I. 298.

The exemption of this corporation would be illegal even if authorized by an act of the general assembly, for the legislature is powerless when the constitution prescribed a rule of equality which forbids exemption.

Cooley, Taxn. pp. 132-144, and cases cited; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Palmes, 109 U. S. 244, 27 L. ed. 922.

Therefore a fortiori would the general assembly be without authority to delegate a general power to a municipality to exempt corporations.

The omissions of the assessors in previous years cannot control the duty imposed by law upon their successors.

Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Dennis, 116 U. S. 665, 29 L. ed. 770.

It was not a case of accidental omission, but a case of intentional omission, and it matters not what was the belief of the assessors. This intentional omission or exemption renders the entire assessment illegal.

Matteson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill to enjoin the collection of a tax because, as alleged, its assessment was illegal. The first ground upon which it is claimed that the assessment was illegal is that the assessors gave no notice of the time and place of their meeting, as required by law. The provisions of the statutes relating to the assessment of taxes, so far as material to the present inquiry, are contained in R. I. Pub. Stat., chap. 48, §§ 6-8, 18, and are as follows:

"Sec. 6. Before assessing any tax, the assessors shall post up printed notices of the time and place of their meeting, in three public places in the town, for three weeks next preceding the time of such meeting, and advertise in some newspaper published in the town, if any there be, for the same space of time. Such notices shall require every person and body corporate liable to taxation to bring in to the assessors a true 29 L. R. A.

and exact account of all his ratable estate, describing and specifying the value of every parcel of his real and personal estate, at such time as they may prescribe.

"Sec. 7. Every person bringing in any such account shall make oath before some one of the assessors that the account by him exhibited contains to the best of his knowledge and belief a true and full account and valuation of all his ratable estate; and whoever neglects or refuses to bring in such account if overtaxed shall have no remedy therefor.

"Sec. 8. The assessors shall make a list containing the true, full, and fair cash value of all the ratable estate in the town, placing real and personal estate in separate columns, and distinguishing those who give in an account from those who do not, and shall apportion the tax accordingly."

"Sec. 18. The assessors, on completing the assessment as aforesaid, shall date and sign the same and deposit it in the office of the town clerk."

Before proceeding to the assessment, the assessors posted up printed notices in three or more public places in the town, for three weeks next preceding the time of their meeting, as specified in the notices, which were in the following form:

"Town of East Providence. 1894. Assessors' Notice. The undersigned, assessors of taxes of the town of East Providence, R. I., for the year 1894, hereby give notice that they will be in session at the town hall, East Providence Centre, Tuesday, August 21; at Riverside, in the engine house Wednesday, August 22; and at the town clerk's office, Thursday and Friday, August 24, from 2 to 4 o'clock, P. M., on each of said days, for the purpose of receiving from persons and bodies corporate liable to taxation in said town of East Providence true and exact accounts of their ratable estates." (Here follows in the notice R. I. Pub. Stat., chap. 48, § 7, quoted above.) "Transfers of real estate from the records will close on Tuesday, July 31, 1894, and all real estate will be taxed to the persons or bodies corporate in whose name it stands at the close of the day. Joseph L. Luther, William L. Sunderland, Timothy L. Risley, Assessors. East Providence, June 26, 1894."

There was no newspaper published in East Providence during the three weeks next preceding the time of their meeting, as specified in the notices, and therefore the assessors, though not required by the statute, gave further notice of the time and place of their meeting by advertisement during that period in the Evening Bulletin and Evening Telegram, newspapers published in Providence. The theory of the complainants is that section 6 requires the giving of two notices,—

(1) a notice to every person and body corporate liable to taxation to carry in a true account of his or its ratable estate; and (2) a notice of the time and place of the meeting of the assessors for the purpose of assessing the tax. Their contention is that the statute contemplates that, after having given notice to those liable to taxation to bring in their accounts within the time to be prescribed by the notice, and after having made up the list required by section 8, the assessors shall hold a final meeting, of which they shall give notice in the manner specified, so that the taxpayers shall have an opportunity to inspect the assessment roll, and, if they consider themselves unfairly taxed, may object, and be heard by the assessors upon their objections, before the assessment has been signed and deposited by them in the town clerk's office, as provided in section 18. We do not think that this is the view to be taken of the statute. Section 6 is the only section relating to notice. It does not provide in terms for two distinct notices. It simply directs the assessors, before proceeding in the assessment, to give notice, in the manner specified, of the time and place of their meeting, and then goes on to provide that the notices posted up, besides specifying the time and place of meeting, shall require every person and body corporate liable to taxation to bring in to the assessors an account, etc. It is the evident purpose of the statute to compel every one liable to be taxed to personally carry in an account to the assessors, since the requirement is that he shall make oath to the account before one of the assessors. Upon the account so rendered he may be examined by the assessors. He at the same time will have an opportunity to be heard upon it, and a basis will be afforded the assessors on which to make the assessment. If a person liable to taxation neglects or refuses to carry in his account, he waives his right to be heard, and, under section 8, if overtaxed is without a remedy. We do not see that such a procedure is in any way repugnant, as intimated by the complainants, to article 5 of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. We do not think that the assessment was invalid for want of notice.

The second ground upon which it is contended that the assessment was illegal is the alleged willful and intentional omission and exemption by the assessors of property of the Grosvenordale Company. The respondents, though conceding that property of the Grosvenordale Company was intentionally omitted from the assessment, deny that the omission was willful and intentional in the sense that it was fraudulent or corrupt, and seek to justify it by reference to certain records and deeds mentioned in (and copies of which are annexed to) the answer. From these it appears that the Grosvenordale Company made a proposition in writing, dated April 9, 1892, to the town, to convey or procure to be conveyed to it certain lands for highway purposes, and certain loam and gravel for making streets, and to erect a two-story brick building, 184 feet in length by 60 feet wide, for manufacturing purposes, on certain land in the town, being lots numbered 6, 7, 8, and 9 on the Grosvenor plat, in consideration that the town would exempt the improvements from taxation for ten years and cause the land conveyed to it to be laid out as public highways, and the highways to be constructed in the manner and within the time specified in the proposition; that at the annual town meeting, on April 11, 1892, the electors of the town, qualified to vote on a proposition to impose a tax, accepted the proposition, and passed a resolution authorizing the town council to exempt from taxation the brick building proposed to be erected, and the machinery, stock, furniture, and fixtures to be kept therein, in accordance with the provisions of any acts of the general assembly that might be passed authorizing such exemption; that, at the same meeting, a further resolution was passed authorizing the town council, until the next annual election, to exempt from taxation, for a period not exceeding ten years, manufacturing or other ratable property not already located in the town which might be located there in consequence of such exemption, in accordance with the provisions of any act of the general assembly which might be passed authorizing such exemption; that by deeds dated April 28, 1892, and recorded in the land records of the town May 14, 1892, the lands proposed to be conveyed to the town for highway purposes were conveyed to it by the owners of such lands, according to the terms of the proposition, which deeds were, by vote of the town council on May 17, 1892, accepted and ordered to be recorded.

On May 21, 1892, the general assembly passed the following act (R. I. Pub. Laws, chap. 1089):

"Section 1. The electors of any town or city qualified to vote on a proposition to impose a tax, when legally assembled, may vote to exempt, or may authorize the town or city council of such town or city, for a period not exceeding one year, to exempt from taxation, for a period not exceeding ten years, such manufacturing property as may hereafter be located in said town or city in consequence of such exemption, and the land on which such property is located.

"Sec. 2. Property so exempted shall not during such period of exemption be liable to taxation while such property is used for the purposes for which it was so located.

"Sec. 3. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

"Sec. 4. This act shall take effect on and after its passage."

The power to exempt property from taxation is the converse of the power to determine what property shall be the subject of taxation; the selection of certain property for the purpose of taxation being the exclusion or exemption of that which is not selected. It is, therefore, included necessarily in the power to tax, which resides in the state alone, and consequently can be exercised only by the general assembly, representing the sovereign power of the state, acting within the limitation of the constitution, or by the several cities, towns, or other municipal bodies, in pursuance of lawful authority granted to them by the general assembly. Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 200. This was evidently the idea of the framer of the resolutions passed by the town, which do not purport to exempt any property from taxation, but simply confer on the town council authority to grant exemptions in accordance with the provisions of any act or acts of the general assembly.

bly which might be passed authorizing the exemption. R. I. Pub. Laws, chap. 1088, was doubtless passed for the purpose of enabling the making of the exemption. But it does not purport to be retroactive, and, conceding the competency of the general assembly to pass the act (which, in view of the limitation contained in article 1, section 2, of the Constitution, that the public burdens ought to be fairly distributed, we think is at least susceptible of doubt), it does not appear that either the electors of the town qualified to vote on a proposition to impose a tax or the town council took any action, prior to the assessment, in pursuance of that statute. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the attempt to justify the omission of the property from the assessment, on the ground that its exemption was authorized and therefore legal, fails.

The respondents seek further to justify the omission of the property from assessment on the ground that the town, by the acceptance of the proposition of the Grosvenordale Company and the benefits derived from it, became bound in good faith and equity to exempt the property from taxation, and contend that a court of equity will not disregard a subsisting contract and set it aside until one or the other of the parties to it has offered to rescind it and has restored or tendered back the consideration received from the other; that the complainants, and the other taxpayers of the town in whose behalf they file the bill, have derived the benefits arising from the conveyance of the streets to the town for highway purposes, and cannot ask a court sitting in equity to say that the assessors have so erred in recognizing the contract as to render the assessment null and void; that the complainants, representing the taxpayers generally, must, before asking the interposition of equity, do what is equitable,—or, in other words, before asking the court to pronounce the assessment invalid, must secure such action as will restore to the other party to the contract the consideration which the town has received. We do not think that the omission to include the property in the assessment can be justified on the ground of the contract. As we have already held, the exemption of the property from taxation, in the absence of constitutional legislative authority, was beyond the power of the town, and hence, in so far as such exemption entered into the contract, the contract was null and void. It did not bind the town, or the complainants as taxpayers, whose rights as such would be affected by carrying it into effect; and it made no difference that the Grosvenordale Company may have acted in the belief that the town could make the contract, since it was bound to know the extent of the town's authority. Austin v. Coggeshall, 12 R. I. 329, 331, 84 Am. Rep. 648; Farnsworth v. Pawtucket, 18 R. I. 82, 88; Mathewson v. Hawkins, Index QQ. 15. In the face of the fact, however, that the resolutions of the town do not purport to grant the exemption, but merely authorize the town council to make it, in accordance with the provisions of such act or acts of the general assembly as might be passed for the purpose, it seems scarcely probable that the Grosvenordale Company was not aware of the incapacity of the town to bind itself by so much of the contract as related to the exemption of the property from taxation.

Since the making of the agreement the assessors have recognized it as binding on the town, and have accordingly omitted to assess the property to which it relates. No question has been made as to the validity of such exemption, until the filing of the bill in this suit. The assessors who made the present assessment omitted to assess the property in good faith, without any intention or purpose to enable the company to escape or be free from legal taxation, with the knowledge that it had been exempted by the previous boards of assessors, and in full belief of the duty of the town to exempt the property from taxation and of the validity of the exemption. It is contended by the respondents that, as the omission to assess the property was because of the belief of the assessors that the agreement was binding upon the town, and that the exemption was valid on that account, and was, therefore, a mistake of law, it did not vitiate the assessment as a whole, and consequently that the bill should be dismissed. On the other hand, the complainants, though conceding that an accidental omission of property that should be taxed will not avoid an assessment, insist that such will be the effect when the omission, as in the present case, was intentional, and that it matters not what was the belief or motive of the assessors. We do not think that the fact that the omission of the property from assessment was intentional, in the sense merely that it was not accidental, is sufficient to avoid the assessment. To have that effect the omission must be a conscious disregard of law, in such manner as to impose illegal taxes on those who are assessed. It is the conscious intention to disregard the law to the injury of others, or, in other words, an intention to do a wrong or commit a fraud, which vitiates an assessment; and when this appears, it matters not that the motive for it would otherwise have been a worthy one. Accidental omissions, or omissions arising merely from mistakes of law or fact or errors of judgment, in an honest endeavor on the part of the assessors to perform their duty, though increasing somewhat the burdens of taxpayers, will not render the assessment void. In Weeks v. Milwaukee, 10 Wis. 264, it is said: "Omissions of this character, arising from mistakes of fact, erroneous computations or errors of judgment on the part of those to whom the execution of the taxing laws is intrusted, do not necessarily vitiate the whole tax. But intentional disregard of those laws, in such manner as to impose illegal taxes upon those who are assessed, does. The first part of the rule is necessary to enable taxes to be collected at all. The execution of these laws is necessarily intrusted to men; and men are fallible, liable to frequent mistakes of fact and errors of judgment. If such errors on the part of those who are attempting in good faith to perform their duties should vitiate the whole tax, no tax could ever be collected. And, therefore, if they sometimes increase improperly the burdens of those paying taxes, that part of the rule which holds the tax not thereby avoided is absolutely essential to the continuance of the government. But it seems to me clear that the other part is equally essential to the just protection of the citizen. If those executing these laws may deliberately disregard them and assess the whole tax upon a part only of those who are liable to pay it, and have it still a legal tax, then the laws afford no protection, and the citizen is at the mercy of those officers who, by being appointed to execute the laws, would seem to be thereby placed beyond legal control." And see Wilson v. Wheeler, 55 Vt. 446, 453, 454; Henry v. Chester, 15 Vt. 460, 461; Spear v. Braintree, 24 Vt. 414, 418; Dillingham v.

Snow, 5 Mass. 547, 558, 559; Van Deventer v. Long Island City, 139 N. Y. 133, 138; State v. Platt, 24 N. J. L. 108, 120, 121; Exchange Bank of Columbus v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1; Fisfield v. Marinette County, 62 Wis. 532, 541; Burlington & M. R. R. Co. v. Seward County, 10 Neb. 211, 216; Burlington & M. R. R. Co. v. Saline County Comrs. 13 Neb. 396, 397; People v. McCreery, 84 Cal. 434, 458; Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 214, 217.

The omission to include the property in the assessment having been occasioned solely by the mistake of the assessors as to the binding effect of the agreement on the town, and not by any intentional disregard of law or other wrongful or fraudulent purpose, we are of the opinion that the assessment was not thereby avoided, and hence that the injunction should be denied and the bill dismissed.

ROCKLAND, THOMASTON & CAMDEN STREET RAILWAY.

(87 Me. 387.)

1. The use of indecent or profane language in a street-car, which by statute constitutes a breach of the peace for which a person may be punished by fine or imprisonment, justifies the conductor in putting the offender off the car.
2. A passenger in a crowded street-car in which there are many ladies, who on being requested by the conductor to stop swearing denies his guilt, and when told that he has been profane calls the conductor "a damned liar," says that he would swear as much as he "damned pleased," and that he "would be God damned if he would put him off the car,"—should be ejected from the car even if the conductor was at first in error in charging him with profanity.

There is no pretense in this case that the plaintiff was intoxicated, or would disturb or annoy others. His offense was in denying the conductor's charge, and calling him a liar after continuous prodding and very great provocation by the conductor. If provocation excuses a conductor, it certainly should doubly so the passenger, when provoked by the conductor, whose duty is to exercise great care to treat him well.

Walton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We think the verdict in this case is clearly wrong. It is an action to recover damages for being removed from a street-railway car, and the plaintiff has obtained a verdict for $1,187.27. We think the removal was justifiable, and that the verdict is clearly erroneous, and must be set aside.

In this state, the use of indecent or profane language in a street-railroad car is a breach of the peace. It is a crime for which a person may be punished by fine or imprisonment. And the conductor of the car may immediately arrest any person guilty of such a breach of the peace, and hold him till a warrant can be obtained or he can be placed in custody of the proper officers of the law. Rev. Stat. chap. 51, § 78, as amended by Act 1889, chap. 261. Or the conductor may remove a person guilty of such a breach of the peace from the car. The cases which sustain this right of removal are too numerous for citation. And in the exercise of this right the conductor acts as a police officer. He is not to act or refuse to act at the dictation of his own will and pleasure. When indecent or profane language is being used in his car, it is his duty to check it; and he will be guilty of a breach of duty if he fails to do so. And if, in a car filled with passengers, nearly one half of whom are ladies, a man in earnest conversation undertakes to emphasize his statements, as some men are apt to do, by saying, "By God," it is so, or "By God" it is not so, the law makes it the duty of the conductor to check him; and, if the latter denies his guilt, and, upon being assured by the conductor that he is guilty, flies into a passion, and calls the conductor a "damned liar," it is the opinion of the court that he may rightfully be removed from the car; not as a punishment for his insult to the conductor as an individual, but to vindicate the authority of the law, which forbids the use of such language in a street-car, or any other public place, where women and children have a right to be. The fact, if it be a fact, that the offender was innocent of the misconduct with which he was at first charged, can be no excuse for his subsequent offense. A thief cannot excuse his crime by showing that before committing the theft in question he had been falsely accused of a similar offense. No more can a man excuse the use of indecent or profane language in a street-railway car by proof that he was first falsely charged with the use of similar language. To be first falsely charged with an offense is not license to become immediately guilty of a similar offense.

And herein lies the weakness of the plaintiff's case. He admits that he called the conductor of the car "a damned liar," and he does not claim that he had any excuse for so doing, except that the conductor had first falsely accused him of swearing, and admonished him to desist. And he does not claim that the conductor spoke to him in a loud, harsh, or angry tone of voice. He admits that the car was filled with passengers, nearly half of whom were ladies. He says that the conductor approached him, and, in an ordinary tone of voice, requested him to stop swearing; that he denied that he had been swearing; and that, upon the conductor's again affirming that he had been swearing, and that he must desist or he should be obliged to put him out of the car, he called the conductor "a damned liar." And several witnesses testify that he went further, and defied the conductor, and said that he "would be God damned if he would put him off the car," and that he would swear as much as he "damned pleased," and that he used much other indecent and profane language.

But if it should be conceded that the plaintiff's account of the transaction is strictly true, and that all of the defendant's witnesses are mistaken, it would still be the opinion of the court that the plaintiff's conduct justified his removal from the car.

We are reminded by the plaintiff's counsel that in Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co. of Canada, 57 Me. 202, 2 Am. Rep. 89, a verdict for very large damages was sustained. Certainly. And our present decision is in harmony with that decision. In that case a servant of the railroad company used exceedingly foul and profane language to a respectable and unoffending passenger. Here a passenger used very offensive and indecent language to a respectable and unoffending servant of the railroad company. We protected the passenger in that case, and for the same reason we hope to be able to protect the railroad servant in this case. Both decisions are in favor of morality and decency. In that case the servants of railroads were taught to treat passengers with civility, and in this case we hope to teach passengers to treat the servants of railroads with civility. To call a street-railroad conductor who, in a crowded car half filled with ladies, is endeavoring to maintain order and suppress profanity, "a damned liar," is a poor foundation on which to rest a suit for punitive damages.

Motion sustained.

therein, under Rev. Stat. 1894, § 8541, empowering cities to "restrain hawking and peddling."

(September 17, 1895.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Joseph County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce a penalty for violating a municipal ordinance against peddling without a license. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Wilbert Ward for appellant.

Mr. Joseph G. Orr, for appellee:

If the state can tax for the privilege of selling to one class it can for selling to another or to all. In either case it is a restriction on the right to sell and a burden on the lawful commerce between citizens of two states.

A regulation as to the manner of sale, whether by sample or not, whether by exhibiting samples at a store or at a dwelling house, whether by going personally with the goods from house to house and selling and delivering the same, is surely a regulation of commerce.

The goods which the defendant was engaged in selling are open to no condemnation and are unchallenged subjects of commerce.

Brennan v. Titusville, 153 U. S. 239, 38 L. ed. 719.

This license does not purport to be exacted in the exercise of the police, but rather of the taxing, power.

Even though the license had in terms been declared to be exacted as a police regulation, that would not conclude this question, for, whatever may be the reason given to justify or the power invoked to sustain the act of the state, if that act is one which trenches directly upon that which is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the national government, it cannot be sustained.

New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Louisiana Light & Heat Producing & Mfg. Co. 115 U. S. 650, 29 L. ed. 516; Henderson v. Wickham, 93 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 59, 35 L. ed. 653.

Nothing which is a direct burden upon interstate commerce can be imposed by the state without the assent of congress, and the silence of congress is equivalent to a declaration on its part that it should be absolutely free.

One cannot be guilty of the offense of hawking and peddling, unless he actually makes a sale, either a present sale or by taking an order for future delivery. In this case there was an actual sale made.

Emert v. Missouri, 156 U. S. 296, 39 L. ed. 430.

McCabe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant prosecuted the appellee before the mayor of said city to recover the penalty of not less than $1, nor more than $20, provided in an ordinance with a violation of which the appellee was charged in the verified complaint filed. Said complaint charged "that the defendant, on the 12th day of September, 1894, at the city . . . aforesaid, violated sections Nos. 24 and 25 of Ordinance No. 988 of said city, passed by the common council thereof on the 11th day of December, 1893, and amended August, 1894, by carrying on the business of hawking and peddling within the corporate limits of the city of South Bend by carrying, exposing, offering, and crying for sale, articles of merchandise, to wit, rattan rocking-chairs, in the public streets and avenues of said city, without having a license for that purpose; that while so engaged the defendant sold and delivered to one Emma Wright one rattan rocking-chair, for the sum of six dollars; that said articles of merchandise so sold were not newspapers nor produce nor provisions, and that said sales were not for future delivery of said chairs; that defendant is not a wholesale traveling merchant." The city recovered judgment in the mayor's court for one dollar, and the defendant appealed to the circuit court, where a trial resulted in a judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals therefrom to this court. One of the questions presented by the record and briefs is whether the ordinance referred to is valid. That alone rescues the appeal from the exclusive jurisdiction of the appellate court. Acts 1891, p. 39; Rev. Stat. 1894, § 1336. The only error assigned is that the circuit court overruled appellant's motion for a new trial. The ground for the motion for a new trial is that the decision of the court was contrary to law and the evidence.

The only evidence in the cause was the following agreed statement of facts:

"A. H. Ordway & Co. are manufacturers of rattan chairs, residing in South Framingham, Mass., of which state they are citizens, and in which city they have their manufactory and place of business. In the prosecution of the said business they sell directly to the people of the different states, and do not sell to retail dealers in the trade. They ship their chairs from the factory to A. H. Ordway & Co., in care of their agents at different points throughout the United States. In the prosecution of their said business they employ men, who go about from town to town in Indiana and other states of the Union with the chairs, going personally from house to house, and selling the chairs on the installment plan, retaining the title in the chairs until they are fully paid for, and deliver the goods at the time the sales are made. The defendant, William C. Martin, was an employé of the said A. H. Ordway & Co., employed by them to travel and sell their chairs in the manner stated, upon a commission on the amount of his sales, at the time of his arrest, September 13, 1894. The particular chairs which defendant was engaged in selling in South Bend, Indiana, at the time of his arrest, were shipped by the owners and manufacturers, A. H. Ordway & Co., from South Framingham, Mass., to A. H. Ordway fore the mayor of said city to recover the penalty of not less than $1, nor more than $20, provided in an ordinance with a violation of which the appellee was charged in the verified complaint filed. Said complaint charged "that the defendant, on the 12th day of September, 1894, at the city . . . aforesaid, violated sections Nos. 24 and 25 of Ordinance No. 988 of said city, passed by the common council thereof on the 11th day of December, 1893, and amended August, 1894, by carrying on the business of hawking and peddling within the corporate limits of the city of South Bend by carrying, exposing, offering, and crying for sale, articles of merchandise, to wit, rattan rocking-chairs, in the public streets and avenues of said city, without having a license for that purpose; that while so engaged the defendant sold and delivered to one Emma Wright one rattan rocking-chair, for the sum of six dollars; that said articles of merchandise so sold were not newspapers nor produce nor provisions, and that said sales were not for future delivery of said chairs; that defendant is not a wholesale traveling merchant." The city recovered judgment in the mayor's court for one dollar, and the defendant appealed to the circuit court, where a trial resulted in a judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals therefrom to this court. One of the questions presented by the record and briefs is whether the ordinance referred to is valid. That alone rescues the appeal from the exclusive jurisdiction of the appellate court. Acts 1891, p. 39; Rev. Stat. 1894, § 1336. The only error assigned is that the circuit court overruled appellant's motion for a new trial. The ground for the motion for a new trial is that the decision of the court was contrary to law and the evidence.

& Co., in care of their agent at Chicago, state of Illinois, where they have a branch and repository, and then reshipped from Chicago to South Bend, Indiana. The defendant, William C. Martin, at the time of his arrest, and before, was engaged in selling chairs within the corporate limits of the city of South Bend, by going personally from house to house within said city, and selling the chairs, and delivering the same at the time of sale, and was acting solely for A. H. Ordway & Co.; and the said sales were made on the installment plan, and the title retained in A. H. Ordway & Co. until same are fully paid for. The common council of the city of South Bend had enacted an ordinance, in force at the time of the arrest of the said William C. Martin, entitled 'An ordinance concerning the licensing of certain extraordinary trades and establishments,' passed December 11, 1898, amended August 28, 1894. Section 24 of said ordinance provides as follows:

"It shall be unlawful for any person to carry on the business of hawking and peddling within the corporate limits of South Bend, at wholesale or retail, by carrying, exposing or crying for sale within any street, avenue, alley or public square of said city, or otherwise, any article of commerce without a license from said city for that purpose; provided this section shall not apply to the sale of newspapers nor to produce and provisions nor fruit of peddlers' own raising, nor to taking orders for future delivery of any kind of goods, wares, or merchandise, nor to wholesale traveling merchants and farmers who sell only to retail dealers in like commodities. Any person violating any section of this ordinance shall be fined for each offense not less than one dollar nor more than twenty dollars."

"Sec. 25. License to hawkers and peddlers shall be signed by the mayor and countersigned by the clerk on payment of a license fee as follows: For carrying goods by hand, one dollar per day, five dollars per week, ten dollars per month and twenty dollars per year. For selling from any kind of vehicle two dollars per day, eight dollars per week, fifteen dollars per month, twenty-five dollars per year. The clerk for such services shall receive fifty cents for each license issued, to be paid by the applicant."

"Sec. 26. No license issued under any section of this ordinance shall be transferable; nor shall any person other than the person named in the license be permitted to use the same, nor shall any license protect any person from incurring the penalties prescribed by this ordinance except the licensee named in the license."

"The defendant, William C. Martin, at the time of his arrest, was not engaged in the sale of newspapers, produce, provisions, or fruit, and was not taking orders for future delivery, and was not a wholesale traveling merchant, but was selling at retail to consumers. The defendant, . . . at the time of his arrest, had not obtained a license as required by said ordinance. The defendant was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of . . . $1 and costs, under said ordinance, before D. B. J. Schafer, mayor of said city of South Bend, September 13, 1894. If the court should be of the opinion, upon the facts stated, that the defendant . . . was liable to pay the license fee provided by said ordinance, then judgment to be rendered for the plaintiff for one dollar ($1) and costs of suit. If the court should be of opinion that the said Martin was not liable to pay, then judgment to be entered for the defendant for costs of suit."

Subdivision 28, § 8106, Rev. Stat. 1891 (Burns' Rev. Stat. 1894, § 8541), empowers cities "to regulate the ringing of bells and crying of goods and to restrain hawking and peddling." It has been held by this court that this statutory provision empowers a city to pass an ordinance requiring a license to hawk and peddle in a city. Huntington v. Cheesbro, 57 Ind. 74. The ordinance involved in Graffy v. Rushville, 107 Ind. 502, 57 Am. Rep. 128, imposing a penalty on "every person who peddles, hawks, sells, or exhibits for sale, any goods, wares, or merchandise not the growth or manufacture of Rush county, Indiana, or shall take orders for any such goods, wares, or merchandise for immediate or future delivery about the streets, alleys, hotels, business houses, or at any public or private place in said city," without a license,—was held void both because it violated section 28 of article 1 of the State Constitution, which provides that "the general assembly shall not grant to any citizen, or class of citizens, privileges or immunities which upon the same terms shall not equally belong to all citizens," and because of its plain repugnance to the Federal Constitution, which commits to congress the exclusive power to regulate commerce among the several states. The provision in that ordinance that brought it in conflict with both constitutions, in the opinion of the court, was its discrimination against "any goods, wares, or merchandise not the growth or manufacture of Rush county, Indiana." Graffy had been taking orders from citizens of said city for shirts, socks, and men's furnishing goods, about the streets, etc., of said city, which were not of the growth or manufacture of said Rush county. That he resided in Indianapolis, and was in the employ of Paul H. Krauss, a manufacturer and dealer in such goods, residing and having his business house in the city of Indianapolis. That Graffy's manner of business was to carry samples of the different articles manufactured or sold by his employer, and exhibit them, from house to house, to individuals, not dealers, soliciting orders from each individual for such articles and in such quantities as the individual might require or purchase. The goods thus ordered were to be delivered at a future day, by express or otherwise. He delivered no goods, nor did he carry any goods with him, except the samples. It is easy to see that, as against Graffy, this ordinance, under the facts, was an infringement of the provision quoted from the State Constitution; but it is difficult to see how, under those facts, it violated any provision of the Federal Constitution. It is also easy to see that a case might arise, on a different state of facts, that would make the ordinance void, as to that case, because of its infringement of the Federal Constitution. For instance, had the manufacturer and dealer in these goods been a resident of another state, and had his business house there, his goods then would have been the legitimate subjects of interstate commerce, and Grafty would have been engaged in interstate commerce, the exclusive power to regulate which is vested by the Federal Constitution in the congress of the United States. But the facts in that case show that Grafty was not engaged in interstate commerce, but that he was engaged in intrastate commerce; that his commerce and trade, and by which it was charged he violated the ordinance, were entirely confined within the boundaries of the state of Indiana, the power to regulate which has never been delegated by the Federal Constitution to congress, but has been retained by, and belongs to, the several states. The case, however, rightly decided that the ordinance was void because of its infringement of the state constitution, but not as an infringement of the Federal Constitution, under the facts of that case. It will be observed that the ordinance now before us makes no discrimination, but applies to all, without regard to residence or the place from whence the goods come.

Two questions arise under the assignment of errors and the contention of counsel: (1) Was the business of the appellee, conducted in the manner described in the complaint and agreed facts, within the prohibition of the ordinance against hawking and peddling? (2) Was the ordinance in question a valid exercise of the power vested in the city by the statute referred to? The answer to both questions depends, to some extent, upon the answer to the question, What are hawking and peddling? Because it is that that the city is authorized to restrain, and requiring a license was held to be a restraint on such business in Huntington v. Chesebro, supra. In Grafty v. Rushville, supra, it was said: "The extent of the power conferred upon cities by the statute, in this connection, is to restrain hawking and peddling, and any mode of selling which does not legitimately fall within these terms cannot be made unlawful by being specially described and restrained in the ordinance. Such sales and exhibitions of wares, and such orders for the future delivery of goods, and such only, as are embraced by the terms 'hawking and peddling,' may be restrained by ordinances duly passed under the power conferred by the statute above set out." We must therefore inquire and ascertain what constitutes a hawker and a peddler. This court, in the case last referred to, adopted the definition of Chief Justice Shaw in Com. v. Ober, 12 Cush. 493, which definition has been adopted by many courts,—among them the Supreme Court of the United States, in Emert v. Missouri, 156 U. S. 296, 39 L. ed. 480. It was said by Chief Justice Shaw that "the leading, primary idea of a hawker and peddler is that of an itinerant or traveling trader, who carries goods about in order to sell them, and who actually sells them, to purchasers, in contradistinction to a trader, who has goods for sale, and sells them, in a fixed place of business. Superadded to this (though, perhaps, not essential), by a 'hawker' is generally understood one who not only carries goods for sale, but seeks for purchasers, either by outcry, which some lexicographers conceive as intimated by the derivation of the word, or by attracting notice and attention to them as goods for sale, by actual exhibition or exposure of them, by placards or labels, or by a conventional signal, like the sound of a horn for the sale of fish." Webster defines "peddling" as traveling about and selling small wares, and "hawking" as offering for sale in the streets by outcry. Another definition also adopted by this court in the case referred to, and by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case referred to, runs thus: "A peddler, petty chapman, or other trading person, going from town to town, or to other men's houses, and traveling, either on foot or with horse or horses, or otherwise carrying to sell, or exposing to sale, any goods, wares, or merchandise." Rapalje & Lawrence, Law Dict. title "Hawker." This court and the Supreme Court of the United States, in the cases mentioned, quote with approval another definition found in the various law dictionaries, showing the disfavor in which the common law held the vocation, as follows: "Hawkers. Those deceitful fellows who went from place to place buying and selling brass, pewter, and other goods and merchandise which ought to be uttered in open market, were of old so called; and the appellation seems to grow from their uncertain wandering, like persons that, with hawks, seize their game where they can find it. . . . Hawk-ers and peddlers, etc., going from town to town or house to house, are now to pay a fine and duty to the king." The purpose and policy of the statute in empowering cities to pass ordinances in restraint of hawking and peddling was probably twofold. One and the principal object to be attained was the protection and encouragement of local dealers and merchants, who are largely dependent for their patronage on their reputation for integrity and fair dealing, and their social and moral standing in the community, and who, by investing their means, providing fixed places of trade, and paying taxes on their merchandise, help to build up and maintain the city in which they reside, and contribute to the support of its schools, and other local interests and enterprises. The other was to prevent the indiscriminate invasion of the houses and places of business of citizens, and shield them from the practices of itinerant traders of unknown repute, who may be frequently patronized by persons in order to be rid of their importunities and presence. Under these definitions of "hawking and peddling," the city was amply empowered to enact the ordinances in question. The police power vested by the statute in the city may be properly exerted to restrain all such as, by their methods of doing business, are liable to invade social order, or injuriously affect the prosperity of the city, by seeking purchasers for their wares in the homes of citizens, or in the streets or public places of a city, to the discouragement of the more legitimate methods of others on whom the municipality is dependent for its support. In Grafty v. Rushville, supra, it was said: "Any method of selling goods, wares, or merchandise by outcry on the streets or public places in a city, or by attracting persons to purchase goods exposed for sale at such places, by placards or signals, or by going from house to house, selling or offering goods for sale at retail to individuals not dealers in such commodities, . . . constitutes the person so selling a hawker or peddler, within the meaning of the statute. In this way we are brought to the conclusion that the appellant's method of conducting business was within the prohibition against hawking and peddling without being duly licensed." The same is true in the case now before us.

The next question is, Was the ordinance in question a valid exercise of the power vested in the city by the statute? The answer to that question depends upon whether the ordinance violates or infringes any of the limitations of the constitution, state or federal. It is not claimed that it violates any provision of the state constitution, or infringes any of its provisions. This is practically conceded by the appellee. But he contends earnestly that it infringes that provision of the Federal Constitution which vests in congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states. It is contended that the business of the appellee, and the manner in which it was conducted, as shown by the agreed statement of the facts, made it interstate commerce, and therefore beyond the control of the state authorities. In support of this contention, appellee's counsel cite and rely on Brennan v. Titusville, 153 U. S. 389, 38 L. ed. 719. It was said in that case, quoting from Chief Justice Fuller in Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, 8 Intern. Com. Rep. 36, that: "The power vested in congress 'to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes' is the power to prescribe the rule by which that commerce is to be governed, and is a power complete in itself, acknowledging no limitations other than those prescribed in the constitution. It is coextensive with the subject on which it acts, and cannot be stopped at the external boundary of the state, but must enter its interior, and must be capable of authorizing the disposition of those articles which it introduces, so that they may become mingled with the common mass of property within the territory entered. Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23; Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 13 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 878. And while, by virtue of its jurisdiction over persons and property within its limits, a state may provide for the security of the lives, limbs, health, and comfort of persons and the protection of property so situated, yet a subject-matter which has been confided exclusively to congress by the constitution is not within the jurisdiction of the state, unless placed there by congressional action." But the facts in that case (Brennan

v. Titusville) were entirely different from those in the case at bar, though, at first blush, they may seem to be very similar. In that case, J. A. Shephard was a manufacturer of picture frames and maker of portraits, residing in Chicago, Ill., of which state he was a citizen, and in which city he had his factory and place of business. He employed agents, who, under his direction, solicited orders for pictures and picture frames in the state of Pennsylvania and other states of the Union, by going personally to residents and citizens of said states, and exhibiting samples,—going, when necessary, from house to house. Brennan was an agent of Shephard, employed by him to travel and solicit orders for said articles, in the manner stated, upon a salary, and also upon commission upon amount of his sales. Upon receiving orders for pictures and picture frames, the agents of said Shephard forwarded the same to him, at Chicago, Ill., where the goods were made, and from there said Shephard shipped the goods to the purchasers in Titusville, Pa., by railroad, freight and express; and the price of said goods was collected and forwarded by the express companies, and sometimes by the agents, to Shephard, at Chicago, Ill. The agent, Brennan, employed by said Shephard, was engaged in conducting the business in the manner stated at the time of his arrest in said city of Titusville, Pa. There was at the time in force in said city an ordinance enacted by said city of Titusville, providing "that all persons canvassing or soliciting within said city orders for goods, books, paintings, wares, or merchandise of any kind, or persons delivering such articles under orders so obtained or solicited, shall be required to procure from the mayor a license to transact said business, and shall pay to said treasurer therefor the following sums, according to the time said license shall be granted," and then follows the price of the license for the different lengths of time for which they may be granted. The penalty provided for a violation of the ordinance was a fine not exceeding $100, nor less than the amount required for a license to such person, together with 20 per cent added, with costs of suit. The agent had not procured a license when he did the business with which he was charged. It was further said in that case, quoting from the opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley in Laloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 645, 32 L. ed. 811, 813, 2 Intern. Com. Rep. 184, that, "of course, the exaction of a license tax as a condition of doing any particular business is a tax on the occupation, and a tax on the occupation of doing a business is surely a tax on the business." And further quoting in that case from the opinion of Mr. Justice Field in Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 278, 28 L. ed. 847, 848, it was said: "Where the business or occupation consists in the sale of goods, the license tax required for its pursuit is, in effect, a tax upon the goods themselves." It was further said in the case of Brennan v. Titusville, supra, that "it is clear, therefore, that this license tax is not a mere police regulation, simply inconveniencing one engaged in interstate commerce, and so only indirectly affecting the business, but is a direct charge and burden upon that business; and, if a state may lawfully exact it, it may increase the amount of the exaction, until all interstate commerce in this mode ceases to be possible. And, notwithstanding the fact that the regulation of interstate commerce is committed by the constitution to the United States, the state is enabled to say that it shall not be carried on in this way, and, to that extent, to regulate it." And, after reviewing a long line of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, it was said by Mr. Justice Brewer, who delivered the opinion of the court, that, "within the reasoning of these cases, it must be held that the license tax imposed upon the defendant was a direct burden on interstate commerce, and was therefore beyond the power of the state." For that reason the judgment of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, which had held the ordinance valid, was reversed. It follows, therefore, from these principles, well established by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States,—the court of last resort upon such questions, and whose decisions thereon are binding upon and authoritative with us,—that if the goods involved in the case now before us were the subjects of interstate commerce at the time the appellee was dealing with them, and if the appellee, in selling them as he did, engaged in interstate commerce, then the ordinance he was charged with violating was void, at least as to him and that transaction. But it will have been observed that the facts in Brennan v. Titusville, supra, as before remarked, are very different from those in the case now before us. The goods in Brennan's Case, when his employment was at an end in each sale, were still in the manufacturer's possession, in another state than that in which he made the sales. His employment as a "person canvassing or soliciting within said city orders for goods," etc., was at an end, so far as the restriction in the ordinance went, when he transmitted the order for which he had canvassed or which he had solicited, to his employer, in the other state. Therefore, in taxing his occupation the goods were taxed by the ordinance before they had come into the state of Pennsylvania and become incorporated into the mass of property in that state, and while they were in the state of Illinois. Not so under the facts in the case now before us. Before appellee's employment can begin in any sale of chairs, as shown by the agreed state of facts, such chairs must be first shipped by their owners and manufacturers, A. H. Ordway & Co., in Massachusetts, into the state of Indiana, for sale by the appellee as their agent. The chairs, in the regular course of business as shown to have been conducted by the appellee, must reach their final destination and resting place in Indiana before appellee can have anything to do with them. After they reach such final destination, and not before, appellee's employment, which is taxed by ordinance, begins.

Whether such chairs, after their final destination is reached, are the subject of interstate commerce, is the turning point in this 29 L. R. A.

case, and is a very different question than that presented in Brennan v. Titusville, supra. There the employment of the agent ceased before the goods were shipped, even, and much longer before they reached their final destination and resting place, as to each particular sale. But the Supreme Court of the United States, more than one year later,—on March 4, 1895,—decided a case that is exactly in point, namely, Emert v. Missouri, supra. At page 309, 156 U. S., and page 483, 89 L. ed., Mr. Justice Gray, speaking for the court, said: "The facts were agreed, that the Singer Manufacturing Company for more than five years last past, and on the day in question, was a corporation of New Jersey; that the defendant, on and prior to that day, was in the employment of that company, and on that day, in pursuance of that employment, and having no peddler's license, was engaged in going from place to place in Montgomery county, in the state of Missouri, with a horse and wagon, soliciting orders for the sale of the company's sewing machines, and having with him in the wagon one of those machines, the property of the company and manufactured by it at its works in New Jersey, and which it had forwarded and delivered to him for sale on its account; and that he offered this machine for sale to persons at different places, and found a purchaser, and sold and delivered it to him. The supreme court of the state, in its opinion, understood and assumed the effect of those facts to be as follows: The defendant was engaged in going from place to place, selling and trying to sell sewing machines, in Montgomery county, in this state, and had been so engaged for some years. He carried the machines with him, in a wagon, and, on making a sale, delivered those sold to the purchaser. He was not only soliciting orders, but was making sales and delivering the property sold. These acts bring him clearly within the statutory definition of a 'peddler,' and, having no license from the state, he became liable to the penalties imposed by the statute, unless for any reason he was exempt from the operations of the law. . . . Upon any construction, it is clear that the defendant was engaged in going from place to place within the state, without a license, soliciting orders for the sale of sewing machines, having with him, in the wagon, at least one of those machines, and offering that machine for sale to various persons at different places, and that he finally sold it, and delivered it to the purchaser. . . . The defendant's occupation was offering for sale and selling sewing machines, by going from place to place in the state of Missouri, in a wagon, without a license. There is nothing in the case to show that he ever offered for sale any machine that he did not have with him at the time. His dealings were neither accompanied nor followed by any transfer from one state to another, and were neither interstate commerce, nor were they in any way directly connected with such commerce. The only business or commerce in which he was engaged was internal and domestic, and, so far as appears, the only goods in which he was dealing had become a part of the mass of property within the state. Both the occupation and the goods, therefore, were subject to the taxing power and to the police power of the state. The statute in question is no part of the revenue law. It makes no discrimination between residents or products of Missouri and those of other states, and manifests no intention to interfere in any way with interstate commerce. Its object in requiring peddlers to take out and pay for licenses, and to exhibit their licenses, on demand, to any peace officer, or to any citizen householder of the county, appears to have been to protect the citizens of the state against the cheats and frauds, or even thefts, which, as the experience of ages has shown, are likely to attend itinerant and irresponsible peddling from place to place and from door to door." A large number of the decisions of that court upon that question are reviewed in the case last quoted from above, and quotations made therefrom. Quoting from Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257, it is there said: "Coal brought in flat boats from Pittsburgh to New Orleans was still afloat in the Mississippi river after its arrival, in the same boats and in the same condition in which it had been brought, and was held in order to be sold, on account of the original owners, by the boat load; yet this court unanimously decided that a tax imposed by general statutes of the state of Louisiana upon this coal was valid, and, speaking by Mr. Justice Bradley, said: 'It was not a tax imposed upon the coal as a foreign product, or as the product of another state than Louisiana, nor a tax imposed by reason of the coal being imported or brought into Louisiana, nor a tax imposed whilst it was in a state of transit through that state to some other place of destination. It was imposed after the coal had arrived at its destination and was put up for sale. The coal had come to its place of rest, for final disposal or use, and was a commodity in the market of New Orleans.' The taxing of goods coming from other states, as such, or by reason of their so coming, would be a discriminating tax against them as imports, and would be a regulation of interstate commerce inconsistent with that perfect freedom of trade which congress has seen fit should remain undisturbed. But if, after their arrival within the state,—that being their place of destination for use or trade,—if, after this, they are subjected to a general tax, laid alike on all property within the city, we fail to see how such a taxing can be deemed a regulation of commerce which would have the objectionable effect referred to." And it was further there said: "In Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist., 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, indeed, the majority of the court held that a statute of Tennessee requiring 'all drummers, and all persons not having a regular licensed house of business in the taxing district, offering for sale or selling goods, wares, or merchandise therein by sample, to pay a certain sum, weekly or monthly, for a license, was, as applied to persons soliciting orders for goods on behalf of houses doing business in other states, unconstitutional as inconsistent with the power of congress to regulate commerce among the several states. . . . The distinction on which the judgment proceeded is clearly brought out in the following passages of the opinion: 'As soon as the goods are in the state, and become a part of its general mass of property, they will become liable to be taxed in the same manner as other property of similar character, as was distinctly held by this court in the case of Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257. When goods are sent from one state to another for sale or in consequence of a sale, they become a part of its general property and amenable to its laws, provided that no discrimination be made against them as goods from another state, and that they are not taxed by reason of being brought from another state, but only taxed in the usual way, as other goods are.' Ibid.; Howe Mach. Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. ed. 754. But to tax the sale of such goods or the offer to sell them, before they are brought into the state, is a very different thing, and seems to us clearly a tax on interstate commerce itself.' 'The negotiation of sales of goods which are in another state, for the purpose of introducing them into the state, is interstate commerce.' And quoting from the opinion of Mr. Justice Field in Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 847, involving a state statute discriminating against goods from other states, it was further said, in Emert v. Missouri, supra, that, "the commercial power continues until the commodity has ceased to be the subject of discriminating legislation by reason of its foreign character. That power protects it, even after it has entered the state, from any burdens imposed by reason of its foreign origin."

In the case now before us, the goods, as shown by the agreed state of facts, had been sent by the owners and manufacturers from one state into another—from Massachusetts to Indiana—for sale; reaching their final destination and resting place before they were sold, or offered to be sold, and before appellee's employment in connection with them commenced. His employment was taxed by the ordinance, and that was, under the authorities cited, a tax upon the goods themselves, it is true; but before such employment began the goods had reached their final destination and place of rest, and ceased to be subjects of interstate commerce, and had become incorporated in the general mass of property in this state, and liable to be taxed as other property, there being no discrimination made in the ordinance against them as goods from another state,—they not being taxed by reason of being brought from another state, but only taxed in the usual way as other goods are. There was no attempt, in the ordinance in question, to tax the sale of goods, or the offer to sell them, before they were brought into the state. There was no negotiation of sales of goods which were in another state, for the purpose of introducing them into this state. It will have been observed that in the case we have been quoting from (Emert v. Missouri, supra) the Supreme Court of the United States is careful to note that, while the defendant Emert's occupation was offering for sale and selling sewing machines manufactured and owned in New Jersey, yet that there was nothing in the case to show that he ever offered for sale any machine that he did not have with him at the time, and that his dealings were neither accompanied nor followed by any transfer of goods, or of any order for their transfer, from one state to another. Had it been otherwise, the case would have been ruled by Brennan v. Titusville, supra. There is no conflict between the two cases, as appellee's counsel seems to suppose. On the contrary, the opinion in the latter case expressly mentions the former as following the rule laid down in Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist., supra, and is in harmony with the rule laid down in the case then before the court; the conclusion there reached being that the Missouri statute then involved was in no wise repugnant to the power of congress to regulate commerce among the several states, but was a valid exercise of the power of the state over persons and business within its borders. That conclusion is decisive of the question here involved and discussed by counsel on both sides. But appellee's counsel seeks to avoid the force of that conclusion by contending that the facts agreed upon do not bring the present case within that rule, because, as he contends, "the defendant was engaged in the sale of chairs on the installment plan. When a purchaser was found, only a conditional sale was made, the title being retained in the foreign owner until some indefinite time in the future. It might never vest in the purchaser, for the reason that he might never comply with the conditions of the sale." And the further contention is that an actual sale is necessary to bring the defendant within the rule laid down in Emert v. Missouri, supra, by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is a sufficient answer to that contention to say that, while that case was one where an actual sale had been made, yet no rule was there laid down that an actual sale was necessary in that or any other case, though the prosecution was for a violation of a statute providing that "no person shall deal as a peddler without a license." Whether that statute was actually violated, or not, by Emert, was not discussed or decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, because that was not a federal question, and that court has no jurisdiction on a writ of error to the supreme court of a state, as was the case there, to decide anything but federal questions. The ordinance here involved, however, was very different from the Missouri statute. The ordinance prohibited hawking and peddling without a license, and, under the authorities already cited, that forbade selling and offering to sell. The Missouri statute would probably have been held by the supreme court of that state, had the question been presented, to require actual dealing by a peddler to constitute a violation thereof. But the learned counsel for the appellee himself speaks of the transactions of his client, as shown in the agreed facts, as a "sale," and the persons to whom such sales were made as "a purchaser." This is significant. It indicates that the learned counsel, though deeply interested in showing that such transactions were not sales, and that the persons with whom his client had them were not purchasers, yet, with all his learning, could find no word in the English language that would so aptly and tersely express what the acts of his client meant or amounted to, or would so correctly characterize them, as the word "sale," and no word that would so correctly characterize the persons with whom his client had the transactions as the word "purchaser." The circumstance that the sales were on the installment plan, the title being retained in the foreign owner until the terms and conditions of the sale were complied with, did not wholly eliminate from the transaction all characteristics of a contract of sale. In an executed contract of sale, the thing which is the subject of the contract becomes the property of the buyer the moment the contract is concluded, and without regard to the fact whether the goods be delivered to the buyer or remain in the possession of the seller, whereas, in an executory contract of sale, the goods remain the property of the seller till the contract is executed. 21 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 478, and numerous authorities there cited in note 1, among which are Straus v. Ross, 25 Ind. 300, and Lester v. East, 49 Ind. 588. Most of the sales made by commercial travelers or drummers are mere conditional sales, yet no one thinks of denying that they are sales, the title to the property remaining in the seller until the conditions of the sale are fully complied with. And yet those transactions are correctly denominated "sales." Where personal property is sold for cash on delivery, the sale is conditional, and the title to the property will not vest in the purchaser until the terms of the sale are complied with. Lanman v. McGregor, 94 Ind. 301; Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Erwin, 84 Ind. 457. And yet no one would, in his senses, think of denying that such a transaction was a sale. If such contention were to prevail, all sales by hawkers and peddlers might escape all restraint by cities, by inserting such a provision in the contract.

It is lastly contended that the agreed facts do not show that appellee was guilty of a violation of the ordinance, because there is no statement therein "that, while so engaged, the defendant sold and delivered to one Emma Wright one rattan rocking-chair, for the sum of six dollars," as was charged in the complaint. It is true that statement was in the complaint, and is not found in the agreed facts, and if that were the only charge in the complaint the trial court would have been justified in finding for the defendant. In addition to the above charge, the complaint charges "that the defendant, on the 12th day of September, 1894, at the city and county aforesaid, violated sections 24 and 25 of the ordinance [describing it], by carrying on the business of hawking and peddling within the corporate limits of the city of South Bend, by carrying, exposing, offering, and crying for sale articles of merchandise, to wit, rattan rocking-chairs, in the public streets of said city, without having a license for that purpose." Among other things, the agreed facts are that "the defendant, . . . at the time of his arrest, and before, was engaged in selling chairs within the corporate limits of the city of South Bend, by going personally from house to house within said city, and selling the chairs, and delivering the same at the time of sale," etc. He could not be selling chairs without making actual sales, and if he did it by going personally from house to house in said city, selling the chairs and delivering the same, as he has agreed that he did, then he violated the ordinance, in both hawking and peddling.

The necessary conclusion, upon authority as well as upon principle, is that the ordinance in question is in no wise repugnant to the power of congress to regulate commerce among the several states, but is a valid exercise of the police power of the state, vested by the state statute in the city, over persons and business within its borders. It follows that the finding and decision of the circuit court were contrary to law and the evidence, and that it erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to sustain the motion for a new trial, and for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

v.

J. W. YOUNG, Impleaded, etc.

(87 Vt. 574.)

The low-water mark, which in Vermont defines the limit of private ownership of land abutting upon a navigable lake, is the ordinary low-water mark, and not the point to which the water recedes in an exceptionally dry season.

(July 17, 1885.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Franklin County Court made during the trial of an action to recover a penalty and damages under Acts 1884, No. 79, for alleged trespass on plaintiff's property for shooting game. Judgment reversed.

Plaintiff owned some land bordering on Lake Champlain, at a place called Gander Bay, the waters of which are at all times very shallow. He had, in compliance with Acts 1884, No. 79, posted notices prohibiting shooting, trapping, or fishing on the land. Defendant rowed in a boat into the bay to a point where some wild rice and wild oats had been sown by the plaintiff, and, against a warning of plaintiff's servants that he was trespassing upon plaintiff's land, fired a gun at a flock of wild ducks passing over. The referee found that the place where the gun was fired was about forty rods from dry land, that the water at the time was about eight inches deep, and that in propelling the boat to where it rested, some of the rushes had been broken down, and that the boat when removed left a mark in the mud upon the bottom. The referee also reported that the place where the boat rested was in ordinary times covered with water to the depth of six or eight inches, and that in the season of 1882, which was an exceptionally dry one, the water so far receded as to leave the place where the boat rested uncovered.

ters of Lake Champlain. Both parties conceded that by the law of this state the plaintiff's land does not extend beyond low-water mark. Such is the law of this state. Fletcher v. Phelps, 28 Vt. 257; Jakeway v. Barrett, 38 Vt. 316; Austin v. Rutland R. Co. 45 Vt. 238. The contention is over the meaning of the term "low-water mark," as used by the courts and law writers. The plaintiff insists that it means the lowest point to which the water has ever receded. The defendant says that it means ordinary low-water mark. By the common law all that portion of land on tide waters between high and low water mark, technically known as the "shore," originally belonged to the crown, and was held in trust by the king for public uses, and was not subject to private uses without a special patent or grant. Mobile v. Esava, 9 Port. (Ala.) 577, 33 Am. Dec. 325; Pike v. Monroe, 36 Me. 809, 58 Am. Dec. 751; 8 Kent, Com. 11th ed. *427. In Maine the common law was changed by an ordinance of 1641, which declares that proprietors of land adjacent to the tide waters "shall have propriety to the low-water mark," "where the sea doth not ebb above a hundred rods, and not more wheresoever it ebbs further." For the whole article, see Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 67. In Gerrish v. Union Wharf Proprs., 26 Me. 384, 46 Am. Dec. 568, the court was called upon to define the meaning of "low-water mark" as used in that ordinance, and in passing upon the question said: "It evidently contemplates and refers to a mark which could be readily ascertained and established, and that to which the tide on its ebb usually flows out would be of that description. That place to which the tide might ebb, under an extraordinary combination of influences and of favoring winds, a few times during one generation, could not form such a known boundary as would enable the owner of flats to ascertain satisfactorily the extent to which he could build upon them. Much less would other persons, employed in the business of commerce and navigation, be able to ascertain with ease and accuracy whether they were encroaching upon private rights or not, by sinking a pier or placing a monument. It would seem to be reasonable that high and low water marks should be ascertained by the same rule. The place to which tides ordinarily flow at high water becomes thereby a well-defined line or mark, which at all times can be ascertained without difficulty. If the title of the owner of the adjoining land were to be regarded as extending, without the aid of the ordinance, to the place to which the lowest neap tides flowed, there would be found no certain mark or boundary by which its extent could be determined. The result would be the same if his title were to be limited to the place to which the highest spring tides might be found to flow. It is still necessary to ascertain his boundary at high-water mark in all those places where the tide ebbs and flows more than one hundred rods, for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of his title towards low-water mark. It is only by considering the ordinance as having reference to the ordinary high and low water marks that a line of boundary at low-water mark becomes known, which can be satisfactorily proved, and which, having been once ascertained, will remain permanently established." Sir Matthew Hale, in his treatise De Jure Maris, chap. 4, says: "The shore is that ground that is between the ordinary high and low water mark." He remarks also: "It is certain that that which the sea overflows, either at high spring tides or at extraordinary tides, comes not, as to this purpose, under the denomination of 'litus maris,' and consequently the king's title is not of that large extent; but only to land that is usually overflowed at ordinary tides." This treatise has been received by judicial tribunals and by distinguished jurists, both during the earlier and later years of the law, with unqualified approbation and commendation. The authorship of this work has been questioned, but it has often been recognized in this country by the courts, and has become a text-book. Houck, Rivers, § 80. In Storer v. Freeman, 6 Mass. 486, 4 Am. Dec. 155, it was in effect held that low-water mark, as applied to the seashore, is ordinary low-water mark. In Canal Comrs. v. People, 5 Wend. 423, cited in Gould on Waters, § 82, Chancellor Walworth, while holding that the common-law rule was applicable to the navigable fresh rivers of New York, said: "The principle itself does not appear to be sufficiently broad to embrace our large fresh-water lakes, or inland seas, which are wholly unprovided for by the common law of England. As to these there is neither flow of tide nor thread of stream, and our local law appears to have assigned the shores down to the ordinary low-water mark to the riparian owners, and the beds of the lakes, with the islands therein, to the public." In Sloan v. Diemiller, 34 Ohio St. 492, low-water mark is defined to be "ordinary low-water mark;" and in Sesman v. Smith, 24 Ill. 521, it is said to be the "line where water usually stands when unaffected by any disturbing cause." The question of what is meant by low-water mark as a terminus of boundary was discussed and passed upon in Storer v. Jack, 60 Pa. 339, 100 Am. Dec. 566, and it was held to be the ordinary low-water mark. While the opinion of the court disclaimed the application of any law except that of Pennsylvania to the question, the reasoning of the court is very satisfactory. It said: "To adopt any other rule than low-water mark, unaffected by drought, as the limit of title, would carry the rights of riparian owners far beyond boundaries consistent with the interests and policy of the state, and would confer title where heretofore none has been supposed to exist. . . . Ordinary high water and ordinary low water each has its reasonably well-defined mark, so nearly certain that there is not much difficulty in ascertaining it. The ordinary rise and fall of the stream usually finds nearly the same limits. But to bound title by a nick which is set by an extraordinary flood or an extreme drought would do injustice, and contravene the common understanding of the people."

These suggestions, as well as the others quoted, apply with great pertinency to the case at bar. Lake Champlain is a public, navigable water. It does not appear that at any other time in its history its waters have receded to the point to which they did in the exceptionally dry season of 1883. We think that upon reason and authority low-water mark, as a terminus of boundary, must be held to mean ordinary low-water mark. This being so, defendant Young did not enter upon the premises of the plaintiff, as the referee finds that Young's boat, from which he fired at the ducks passing overhead, at the time of such firing, was at a place in the lake below ordinary low-water mark. To dispose of the case it is not necessary for us to determine what right, if any, the public has to sail over lands bordering Lake Champlain between ordinary high and ordinary low-water marks, when such lands are covered with water; nor is it necessary to decide in respect to the right of the inhabitants of this state under chapter 2, section 40, of our State Constitution, in seasonable times "to hunt and fowl on the lands they hold, and on other lands not inclosed," nor in respect to the constitutionality of Statute 1884, No. 79, and we do not consider either of these questions.

Judgment reversed as to defendant Young, and judgment that he recover his costs.

Upon the question of inheritance by, through, or from an illegitimate, see note to Croan v. Phelps (Ky.) 23 L. R. A. 758 (1893).

I. The common-law doctrine.

By the common law as it existed in England prior to the Statute of Descents, 3 & 4 Wm. IV., chap. 106, the half blood were not entitled to inherit real estate as the collateral heir must have been the next collateral kinsman of the whole blood, to be able to take by descent. Litt. § 6; 2 Bl. Com. 224.

And therefore, by such law, if a man died seized of an estate of inheritance, leaving a brother of the half blood, but no heirs of the whole blood, the estate did not go to such brother of the half blood, but escheated to the lord for want of heirs. Brown v. Brown, 1 D. Chp. 360 (1815).

Section 9 of the above-mentioned statute, however, now governs the descent to the half blood, and provides that a kinsman of the half blood shall be capable of being heir; and that such kinsman shall inherit next after a kinsman in the same degree of the whole blood, and after the issue of such kinsman, when the common ancestor is a male, and next after the common ancestor when such ancestor is a female.

With respect to personal estate, there is now no preference given to the whole over the half blood in tracing the degrees of kindred in the distribution of an intestate's estate, as, by the cases of Moor v. Barham, cited in 1 P. Wms. 53 (1733); Jessopp v. Watson, 1 Myl. & K. 665, 3 L. J. Ch. N. S. 197 (1838); Burnet v. Mann, 1 Ves. Sr. 155, 1 Myl. & K. 672, note (1748); Smith v. Tracy, 1 Mod. 209 (1676); and Crooke v. Watt, 2 Vern. 124 (1690),—brothers and sisters of the half blood have an equal claim with those of the whole blood.

And this is so even in the case of an alien of the half blood. Crooke v. Watt, supra.

And in the case of estate tail the half blood coming within the description of the entail may inherit as effectually as the whole blood, the rule of possessio fratris not applying. Doe, Gregory, v. Whicheo, 8 T. R. 211 (1790).

Under the English Statute, 1 James II., chap. 17, brothers and sisters of the half blood of an intestate are equally entitled with brothers and sisters of the whole blood to share with their mother after the death of the intestate's father, in the personal property of the intestate dying without wife or children. Jessopp v. Watson, supra.

In Earl of Winchelsea v. Norcliffe, 1 Vern. 485 (1686), the court was of the opinion that where there was a brother of the whole blood of the intestate, and a sister of the half blood, the sister should have taken half a share, but this decision was reversed in Crooke v. Watt, supra.

In Burnet v. Mann, 1 Ves. Sr. 155, 1 Myl. & K. 672, note (1748), the claim of a posthumous brother of the half blood was allowed, under the English Statute, 1 James II., chap. 17, § 7, the testator having died leaving a widow and three children, bequeathing a certain sum to one of his sons, who afterwards died an infant in the lifetime of his mother and before the birth of a half brother by the second marriage of his mother.

In Collingwood v. Pace, 1 Vent. 424 (1693), it was said that the brother of a half blood was nearer than an uncle, and was therefore preferred in the administration, as the uncle on the part of a father had no more blood of the mother than the brother to the intestate by gift, devise, or descent from an ancestor, unless they are of the blood of such ancestor, or there are none of his blood in existence.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

of the second venter, and he had the immediate blood of the father, which the uncle had not. To the same effect, Cowper v. Cowper, 2 P. Wms. 720 (1784).

Under the Spanish law, if a man dies leaving no descendant but his mother and brothers both of the whole and of the half blood, his mother succeeds to him to the exclusion of all the brothers. Cutter v. Waddingham, 22 Mo. 206, 280 (1855).

II. In the United States.

The question is dealt with by the legislatures of the several states of the Union, and is therefore dependent upon the terms and provisions of the state statutes, which, with but very few exceptions, make express provisions for the descent and distribution of estates among kindred of the half blood.

Most of the statutes dealing with the matter provide for the equal distribution of personal estate between the two classes, but make a distinction in the case of real estate when the estate descending is ancestral in its character, in which case those of the blood of the ancestor are preferred.

In a very few cases it will be found that the statutes make no provisions, either express or implied, regarding the half blood by which they are either included or excluded, but the courts have in such cases construed the intention of the legislature as leaning to the former rather than to the latter result, and they have therefore been admitted to take thereunder.

Some cases are to be found in which the half blood have been preferred to remoter issue of the whole blood, and others admitting those of posthumous birth. So cases are to be found wherein the legislature has thought fit to exclude or restrict them to half portions.

The exclusion of the half blood being looked upon as a hardship, and as no necessity growing out of our tenure exists for its continuance, it has been abrogated, except in the cases provided for by statute, and perhaps some exceptional cases not provided for by the express provisions of the act regulating descents; and in the state of New York there is no distinction between the whole and the half blood as to descents from brothers and sisters, except in the case of ancestral inheritance. Valentine v. Wetherill, 31 Barb. 655 (1860).

The question of descent and distribution among the half blood would seem to be a matter wholly within the control of state statutes, for the reason that the distribution and right of succession to the estates of deceased persons are matters exclusively of state cognizance. Cope v. Cope, 137 U. S. 682, 34 L. ed. 832 (1891).

And the different states have authority to regulate and provide a system of descents and distributions of estates within their respective jurisdictions in such cases. Cox v. Clark, 33 Ala. 400 (1891).

At common law, the half blood was entirely excluded from the inheritance.

2 Bl. Com. 227; 3 Lead. Cas. Am. Real Prop. 428.

All enactments pertaining to the inheritance of kindred of the half blood are in derogation of the common law, and consequently must be strictly construed and not extended in meaning by judicial act.

"Half blood" is a term denoting the degree of relationship which exists between those who have one parent only in common.

1 Bouvier, Dict. p. 789; 9 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 261.

Descent, succession, or purchase, among the half as well as the whole blood, depends upon the municipal regulations of each state, and no duty more delicate can be imposed on courts of justice than to pass upon and enforce these regulations. Kelly v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 555, 582 (1855).

The English rules or canons of inheritance, being of feudal origin, are not followed by the laws of Delaware; and the entire exclusion of the half blood has been deemed unreasonable, unnatural, a hardship, inconsistent with the character and policy of the government, and as not calculated to promote the true situations of the citizens. Doe, Kean v. Roe, 2 Harr. (Del.) 108, 29 Am. Dec. 336 (1838).

The common law of descents was entirely repealed by the Virginia Act of 1785, as revised by the Laws of 1792 and 1819, admitting the half blood. Davis v. Rowe, 6 Rand. (Va.) 355 (1828).

Whether or not property has been acquired by descent so as to admit the half blood must be determined by the canons of descent, and not by the equitable doctrine which follows a fund into whatever shape it may assume. Orr v. White, 106 Ind. 841 (1893).

III. Meaning of the words.

In this section the meaning placed upon the words therein specified is only considered so far as passed upon by the courts construing them, in considering the rights of kindred of the half blood under the various state statutes relating to descent and distribution among such kindred, and the section is therefore not intended to be an exhaustive collection of the authorities construing such words.

a. In general.

If the legislature makes use of a term without defining it, and it has by the common law received a settled meaning, it will be presumed that it is used in the same sense. Hillhouse v. Chester, 3 Day, 166, 3 Am. Dec. 265 (1806).

The above interpretation was placed upon the Connecticut statute of distribution prior to the Revision of 1784, by which real and personal estate were placed upon the same footing, the term "next of kin," as used therein, relating to both real and personal estate, and therefore the issue of the whole blood of the first purchaser were not alone entitled to real estate.

b. Ancestor.

Descent, or hereditary succession, is the title whereby a man on the death of his ancestor acquires his estate by right of representation as his heir at law, an heir being he upon whom the law casts the estate immediately at the death of the ancestor, the estate so descending being the inheritance. Freeman v. Allen, 17 Ohio St. 527 (1867).—In which case the question arose as to the descent of an estate taken under the provisions of the Ohio statute relating to partition proceedings, under

Robert Anderson was a half brother of Margaret and of the blood of the common ancestor, and, had he survived Margaret, would have inherited. But Robert's children (appellees) are not half-blood relatives of Margaret, and under the Law of 1862 cannot inherit.

For many years prior to 1862, descendants of kindred of the half blood did inherit. By omitting the word "descendants" the legislature declared its intention to go back to the rule declared by the Ordinance of 1787, equalizing those of the whole and those of the half blood, children of a common parent.

Every act is made, either for the purpose of making a change in the law, or for the purpose of better declaring the law.

Potter's Dwar. Stat. p. 155.

Courts are not at liberty to suppose or to hold that the legislature intended anything different from what their language imports.

The following cases are all the decisions of this court upon the act in question, and in no case is the right of descendants of kindred of the half blood considered. In parenthesis is the act under which the case arose.

which one co-owner had elected to take the estate, and, having obtained a conveyance thereof, died intestate leaving issue of the whole and half blood, the point being whether the estate vested in such cotenant by descent or by purchase so as to exclude or include the half blood.

An estate by purchase is one acquired by sale or gift, or by any other method, except only that of descent, and the law knows no such distinction between a gift or devise by a stranger and a gift or devise by an ancestor, and nothing in any Maryland act warrants such distinction. Hall v. Jacobs, 4 Harr. & J. 245, 254 (1815),—wherein the question was as to whether an estate became vested in the deceased by descent or purchase so as to admit the half blood.

As used in the Connecticut statute admitting the half blood (Gen. Stat. Rev. 1896, § 59, p. 415) the word refers to the immediate, and not to the remote, ancestor. Clark v. Shaller, 46 Conn. 119 (1878).

The word as found in Ind. Rev. Stat. 1843, § 114, p. 436, is not used in its usually defined meaning, but as synonymous with kindred, and must be construed as embracing all from whom a title by descent can be derived under any circumstances. Greenlee v. Davis, 19 Ind. 60 (1832),—where the question was, whether a half-brother of an intestate, who held under a devise, took equally with a brother of the whole blood.

Property acquired by descent is property which the law upon the death of the ancestor casts upon the heir. Orr v. White, 108 Ind. 341 (1886),—decided under the Indiana statute (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2472), which provides that the whole blood only take such estates.

A husband or wife from whom property descends, is, within the meaning of the Indiana statute, an ancestor. Cornett v. Hough, 126 Ind. 337 (1886).

By section 15 of 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat., p. 733, relatives of the half blood inherit equally with those of the whole blood in the same degree, unless the inheritance comes to the intestate by descent, devise, or gift of some one of his ancestors, in which case all those who are not of the blood of such ancestor are excluded from such inheritance. The term "ancestor" is used in the above section in its proper sense, and designates the immediate, and not the remote, source of the intestate's title and is not equivalent to the expression, "the parent or other kindred of the intestate," as used in the Rhode Island statute. Valentine v. Wetherill, 31 Barb. 655, 659 (1860).

The above section of the New York statute refers to the descent, devise, or gift last preceding the death of the intestate, the ancestor referred to being the immediate ancestor from whom the intestate received the inheritance by devise or gift. Wheeler v. Clutterbuck, 52 N. Y. 67 (1873).

It embraces collaterals as well as lineals through 29 L. R. A. whom an inheritance is derived. Ibid.; Emanuel v. Ennis, 16 N. Y. Week. Dig. 430, 16 Jones & S. 430 (1882),—wherein the court construed the 15th section of the New York Statute of Descents, 1 Rev. Stat., 733, as appertaining to the half blood.

It means any one from whom the estate is inheritable, and the ancestor from whom it must in law be understood to have come to the intestate is he from whom it was immediately inherited; therefore, under the Ohio Statute of 1831, it is not to be understood as when used in common parlance; an uncle of the intestate from whom the latter inherited being his ancestor in the sense of such statute. Prickett v. Parker, 3 Ohio St. 304 (1854); Brewster v. Benedict, 14 Ohio, 385 (1846).

In the former case an intestate left two infant sons and a widow. Upon the death of the survivor of such sons unmarried and without issue, the other son having died under age and without issue, it was held that the latter became the ancestor of the survivor as to a moiety, and that, therefore, the half brothers and sisters by the subsequent marriage of the widow took such share. Prickett v. Parker, supra.

In Brewster v. Benedict, 14 Ohio, 388 (1846), the question arose upon the joint construction of the clause in a will and of the Ohio statute, so as to admit the half blood. The estate in that case, which came to the intestate under a will, was that which he would have inherited as heir at law in case of intestacy. The court excluded the half blood, holding that the estate descended only to those who were of the blood of the testator, no matter whether such person was a lineal ancestor of the intestate or not.

Where an infant daughter died seized of an estate which had descended from her grandfather to her father, and from the latter to her, it was held, upon her death intestate and without issue, that the same passed to the half-blood brothers and sisters of her father, as against the brothers and sisters of the whole blood of the grandfather, the father being the immediate ancestor from whom the estate came to the intestate, the daughter. White v. White, 19 Ohio St. 531 (1860).

So, in construing the section of the New Jersey statute admitting the half blood (Act of Jan. 29, 1817, Rev. Laws, 608), the court held that the inheritance was to descend, not from the ancestor, but from the person last seized, subject, however, to this restriction, that in a specified case they were not to take: the descent was not to be cast upon them unless they were of the blood of the ancestor, but was in all cases to fall on them, and on them exclusively, when of such blood, the words "such ancestor," as used in the proviso in the New Jersey statute, clearly meaning, and being exclusively confined to, the ancestor from whom the lands came immediately to the person dying seized, and not embracing other or more remote ancestors, although the lands might have passed from or through such ancestors to the immediate ancestor. Den, Delaplaine, v. Jones, 8 N. J. L. 419, 424, 426 (1824).

c. Blood.

A person is with the most strict propriety of language affirmed to be of the blood of another, who has a portion, however small, of the same blood derived from a common ancestor. Hart's App. 8 Pa. 33 (1848). To the same effect is Gardner v. Collins, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 88, 7 L. ed. 347 (1829).

In the common law the word "blood" is used in the same sense. Gardner v. Collins, supra.

The phrase "of the blood," as contained in the Rhode Island statute, includes the half blood, such being the natural meaning of the word "blood," standing alone and unexplained by any context. Ibid.

A half brother or sister is of the blood of an ancestor, if each of them has some of the blood of a common parent in his or her veins. Ibid.

Whenever it is intended to express any qualification, the word "whole" or "half" blood is generally used to designate it, or the qualification is implied from the context or known principles of law. Ibid.

It is well settled that two persons are of the same blood, in part or in whole, who are descended from the same pair. If wholly descended from the same pair, as brothers and sisters having the same father and mother, they are wholly of the same blood, if they have different fathers and the same mother they are partly of the same blood, because they are descended from the same pair, namely their maternal grandfather and grandmother. Cole v. Batley, 3 Curt. C. C. 562 (1855).

The word "blood," in its technical and natural sense, includes the half blood. Kelly v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 555, 559 (1855); Baker v. Chalfant, 5 Whart. 477 (1855).

In construing the provisions of the New Jersey Statute of January 20, 1817, Rev. Laws, 608, relating to descent to the half blood, the court considered the meaning of the words "of the blood" of an ancestor as being that all are of the blood of an ancestor who may, in the absence of other and nearer heirs, take by descent from that ancestor. Den, Delaplaine v. Jones, 8 N. J. L. 419 (1824).

The term "descent," as used in the Ohio statute, has a fixed legal signification when used in relation to a transmission of title to real estate. Freeman v. Allen, 17 Ohio St. 527 (1867),—in which case the meaning of the word was considered with reference to the claim of the half blood, the question being whether an estate, which had descended to cotenants, part of which, under the Ohio partition act, the parties had taken by election according to the provisions of the 8th section of the Act, was acquired by descent or purchase so as to include or exclude the half blood.

The court in construing the term "the blood" of 29 L. R. A.

They are those of the whole blood and those of the half blood.

The term "brothers and sisters living and the descendants of such as are dead" is broad enough to include all brothers and sisters and their descendants, and Rev. Stat. 1861, § 2472, was enacted to remove the common-law limitation and place kindred of the half blood on equality with kindred of the whole blood.

Clark v. Sprague, 5 Blackf. 414.

McCabe, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A part of the appellees sued a part of the appellants for a partition of certain real estate in Carroll county, making the other ap-the ancestor, as used in the 15th section of the New York Act, held that it included the half blood, the words in their popular and ordinary sense including both those of the whole and the half blood, the term "of the blood" not indicating the quantity, but simply that there is some of that blood, whether the whole, or the half, or a smaller portion. Beebe v. Griffing, 14 N. Y. 235 (1856).

The kindred referred to in the 6th section of the Indiana Act must be kindred of the person last seized. McClanahan v. Trafford, 46 Ind. 410 (1874),—wherein the children of the widow by a former marriage sought, upon the widow's death, to inherit her share along with the issue of her second marriage, the court holding them so entitled. Smith v. Smith, 28 Ind. 202 (1854), to the same effect.

The word "family" as used in the section of the New Jersey statute providing for inheritance by the half blood, is to be construed in that sense in which the law uses it when speaking of descents, and in that restriction will comprehend only the descendants of such ancestor,—those who have his blood running in their veins,—and in that sense is nearly, if not quite, of the same import as the word "issue." Den, Pierson, v. De Hart, 8 N. J. L. 73 (1809).

The case of Brown v. Brown, 1 D. Chp. 300 (1815), did not involve the question whether the half blood stood in the same degree of kindred as brothers of the whole blood, but whether they were at all akin to each other. The court held that they had, as respects each other, but half of the blood of the common stock from which the descent was to be reckoned; but whether two persons are akin to each other does not depend upon the quantity of common blood, but on their actual derivation from the common stock; and that by such laws brothers and sisters of the half blood inherited the real estate and took the personality as next of kin to each other. See, also, Cutter v. Waddingham, 22 Mo. 206, 261-268 (1855), infra, head V.

d. Brothers and sisters.

The expression "brothers and sisters" includes the half blood. Gardner v. Collins, 8 Mason, 408 (1824), 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 58, 7 L. ed. 347 (1829); Cox v. Clark, 28 Ala. 400 (1861); *Clark v. appellees defendants, and the other appellants coplaintiffs, with themselves. Upon the issues formed there was a trial by the court without a jury, and at the request of both parties the court made a special finding of the facts, and stated its conclusions of law thereon. The conclusions of law are assigned for error.

As shown by the facts, John B. Anderson died testate on the 1st day of June, 1870, owner in fee simple of the real estate in controversy in this action. Margaret Anderson, a daughter of said John B. by his second wife, died intestate, August 27, 1880, owner in fee simple of said real estate, which she had received by devise from her father, John

B. That she left surviving her no father, no mother, no husband, and no children, or their descendants. Robert Anderson, who died long previous to the death of said Margaret, was a son of said John B. Anderson, by his first wife, and consequently was a half-brother of the said Margaret Anderson, of the blood of the common ancestor, John B. Anderson. Robert left surviving him his half-sister, Margaret, and several children, appellees herein, who in this action claim that they are of the blood of John B. Anderson, and are kindred of the half blood to Margaret, and, as descendants of Margaret's deceased half-brother, inherit Robert's interest in Margaret's said real estate. And

In Clark v. Pickering, 16 N. H. 295 (1844), it was held that, by the term "surviving brothers and sisters," the New Hampshire statute (N. H. Laws, ed. 1851, 207) did not intend to embrace a different class of persons from those indicated in the same clause by the words "children of the intestate."

And in Sheffield v. Lovering, 12 Mass. 490 (1815), these words were given the same construction.

Brothers and sisters, as used in subdivision 2 of section 1915 of the Alabama Code include those of the half blood, all inheriting equally the estate of a deceased brother or sister dying intestate without descendants, except as qualified and limited by section 1919 of the same. Cox v. Clark, 98 Ala. 400 (1891).

The words "relatives of the half blood shall inherit equally with those of the whole blood in the same degree," in section 15 of the New York Statute, mean that such relatives shall inherit precisely as they would have done had they been of the whole blood, and it cannot be doubted that they must be applied to every case of descent for which the preceding sections of the chapter were meant to provide, and that therefore, applying them as thus construed to section 8, in all cases of a newly purchased inheritance arising under section 8 of the Act, all brothers and sisters and their descendants of the half blood are to take as relatives of the whole blood. Brown v. Burlingham, 5 Sandf. 418, 422 (1852).

Under the 4th subdivision of the Ohio Law of 1835, the half brothers and sisters of the ancestor are included in the words "brothers and sisters of such ancestor," and are preferred to the brothers and sisters of the intestate of the half blood, who are not of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate came. Oliver v. Sanders, 8 Ohio St. 501 (1858).

Half-brothers of the intestate are of the blood of such ancestor, but not of the whole blood. Ibid.

In the above case the court stated that to limit the words of the 4th subdivision to brothers and sisters of the ancestor of the whole blood would not be in accordance with the presumptive intention of the legislature.

"Brothers and sisters," in section 4162 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio, mean both the whole and the half blood. Ibid.; White v. White, 19 Ohio St. 586 (1869).

The Ohio Statute of 1877 was passed to change section 4159 of the Ohio Statute of Descent and Distribution, as under such section, according to the case of Brower v. Hunt, 18 Ohio St. 311 (1868), the estate would go to brothers and sisters of the whole blood alone. Stone v. Doster, 7 Ohio Co. Ct. Rep. 515 (1892).

To say that brothers and sisters or their legal representatives should be read to mean brothers and sisters of the whole blood, and, if there are none, to brothers and sisters of the half blood, violates one of the cardinal rules of construction, that when an estate goes to a class of persons each of the class takes. Ibid.

In Stone v. Doster, 7 Ohio Co. Ct. Rep. 8 (1892), the question for the decision of the court was the construction of Ohio Rev. Stat. § 4162, and was whether the words "one half to the brothers and sisters of such deceased husband or wife from whom such personal or real estate came" included in the words "brothers and sisters" both brothers and sisters of the whole and half blood when both classes existed, the court answering the same in the affirmative, stating that those who take property as a class of persons described, where there is nothing in the law making the appropriation to distinguish their respective rights, take in equal shares; citing the language of the court in Knapp v. Windsor, 8 Cush. 186 (1850).

There are cases, however, which hold that the half blood are not included in such expression; thus—

In Lawson v. Perdriau, 1 McCord, L. 456 (1821), the court, in construing the provision of the South Carolina Act of 1797, held that if brothers and sisters comprehend those of the whole and half blood then not only would brothers of the whole and half blood and parents be placed upon the same footing and constitute but one class instead of three, but, by the provision of the act, the issue of the half blood would be made to take by representation, or per stirpes, equally with the issue of the brother of the whole blood, and that such a change in the rules of the Act of 1791 should be imperatively ordered before being adopted, otherwise new principles might, by construction, be introduced.

The term of the South Carolina Act of 1797 is, "brothers and sisters," and the strict import of the words used conspires with the apparent object which led to the act, to confine the meaning of brothers and sisters to those of the whole blood, an act amending a prior one not being construed to alter the rules laid down in the primary act, except so far as is plainly required, the prior Act of 1791 not only giving the whole estate to the brothers and sisters of the whole blood in exclusion of the half, and to parents in exclusion of both, but confining the right of taking by representation among collateral kindred to the issue of brothers and sisters of the whole blood. Lawson v. Perdriau, supra.

Whenever in the rules of descent and distribution of real estate, the word "brother" is used in an uncertain sense, it should, by analogy to the meaning of the same word in the canons of descent, be construed brothers of the whole blood, where the canons of descent are in force, except so far as they may have been altered or have become inapplicable. Ibid.

In Wren v. Carnes, 4 Deanna. Eq. 405 (1813), it was held that, under the provisions of the South Carolina Act of 1791, the half blood were postponed one the trial court so held. This presents the principal legal question in the case, viz., Do the descendants of kindred of the half blood inherit equally with kindred of the whole blood? The solution of the question rests upon the statute law of Indiana, for the law of descent is a matter which each state must regulate for itself. Cope v. Cope, 187 U. S. 682, 84 L. ed. 832. Considering the legislation chronologically, we find that the Ordinance of Congress of July 18, 1787, provided rules of inheritance in the territory of which the state of Indiana was formed, and it was therein provided that there should, "in no case, be a distinction between kindred of the whole and half blood," and that such law should "remain in full force until altered by the legislature of the district." Rev. Stat. 1843, p. 20. The 2d section of the Act to Regulate Descents, approved January 2, 1817 (the first enactment by the state), provided generally that "brothers and sisters of such deceased person dying intestate, and their descendants," shall inherit equally. Ind. Laws 1818, p. 188; Ind. Rev. Laws 1834, p. 154. The next act regulating descents was that of January 29, 1831, and there was no change in this respect. Rev. Stat. 1831, p. 208, § 2. The Act of February 17, 1838 (sec. 2), provided that "if there be no father or mother, then the whole shall be equally divided among the brothers and sisters, or their degree to the whole blood in the succession to both real and personal property, and that the Act of 1797, which referred to the Act of 1791 and related to the same subject, must be taken to be one system and construed consistently; and that the general words "brothers and sisters" were broad enough to include brothers and sisters of the half blood, but that the Act of 1797 was open to two constructions, one consistent, and the other inconsistent, with the Act of 1791, the court adopting the former, holding that the same postponement took place thereunder.

In Sharp v. Klitenpeter, 7 La. Ann. 264 (1852), the question turned upon the meaning of the words "lawful heirs" as used in the testator's will, the court construing them to mean the half as well as the whole blood, and, they being free from ambiguity, and evidence to prove that the testator meant only a portion of her heirs at law was refused.

IV. No distinction between the whole and half blood.

In considering what ancestral estates are within the meaning of the state statutes, the courts in general hold that those acquired by gift, descent, or devise are mostly within the exceptions relating to such estates.

In the following cases, however, the courts have held that the whole and half blood take equally:

Thus, it has been held in Alabama that money, the product of the hire of an intestate's slaves after distribution, is not a part of the inheritance, and is therefore not acquired by descent, devise, or gift, and is therefore distributable between the whole and half blood, under section 1756 of the Code. Johnson v. Copeland, 35 Ala. 521 (1860).

The statute of that state abolishes the distinction between the whole and the half blood as to the descent of estates, except in the single instance of the inheritance coming from an ancestor who was of the blood of one and not of the other class. Eatman v. Eatman, 88 Ala. 478 (1893).

In that case the intestate was twice married, there being children by each marriage, and the land was allotted to her after the death of her last husband by virtue of the statutes as a homestead exempt from sale for the husband's debts, and which she was permitted to retain until it was ascertained whether his estate was solvent or insolvent. The estate being vested in her absolutely, was held to be acquired by her, not by inheritance from an ancestor, but by statutory right, and the children of both marriages therefore stood in the same degree of relationship and no distinction was made between them, as the words of the statute, "came to the intestate by descent, devise, or gift from or of some one of his ancestors," had no application to the case. Ibid.

All property owned by an intestate dying without lineal descendants, leaving brothers and sisters of the whole and half blood, and not coming to him by descent, devise, or gift from or of some one of his ancestors, and which may be called a "new acquisition," goes equally to the brothers and sisters, whether of the whole or half blood, by virtue of section 1919 of the Alabama Code of 1894. Cox v. Clark, 93 Ala. 400, 408 (1891); Johnson v. Copeland, 35 Ala. 521 (1860).

Brothers and sisters, as stated in section 1914, subd. 2, of the Alabama Code of 1894, include the half blood, and all inherit equally except as qualified by section 1919. And it has been held that children, or their descendants, of an intestate, or an intestate dying without children, leaving brothers and sisters or their descendants, take by representation without regard to degree; that is, the children or grandchildren take the same share that their deceased parents would have inherited if living, and by representation they are held to be in the same degree as such ancestor if he were living. Cox v. Clark, supra; Hitchcock v. Smith, 1 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 29 (1832).

The children of a deceased half brother and sister by right of representation stand in equal degree of relationship to the intestate with the surviving brothers and sisters of the whole and half blood, and per stirpes they are entitled to the distributive shares in the estate which their parents would have received if living. Stallworth v. Stallworth, 29 Ala. 78 (1856),—in which case the intestate died, leaving several brothers and sisters both of the whole and of the half blood, and nephews and nieces, the children of deceased brothers and sisters of the half blood.

So in newly acquired estates they inherit equally with the whole blood in the same degree. In Arkansas. Kelly v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 555, 582 (1855).

In Clark v. Russell, 2 Day, 112 (1805), the half blood were held entitled to an equal share with the whole blood, in estates coming from the common ancestor, under the Connecticut statute of distribution previous to the Revision of 1784.

The general object of the intestate law of Delaware is to continue the estate in the family of the intestate, without regard to the families or connections of those from whom it may have descended to the intestate, looking principally to a paramount claim of proximity of blood to the intestate. Doe, Kean, v. Roe, 2 Harr. (Del.) 114, 29 Am. Dec. 226 (1896).

The Delaware statute does not exclude the half blood from inheriting if there be no heir of the whole blood. Ibid.

It classifies the persons who are to inherit in succession, and requires that they shall have a certain connection or relation to the intestate, but does not require them to connect themselves by blood or otherwise with any one beyond the intestate, or with the first purchaser from whom the estate descended to the intestate, except where the estate passes to brothers and sisters under that act. Ibid.

Under such laws the lands of an intestate descend to his children and their issue, and, in the absence descendants." And "that half brothers or sisters, or their descendants shall, if there be brothers or sisters or their descendants alive, inherit each to the amount of one half the share of each full brother or sister or their descendants alive, then the half brothers or sisters, or their descendants shall inherit in the same way as if they were full brothers or sisters, or their descendants." Rev. Stat. 1838, p. 236, § 2. By the Statute of 1843, "kindred of the half blood and their descendants shall inherit equally with those of the whole blood in equal degree of consanguinity to the intestate." Rev. Stat. 1843, p. 436, § 114. And such was the law until 1852, when the law now in force was enacted, and is section 2472 of the Revised Statutes of 1881 (Burns' Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2627).

It is contended by the appellants' learned counsel that the Revision of 1852, which has been carried forward into that of 1881, made a change in the rule of inheritance, as to kindred of the half blood, so that, since, no kindred of the half blood can inherit unless they are brothers or sisters of the half blood. It is conceded that all kindred of the half blood—that is brothers and sisters of the half blood and their descendants—could inherit equally with those of the whole, in this state, from the organization of the territory under the Ordinance of 1787 up to the Revision of

of such, to brothers and sisters of the whole blood and their issue, and, in case of their failure, to brothers and sisters of the half blood and their issue, the half blood not being excluded if there be no heir of the whole blood. Ibid.

The law being thus declared by the Delaware statute, it cannot be held, in that state, that no one shall inherit lands as heir, unless he be of the blood of the first purchaser, or that he who claims a fee simple by descent from one who was first purchaser of the reversion or remainder expectant on a freehold estate must be of the same blood, and make himself heir to such purchaser at the time the remainder or reversion falls into possession. Ibid.

The half blood are entitled to and must be admitted to share in the distribution of personal estate in equal degree with the whole blood in all cases where they are not by express statutory provision excluded by preference conferred by it on others, under the Delaware statutes. McKinney v. Mellon, 8 Houst. (Del.) 277 (1864). In that case children of deceased sisters of the whole and half blood of the father of the intestate were held equally entitled, the Delaware statute only having preferred brothers and sisters of the whole blood to brothers and sisters of the half blood.

So the distinction is abolished in Illinois. Elder v. Balea, 127 Ill. 425 (1889); Oglesby Coal Co. v. Pasco, 79 Ill. 164 (1875).

The Illinois statute of wills (Gross, Stat. 1889, p. 805), providing that in no case shall there be a distinction between the kindred of the whole and the half blood, has been held to apply, not only to cases where the ancestor from whom the estate is derived leaves children by different mothers, but also the children of the same mother who have different fathers, children of the same mother, but having different fathers being no less brothers and sisters of the half blood than those who are the children of a common father but having different mothers. Oglesby Coal Co. v. Pasco, supra.

In Clark v. Sprague, 5 Blackf. 412 (1840), the bill alleged that the intestate died without issue, and without father or mother or wife him surviving, leaving the complainants, the brothers and sisters of the half blood and their descendants, and the defendants, brothers and sisters of the whole blood and their descendants, him surviving, leaving personal and real estate not derived by purchase with the estate of or by descent from the father or mother of the intestate. Under the Indiana Act of 1831, the half blood were entitled equally with the whole.

Under the Indiana Laws of 1818, brothers and sisters of the half blood inherited the estate of a deceased brother equally with those of the whole blood. Den, Moore, v. Abernathy, 7 Blackf. 442, 449 (1845).

In Henson v. Ott, 7 Ind. 512 (1856), the petition alleged that the deceased died unmarried, without children or heirs of his body, or any lineal descendants him surviving; that his father and mother were dead; the nearest relation surviving on the right ascending line being his paternal grandmother; he also left brothers and sisters of the half blood. Under the Indiana Act of 1843, it was held, that the brothers and sisters of the half blood were entitled to the personal estate, of which the money derived from the sale made by the intestate of his real estate constituted a part.

But if the estate has come to the intestate by gift, devise, or descent from any ancestor, those only who are of the blood of such ancestor can inherit. Armington v. Armington, 28 Ind. 74 (1867).

Where lands were conveyed by a man and his wife to their daughter and her husband, and the daughter died leaving two children, the husband marrying again and having seven children by such second marriage, the real estate descended to the children of the first and second marriage equally, as the case did not come within the provision of the Indiana statute regulating descents (Gavin & H. 222), the estate not coming to the intestate by gift, devise, or descent from such ancestor of the intestate, the father and mother conveying such property not being ancestors of their daughter's husband. Barnes v. Loyd, 37 Ind. 523 (1871).

In construing the provisions of the Indiana statute of descent, which provide that "kindred of the half blood shall inherit equally with those of the whole blood; but if the estate shall have come to the intestate by gift, devise, or descent from any ancestor, those kindred of the half blood only who are of the blood of such ancestor shall inherit; provided, that on failure of such kindred of the half blood having the blood of such ancestor, other kindred of the half blood shall inherit as if they were of the whole blood,"—the court stated that it was not reasonable to suppose that the legislature, after having liberally provided for kindred of the half blood in the revision of the Indiana Revised Statutes of 1838 and 1843, intended by the Revision of 1852 to postpone them until after there was a failure of all kindred of the intestate who had the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate descended, however remote in degree. Robertson v. Burrell, 40 Ind. 323 (1872).

Where land acquired by descent was sold, and the proceeds invested in the purchase of other lands, such lands are acquired by purchase, and not by descent, devise, or gift within the meaning of the Indiana Revised Statutes relating to the laws of descent, § 2473. Orr v. White, 106 Ind. 341 (1889).

Mortgage liens upon land received by will, and subsequently foreclosed and exchanged, are not acquired by gift, devise, or descent from any ancestor, but are acquired by purchase, and are therefore not within the meaning of the above section of the Indiana Revised Statutes. Cornett v. Hough, 136 Ind. 387 (1893).

Where the testator died leaving no children or 1852, because the previous statutes provided, or had been construed to mean, that kindred of the half blood and their descendants should inherit equally with those of the whole blood, and that the provision in favor of the descendants of the half blood was omitted from the Revision of 1852. It is contended that such omission evinced an intent to limit the inheritance of the half-blood kindred to half-brothers and half-sisters, and to cut off their descendants. In short, it is contended that a descendant of a half-blood brother or sister is not kindred of the half blood, and hence cannot inherit until the legislature restores the provision in favor of the descendants of the kindred of the half blood.

The solution of the question thus raised depends upon the proper construction of sections 2470, 2472, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Burns' Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 2625, 2627). Counsel concede that these two sections must be construed together, and, as we may properly say, they ought to be construed as if they were but one and the same section. And yet counsel, having made that concession, proceed to build up their whole theory on the absence of the words "their descendants" from the latter section. The first section above provides that "if there be neither father nor father or mother surviving, but leaving his widow as his sole heir at law, and devised to her his entire estate absolutely, and she died intestate owning lands part of which were those in dispute, the title to a portion of which she acquired by a deed of gift from her husband, and other portions by conveyance in satisfaction of a mortgage and by foreclosure, the court held that such portion as she did not take by way of gift, devise, or descent, under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2472, but were acquired by purchase, went to the half blood equally with the whole. Ibid.

In Talbott v. Talbott, 17 B. Mon. 1 (1856), the question was whether the brothers and sisters of the whole and the half blood of an infant, who derived the estate under devise from the common father, took, upon the death of such infant, as lineal descendants of the father as though directly from him, or as collaterals of the infant deriving their right through a common ancestor, and the court construed the sections of the Kentucky Statute (Rev. Stat. p. 280, §§ 3, 9), as not designed to alter the character of the descendants, making collaterals lineals, but that the language "to that parent and his or her kindred" merely imported a restriction of the descent to the kindred of that parent to the exclusion of the kindred of the other, as qualified in the section; and held that the statute simply limited the descent of the real estate of an infant dying without issue to that side of the house from which it came, and therefore the half blood took half shares only with those of the whole blood.

The Kentucky statute (Rev. Stat. p. 280, §§ 3 and 9) does not alter the well-settled rules as to collateral and lineal descents, the rule simply limiting the descent of real estate of an infant dying without issue to that side of the house from which it came. Ibid.

In Pearson v. Grice, 6 La. Ann. 232 (1851), the question was, whether a sister of the half blood of the father of the deceased was entitled to share equally with a sister of the whole blood of the mother of the deceased; article 910 of the Civil Code providing that, among the collateral relations, he who is the nearest in degree excludes all the others, and if there are several in the same degree they take equally and by heads according to their number, the proximity of consanguinity being established, by article 865, by the number of generations, each generation being called a degree. The court held that the language of the articles was free from ambiguity, and that the plain import of the words applied equally to relations of the half and of the whole blood; and that therefore in collateral successions those of the whole and those of the half blood shared alike, as under the new articles adopted from the French code, in collateral successions the proximity of degree was alone to be looked to, without regard to the question whether the relationship to the deceased was of the whole or half blood.

By the Maryland laws, if a man seized of an estate dies intestate leaving a brother of the whole blood, who survives him and dies without issue and without being seized, the half blood of the person seized will inherit. Chirac v. Reinecker, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 613, 7 L. ed. 538 (1829).

The above case was decided upon the principle that a person claiming as heir must prove himself heir of the person last seized. Ibid.

In Seekamp v. Hammer, 2 Harr. & G. 9 (1827), the intestate died leaving a mother, a brother of the whole blood, and four brothers and sisters of the half blood. The court held that under the Maryland Act of 1798, chap. 100, subchap. 11, § 11, a half sister took a sixth, and that the expression, "and there shall be no distinction between whole and half blood," which ran through the whole of the subchapter, included the whole and the half blood in the distribution of personal estate, there being no ambiguity in that part of the act.

Where the deceased died intestate leaving a child by a first, and two children by a second, wife, another son being born after his decease, his first son by the second marriage dying without issue before the birth of his brother, the question was whether or not the complainant, the daughter of the testator's first marriage, together with the children of the second marriage, were equally entitled to the portion of the land which descended to the deceased brother from the father, or whether the same descended to the brother and sister of the whole blood of the second marriage to the exclusion of the sister of the half blood of the first marriage. The court held they were equally entitled to the portion of the land which descended to the deceased brother from the father, there being no distinction to direct descents between brothers and sisters of the whole and half blood, where they are children of the same father from whom the estate descends, under the Maryland Act of 1798. Lowe v. Maccubbin, 1 Harr. & J. 550 (1805).

In Sheffield v. Lovering, 12 Mass. 439 (1815), the intestate left a child and widow him surviving the child subsequently dying without having been married, leaving brothers and sisters of the half blood by the former marriage of the intestate's widow. The court held that such half blood took equally with the mother under the Massachusetts provisional act, which adopted the language of the English Statute of Charles, which was construed as admitting the half blood in the distribution of the estate.

Under a clause in a will devising the residue of the estate in trust for the benefit of a son during life, and directing trustees, upon the son's death leaving no children or descendants of children, to divide the same "among the next of kin of said son, or those persons to whom the property would go provided my said son owned the property and he died without issue and intestate," it was held that the children of the half sisters of the testator took equally with the children of his brothers and sisters of the whole blood in the distribution, by virtue of mother, the brothers and sisters of the intestate living and the descendants of such as are dead shall take the inheritance as tenants in common." Counsel assume, as a foregone conclusion, that the language of the section above quoted excludes brothers and sisters of the half blood. If they are right in this, the court erred in its conclusions of law. But, if they are wrong, then the court did not err. The statute uses the words "brothers and sisters" without qualification or restriction. Webster defines the word "brother" to mean a male person who has the same father and mother with another person, or who has one of them; and the word "sister," as a female who has the same parents with another person, or who has one of them only. This meaning of the words "brothers" and "sisters" was adopted by this court in construing a similar statute fifty-five years ago, in Clark v. Sprague, 5 Blackf. 412, 418. This court there said, at pages 414, 415, that "our statute of descents and distribution, as is well known, makes no reference to the first purchaser. That statute, or so much of it as is applicable to the present case, is as follows, viz.: That the real and personal estate of any person dying intestate shall descend to his or her children or their descendants in equal parts, that is, to the children of a Mass. Gen. Stat., chap. 91, § 5, providing that kindred of half blood shall inherit equally with those of the whole blood in the same degree, the plain purpose of the statute being to admit the kindred of the half-blood relation in different degrees to an equal participation in the distribution of the estate, thereby changing the rule of the common law. Larrabee v. Tucker, 118 Mass. 562 (1876). See also Conant v. Kent, 130 Mass. 178 (1881), infra, head VIII.

In Michigan in lands acquired by purchase the half blood inherit equally with the whole. Van Sickle v. Gibbon, 40 Mich. 170 (1879).—where the deceased patented the lands and died seised without having been married, and without father or mother, but leaving a half-sister, and after her the children of a deceased sister, the only surviving and next of kin.

Under the Mississippi Act of 1846, § 6, declaring that if a married woman "die possessed of slaves or other personal chattels as her separate property" leaving issue of her body either by a former husband or by her surviving husband, such slaves and personal chattels shall descend to her child or children in equal shares. The children by a first marriage are entitled to an equal share of the deceased mother's property with the children of the second marriage. Marshall v. King, 24 Miss. 85 (1852).

In Bates v. Cotton, 32 Miss. 266 (1856), an intestate during her marriage acquired separate property in slaves under the Mississippi Act of 1839, and died leaving her second husband and three children by her first marriage and three by the second her surviving. The court held that all the children of the wife, though born of different marriages, were entitled to succeed to her separate estate. Marshall v. King, 24 Miss. 90 (1852), followed.

Under the New Hampshire Statute of 1789, brothers and sisters of the half blood inherit with the mother the estate of a deceased brother or sister of full age who died intestate and unmarried. Clark v. Pickering, 16 N. H. 284, 295 (1844).

The property of a deceased not derived by descent, or devise from his father or mother, will fall to his mother, the father being dead, and to all his brothers and sisters, and their representatives of the half as well as the whole blood. Prescott v. Carr, 39 N. H. 458, 61 Am. Dec. 658 (1854).

In Pennington v. Ogden, 1 N. J. L. 122 (1798), a tenant in fee devised property to a son for life, and after his death to his son and the heirs of his body, and the grandson died having been twice married leaving issue by each marriage, and the question was whether sisters of the whole blood of the person last seised took to the exclusion of the sisters of the half blood. The court held that the sisters of the half blood were entitled to their proportionate share as coheirs of the body of the deceased (the grandson).

In Arnold v. Den, Phoenix, 5 N. J. L. 862 (1820), the lands to which title was claimed were acquired by the intestate by means of a deed of gift from her father. The court held that, under section 8 of the New Jersey Act, March 24, 1780, her brothers and sisters of the half blood on the mother's side were entitled to inherit with the half-sister on the father's side, in the manner and proportions between male and female directed by the 1st section of the said Act, the property not coming to the intestate by descent.

Where the money came from the mother by gift, the donee has the right to lay it out as she pleases, and if invested in land it must descend in the same manner as if the money had been earned by the donee's own exertions, and therefore the whole and half blood take equally, the property being acquired by purchase, and not by descent. Champlin v. Baldwin, 1 Paige, 562 (1829).

In successions to personal estates, relatives of the half blood in equal degree of cognation to the intestate take equally with relatives of the whole blood, and they also take by representation, where representation would be allowed among relatives of the whole blood. Hallett v. Hare, 5 Paige, 815 (1835).

Where the decedent at the time of her death left no relatives in a direct line of ascent or descent, her nearest collateral relations being an aunt of the half blood of her father, and another aunt of the half blood on the side of the mother, the two aunts were entitled to share equally in the distribution of the personal estate. Id.

Where the next of kin of the person last seised were the sisters of the whole blood of his father, and a descendant of a deceased sister of the father, and the brothers and sisters of the half blood of the father, it was held that, under 1 Rev. Stat., § 10, subd. 1, p. 753, the half blood took equally with those of the whole. Beebe v. Griffing, 14 N. Y. 235 (1856).

In Emanuel v. Ennis, 16 Jones & S. 430 (1882), the intestate died unmarried and without issue, leaving brothers of the whole and half blood, and seised of real estate which descended to him from a deceased brother of the whole blood, to whom the property descended from the mother. The court followed the decision in Wheeler v. Clutterbuck, 52 N. Y. 67 (1873), holding that the half blood took equally with the whole.

And in Re Southworth, 6 Dem. 217 (1888), the decedent died intestate leaving surviving him no widow or child or other descendant, and no father, mother, brother, or sister; but the children of two brothers and two sisters of the whole, and children of one brother of the half blood. It was contended that the nephews and nieces of the half blood were not entitled to share in the distribution of the decedent's personal estate, but the court held otherwise, the next of kin all being related to the decedent "in equal degree," under subdivision 9 of the New York Statute of Distribution 2 Rev. Stat. 93.

deceased child, the share of their deceased parent; if there be no children, nor their descendants, then to the father; and if there be no father, then in equal parts to the mother, brothers, and sisters of such deceased person dying intestate, and to their descendants.

Rev. Stat. 1831, p. 207. In construing this statute, we are trammelled by no artificial rules. The only question is, whether the term 'brothers' and 'sisters' necessarily exclude brothers and sisters of the half blood. It is manifest that there is not in the statute § 75), taking share and share alike, not by representation, the parent's share in such personal estate. See Valentine v. Wetherill, 31 Barb. 655 (1860), head V., In the case of ancestral estates.

In Pipkin v. Coor, 6 N. C. 231 (1813), the question was whether the defendant, a maternal brother of the half blood to the lessors of the plaintiff, was entitled to share with them, the case turning upon the construction of the third clause of the North Carolina Act of 1784, regulating descents. The court held that it was the aim of the legislature to abolish the rule of common law, which totally excluded the half blood from the inheritance; and to allow them to inherit, first, where there were no nearer collateral relations, and second, where the brother or sister of the whole blood acquired the estate by purchase.

Where testator devised lands to his son and his heirs, with remainder, in case the son died without heir lawfully begotten of his body, to his testator's brother and his heirs, the brother of the testator dying before the son, the question was whether, upon the subsequent death of the son, the nephews and nieces of the testator, who claimed as heirs at law on the paternal side of the son, took in preference to half sisters and brothers on the maternal side, and this depended on the question whether the son took the estate by purchase or by descent. The court held that the son took the estate by purchase in the true sense of the word, and that the half blood took in preference to the nephews and nieces on the paternal side, the fact that the Act of 1784 converted the estate tail as taken by the son into an estate in fee simple not affecting the question. Ballard v. Griffin, 2 N. C. Law Repos. 268 (1815).

Where the lands originally descended from a father to a son, who died in the year 1808, seised, leaving a paternal cousin of the whole blood, and brothers and sisters of the half blood, by the second marriage of his mother, the court held the half blood, although of the maternal line, were entitled to inherit under the North Carolina Act of 1784, chap. 22, even though the lands came to the person last seised by descent. Ballard v. Hill, 7 N. C. 410 (1819).

Where the grandfather devised the lands in question to his grandson and died having, when the will was made, several daughters and one son, the father of the grandson, the daughters surviving him and the son dying before him, the grandson thus becoming one of the heirs at law, and the grandson also had two sisters of the whole blood, one of whom subsequently died without issue, the estate being claimed by the children of the mother of the grandson by a second marriage, brothers and sisters of the half blood on the maternal line of such grandson, as against his surviving sister of the whole blood,—the question was, whether the land should be divided between them and the defendant, the sister of the whole blood of the grandson, her brother, or whether the latter should take the whole. The court held that the grandson must be considered as taking the land by purchase, and that therefore the half blood were entitled to inherit equally with the whole blood, but that if the lands had been taken by descent the sister of the whole blood would have excluded all those of the half blood. McKay v. Hendon, 7 N. C. 309, 313 (1819).

In Ross v. Toms, 9 N. C. 9 (1822), the devisee under a will was held to take by purchase, and dying intestate his maternal half brother and heirs of a sister of the whole blood take equally.

Where the controversy was between the paternal uncle on the one side and a maternal aunt of the half blood on the other side, the lands having descended from a maternal grandmother no portion of whose blood flowed in the veins either of the lessor to the plaintiff, or of the defendant, the court held that both parties, being in the same degree of consanguinity to the intestate, were equally entitled, although some were of the half blood. Pritchard v. Turner, 9 N. C. 435 (1823).

The only qualification required by the North Carolina law in case of a collateral descent is that the claimant be the nearest collateral relation, and in case of a descended estate, that he be of the blood of the first purchaser, the preference of the male over the female line, and the whole over the half blood, being entirely abolished. Bell v. Dozier, 12 N. C. 383 (1827).

Where a father died leaving two sons, to one of whom he devised the land in question, and such son subsequently died intestate without issue leaving a sister of the whole blood and the issue of a sister of the half blood on the mother's side, the issue of the sister of the half blood took one moiety of the land. Burgwyn v. Devereux, 23 N. C. 533 (1841).

If the title of the intestate comes to him by descent, the estate will pass, under the Ohio statute regulating descents, to the brothers and sisters of the intestate, whether they are of the whole or half blood; but if the estate does not come to the intestate by descent, it passes to the brothers and sisters of the whole blood only. Freeman v. Allen, 17 Ohio St. 527 (1867).

In that case the lands had descended to the heirs, who instituted proceedings in partition, and one of them exercised the election to purchase, given by section 8 of the Ohio Partition Act, and subsequently died intestate. It was held that the lands acquired by him by such election were acquired by him by purchase, and descended to his brothers and sisters of the whole blood, but that the remaining land, which was acquired by him by descent, passed to brothers and sisters of the blood of the ancestor, whether of the whole or half blood of the intestate. Ibid.

In Preston v. Hoskins, 2 Yeates, 545 (1800), the intestate died subsequent to the Pennsylvania Act of April 19, 1794, leaving neither wife nor children, but leaving a sister of the whole blood and children of a brother and sister of the whole blood, and a sister and brothers of the half blood. The half blood were held entitled equally with those of the full blood, it being a case of census omnisus in the Act of 1794.

Where one acquired an estate by devise or descent from his father, and died seised, his next of kin on his father's side being uncles and aunts; the Pennsylvania Intestate Laws of 1833, §§ 7, 8, and 9, make no distinction between the whole and the half blood among such uncles and aunts, it being enough for inheritance that they are "of the blood of the ancestor of the inheritance;" but in the case of brothers and sisters inheriting from each other, the whole blood are preferred under sections 4 and 6 of the Act." Danner v. Shisler, 31 Pa. 239 (1868).

In Graham's Estate, 6 W. N. C. 403 (1879), the intestate died unmarried and without issue, possessed of personal and real estate, among the latter any legislative intention expressed to exclude the half blood. If it is excluded, then, it is upon general principles of law, not from any positive enactment. According to the uniform construction which the English statute of distributions has received, especially since the decision of the case of Orooks v. Watt, 2 Vern. 124, a brother of the half blood is a brother within the meaning of the law. That statute directs that the personal estate of an intestate, under certain circumstances, shall be distributed among the next of kin in equal of which were ground rents, leaving her surviving cousins of the whole blood, children of uncles on the part of her father, and aunt of the whole blood on the part of the mother, and two cousins, children of an aunt of the half blood on the part of the mother, the latter claiming to share in the distribution on an equal footing with those of the whole blood. The court held that the cousins of the half blood were to participate in the distribution of the fund, which arose as wholly from personal estate.

In Dorsey v. Van Horn, 9 W. N. C. 96 (1879), the bill set forth that the intestate died seised of ground rents purchased by her, leaving eight cousins of the whole blood and two of the half blood, and prayed partition among those of the whole blood only, but the court held that the cousins of the half blood were entitled to take, distinguishing the case from Lane's App. 28 Pa. 437 (1857); Brenne-man's App. 40 Pa. 115 (1861), and Hayes' App. 7 W. N. C. 11 (1879).

In Davis's Estate, 9 W. N. C. 479 (1881), deceased died intestate, unmarried and without issue, leaving as his heirs at law and next of kin first cousins, some of the half and others of the whole blood, seised inter alia of real estate part of which was acquired by purchase and part by descent from a brother who had purchased it and died intestate, unmarried, and without issue. A petition for partition being filed by the cousins of the half blood, the court held that under the Pennsylvania Acts of April 8, 1833, and April 27, 1855, the children of deceased uncles or aunts of the half blood were entitled to share with those of the whole blood, the distribution being made per stirpes under the latter act, even though the parties stood in the same degree of consanguinity to the intestate.

The expressions in the Pennsylvania Act of April, 1833, as to the preference given to the whole blood, being confined to the case of the inheritance of real estate by brothers and sisters and their descendants, the rule of construction excludes the implication that, in any other case, such preference was intended; while the fact that, in providing for inheritance by the next of kin, personal estate, as to which there is, concededly, no distinction of blood, is blended with real estate—the latter being subject only to the provision that no estate of inheritance therein shall pass to one not “of the blood” (that is, either of the whole or half blood) of the first purchaser, showing conclusively and affirmatively that the omission in the case of the next of kin was not accidental. Davis's Estate, supra, citing Baker v. Chalfant, 5 Whart. 477 (1840), and Danner v. Shisler, 31 Pa. 299 (1858).

The above case was followed in Kiegel's App., 12 W. N. C. 179 (1882), wherein first cousins, the children of deceased uncles and aunts of the whole blood, and first cousins of deceased uncles and aunts of the half blood only, were upon partition brought by one of the half blood, held equally entitled.

In Lynch v. Lynch, 132 Pa. 423 (1890), a testator who had acquired the real estate by purchase died seised, leaving a widow and one child him surviving, the latter subsequently dying leaving a widow, the plaintiff in the action, but without issue, the testator's widow also dying prior to action. By will the testator devised the real estate to his wife for life, remainder to his son for life, with remainder in fee to the issue of the son, if any, living at the time of the first life-tenant's decease, and in default of such issue for charitable uses. The trust for 39 L. R. A.

the charity being declared absolutely void, the ultimate remainder went to the residuary legatee or devisee, next of kin or heirs according to law. The court held that, there being no residuary legatee, the remainder over passed under the intestate laws to the son and heir at law, who therefore took the fee subject to his mother's life estate, and that as he died without issue such estate went to the next of kin who were the brothers and sisters of the half blood (of the intestate's father) and to a brother of the whole blood, who took equally, there being no distinction between the whole and half blood, all being of the blood of the first purchaser under the 8th section of the Pennsylvania Act of April 8, 1833. Danner v. Shisler, 31 Pa. 299 (1858), and Parr v. Bankhart, 23 Pa. 291 (1853), followed.

Where the estate was devised to a daughter in fee, and upon her death descended to her children, two of whom died intestate and without issue, the third becoming heir to her brothers and seised of the whole estate, who subsequently died, it was held that, under the provisions of the Rhode Island Statute of 1822, two thirds of the estate which was acquired by the last-mentioned deceased from deceased brothers and sister, descended to the children of the husband of the testator's daughter by a former marriage, being half-blood brothers and sisters, the remaining third, which came immediately by descent from the mother, going to the heirs of the whole blood of the testator. Gardner v. Collins, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 33, 7 L. ed. 347 (1829).

Where the intestate died without issue, and the estate came to her by descent from a deceased brother, it was held that her mother, brothers, and sisters took equally, being of the same degree of kindred with the intestate, according to the rules established by the Rhode Island Statute of 1822. Smith v. Smith, 4 R. I. 1 (1854).

In Guerard v. Guerard, 4 Desaus. Eq. 405, note (1813), it was held that in cases of remoter relation not within the cases enumerated in the South Carolina Statute of 1791, the half blood in the same degree with the whole blood took equally.

But in Ex parte May, 3 Rich. L. 61 (1845) under the fourth section of the South Carolina Act of 1791 (5 Stat. at L. 162) the children of a predeceased brother were not entitled to take with his uncles, brothers of the intestate of the half blood, section 7 only providing for them to come in as next of kin, the legislature when providing for brothers' and sisters' children of the whole blood, and also for brothers and sisters of the half blood carefully abstaining from bringing in their children. The court further construed the act as providing that if there had been no brother or sister of the half blood, then, under section 7, the children of a deceased half brother or sister would have come in as next of kin, the act making no special provision for the half blood after brothers and sisters.

In that case the intestate left neither wife nor child, nor lineal descendant, nor lineal ancestor, nor brother nor sister of the whole blood, nor children of such brother or sister, but left brothers of the half blood and children of a predeceased brother of the half blood.

Where a father-in-law conveyed land to his son-in-law, who devised it to his wife and died without issue, leaving brothers of the half blood on the mother's side, and brothers and sisters of the whole blood who survived him, the half blood were held entitled to inherit equally with the whole blood. Nicol v. Dupree, 7 Yerg. 415 (1835).

degree. When the next of kin are brothers and sisters, no distinction is made between those of the whole and half blood. Being related to the intestate by blood, the half blood as well as the whole blood are within the degree mentioned in the statute. And in

Tracy v. Smith, 2 Lev. 173, it is said that a brother of the half blood is a 'brother' as well as a brother of the whole blood. The construction given to that statute shows that, except where an artificial rule of evidence has been introduced for a special purpose, the

In Edwards v. Barksdale, Riley, Eq. 16, 2 Hill, Eq. 416 (1836), the commissioner found that the next of kin of the intestate were a first cousin of the whole blood and four first cousins of the half blood, and the court held that the cousins of the half blood were equally entitled with the cousin of the first blood as next of kin of the intestate in equal degree, as the half blood could not be postponed by one degree.

Under the South Carolina Act of 1865, declaring that every child theretofore born is the legitimate child of its mother, half brothers and sisters of an intestate are entitled to inherit with him where they have a common mother, especially where she has been separated from previous husbands by sale and removal, equivalent to a divorce or release a vinculo matrimonii before her marriage to his father according to plantation custom, with the owner's consent. Clement v. Riley, 33 S. C. 66 (1860).

Where an intestate died without issue, seised and possessed of real and personal estate derived from his father, leaving brothers and sisters of the whole blood and a sister of the half blood on the part of the mother, the half blood were held entitled to take equal shares in the personal estate, the real estate descending to the brothers and sisters of the whole blood, the half sister on the maternal side having no inheritable blood. Deadrick v. Armour, 10 Humph. 588, 597, 598 (1850).

In Nesbit v. Bryan, 1 Swan, 468 (1852), plaintiffs claimed, as the paternal uncles and aunts of an intestate dying without issue, property which descended to the deceased from his father, the defendants being the maternal brothers and sisters of the half blood. The contention was that as the estate was derived by descent from the ancestor of the intestate, the plaintiffs were entitled to inherit in preference to the half blood of the maternal line, upon the ground that the plaintiffs were and the defendants were not of the blood of the ancestor from whom it descended, but the court held that under the Tennessee Act of 1784, chap. 22, § 3, the half blood were entitled to inherit.

The extent of the exception or qualification contained in the Tennessee Act of 1784 is only to exclude, or rather to postpone, the half blood of the line from which the estate did not descend, until the line of brothers and sisters from which the inheritance descended is exhausted, there being nothing in the proviso indicating a design to carry the exclusion of the former further than this. The conclusion that the legislature meant only the line of brothers and sisters of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate had descended, and not the whole line of collateral kindred, being almost irresistible from the words "until such line is exhausted of the half blood." Nesbit v. Bryan, 1 Swan, 468, 471 (1852).

Not only where the line of brothers and sisters of the half blood on the part of the ancestor from whom the estate descended is exhausted, does the estate descend to the half blood of the other line, but also where the intestate dies without brothers or sisters of the whole or half blood on the side of the parent from whom the inheritance came, but having brothers or sisters of the half blood of the other line, the latter will inherit under the Tennessee Act of 1784, chap. 22. Ibid.

ancestral estates, infra, head V., and Chaney v. Barker, 3 Baxt. 424 (1874), infra, head VIII.

Where the intestate left brothers and sisters of the half blood and children of brothers and sisters of the whole blood him surviving, the brothers and sisters of the half blood were held equally entitled, the children of either predeceased brothers or sisters of the whole blood taking a share equal to the share of such brothers and sisters of the half blood, under the South Carolina Act of 1791, § 1, clause 5, which regulated the distribution of both real and personal estate, under the 5th clause of which the brothers of the half blood and the nephews of the whole blood were entitled to the succession, the only question being as to the proportions in which they shared the estate. Felder v. Felder, 5 Rich. Eq. 509 (1853).

The whole and half blood have equal rights in the distribution of personal estate under the Tennessee law. Kyle v. Moore, 3 Sneed, 183 (1855).

So where property has been received by gift from a father, brothers and sisters of the half blood take equally with the sisters of the whole blood, under section 2420, subsection 2, of the Tennessee Code. Pritchitt v. Kirkman, 3 Tenn. Ch. 360 (1876).

Where there are no descendants of the whole blood, the half brothers and sisters are, by the Texas statutes, entitled to the entire portion which descended to the brothers and sisters, they not being excluded by the act. Marlow v. King, 17 Tex. 177 (1855).

In Hatch v. Hatch, 21 Vt. 450 (1849), the intestate died leaving no issue, widow, father, mother, brother or sister, his nearest surviving relatives being children of a deceased brother and sister, some of the whole and some of the half blood, and grandchildren of some of his deceased brothers and sisters, the parents of the said grandchildren having also predeceased the intestate. The court affirmed the order of the probate court, which decreed the estate to the children of the intestate's brothers and sisters, both of the whole and half blood equally, and excluded the grandchildren, the Vermont statute decreeing that the kindred of the half blood shall inherit equally with those of the whole blood in the same degree. Vt. Rev. Stat. chap. 52, § 1.

The 5th subdivision of section 1, chapter 63, of the Wisconsin Revised Statutes provides that if the intestate shall leave no issue, no widow, and no father, mother, brother, nor sister, his estate shall descend to his next of kin in equal degree with certain exceptions therein provided; and the 4th section provides a degree of kindred shall be computed according to the rules of the civil law, and kindred of the half blood shall inherit equally with the whole blood in the same degree with certain exceptions, and therefore, where the claimants were all in equal degree of kindred computed according to the rules of the civil law and not within the exceptions, the half blood take equally with the whole blood under the statute. McCracken v. Rogers, 6 Wis. 278 (1858).

When an intestate died leaving a mother, and nieces, and nephews of the half blood him surviving, they were held entitled to take per stirpes. Moore v. Conner (Va.) 20 S. R. Rep. 266 (1890).

V. In the case of ancestral estates.

In allowing inheritance by the half blood the leg-word 'brother' does by law mean as well a brother of the half as of the whole blood. Following that construction, and applying the same rules to the construction of our statute, we think the right of the complainants to participate in the distribution of the personal estate of their deceased brother is clearly established. And so we think they are also entitled to a partition of the real estate of the deceased. . . . In deciding the question before us we are aided by a few decisions which have been made in the courts statutes of the various states have invariably preferred those of the blood of the deceased ancestor, where such estates pass by descent, devise, or gift of some ancestor, those not of the blood of the ancestor being rejected or excluded.

This will be found to be the case in Alabama, Arkansas, California, Dakota, Delaware, Idaho, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Rhode Island, Utah, Vermont, and Wisconsin. The wording of the sections of the different state statutes is not, however, identical, and the reader is therefore referred thereto for further information.

In North Carolina and Tennessee the Statute of 1774 relates only to descended estates.

The Alabama Civil Code, ed. 1886, § 1919, p. 452, provides that there shall be no distinction made between the whole and the half blood in the same degree, unless the inheritance came to the intestate by descent, devise, or gift from or of some one of his ancestors; in which case all those who are not of the blood of such ancestor are excluded from the inheritance as against those of the same degree.

In Cox v. Clark, 38 Ala. 400, 404 (1891), the court stated that but for the words "as against those of the same degree," it would have followed the decisions in other states, that those who are not of the blood of the ancestor from whom the inheritance came were excluded until that line was exhausted, the exclusion of those who are not of the blood of the ancestor from whom the inheritance came not extending to the exhaustion of that ancestral line, but only when there are those of that line in the same degree, the "same degree" not affecting the rights of lineal descendants or the descendants of a brother or sister of the ancestral line of inheritance. See this case further, supra, head IV.

Such language has been construed "to limit the qualified preference of the whole over the half blood to estates which the intestate inherited as contradistinguished from those otherwise acquired by him." Eatman v. Eatman, 38 Ala. 478 (1893); Stallworth v. Stallworth, 29 Ala. 76 (1886). See these cases supra, head IV.

In Hitchcock v. Smith, 8 Stew. & F. (Ala.) 29 (1832), the question was whether, under provisions of the Alabama statute preferring kindred of the whole blood in equal degree, the brothers and sisters of the half blood, or the nephews or nieces of the whole blood, were to be preferred. The court held that under the statute the descendants of brothers and sisters as to all other kindred occupied precisely the same situation which their parents did, and that the children of a deceased brother of the whole blood were to be preferred to the brothers and sisters of the half blood.

Where slaves constituted the bulk of the intestate's estate, which descended to her from her father, they were distributed to her half brother and sister of the blood of the father, brothers and sisters of the half blood on the mother's side being excluded, by virtue of sections 1576 and 1581 of the Alabama Code; but the money which was the product of the hire of the intestate's slaves after they had been distributed to her was held not an inheritance, not coming to her by descent, devise, or gift, and was therefore, under section 1576 of the Code, equally distributable between brothers and sisters, the children of the father and the children of the mother. Johnson v. Copeland, 35 Ala. 521 (1860), 29 L. R. A.

With reference to the 10th section of the Arkansas Statute (pt. 1) it has been stated that the manifest intention of the legislature was to preserve ancestral estates in the line of the blood whence they came; the section being a partial adoption or recognition of the common-law principle which followed the line of the blood. Kelly v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 555, 582 (1855).

In the above case the lands descended to the intestate, and were claimed by his half sisters, and the court held that under the construction placed upon the above statute they were excluded by an express provision, not because they were of the half blood merely, but because the estate was ancestral, the claimants not being of the blood of the ancestor who transmitted it to the intestate; and that upon the same principle the intestate's mother and all his kindred on her side were peremptorily excluded, only his paternal kindred being entitled to inherit, but that the sisters of the half blood, as next of kin of the intestate, were entitled per capita share and share alike to his own personal estate, to the exclusion of all other persons. Kelly v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 555, 580 (1855).

A full construction was placed upon the Arkansas statute by the court in that case, showing the degrees in which the whole and half blood took; the half blood and their descendants taking personally as well as realty, equally with the whole blood, except that they are excluded from real estate when ancestral, if they lack the blood of the transmitting ancestor, but not if they can show that they are of the blood of the ancestor from whom it was transmitted to the intestate. Kelly v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 555, 583, 589, 590 (1855).

Here the court held that the first section of the Arkansas Statute was general and comprehensive and embraced all lands whether ancestral or newly acquired, subject to exceptions relating to real estate alone, the section constituting the table by which real estate descended and personal property was distributed; the design of the legislature being, where there were descendants of the intestate, to send down both to them, per capita if in equal degree, and per stirpes if in unequal degree, without any regard to the fact as to how the property had been acquired; and as to personal property, where there were no descendants of the intestate, collaterals take in the same way as descendants, if there had been any, without inquiry as to how it was acquired, and per capita if in equal degree and per stirpes if in unequal degree. Kelly v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 555, 582 (1855).

In Soull v. Vaughn, 15 Ark. 605 (1844), the court approved of the construction placed upon the Arkansas statute of descent and distribution as to real estate acquired by descent, as laid down by the court in Kelly v. McGuire, supra.

And in Oliver v. Vance, 34 Ark. 564 (1879), the laws as so construed were considered as stare decisis.

The rules of descent and distribution as deduced from the provisions of the Arkansas statute by the court in Kelly v. McGuire, supra, have been followed in that state until they have become rules of property, so much so that the rules in Kelly's Case have been oftener cited and are more familiar than the rule in Shelley's Case, 1 Coke, 83, and it must now be left to the legislature to disturb them if right and justice may ever seem to require it. Oliver v. Vance, supra.

Real estate coming from a relative in blood of a father must be considered as ancestral, the com-of our own country. In the case of Gardner v. Collins, 3 Mason, 896, Fed. Cas. No. 5,223, a statute of the state of Rhode Island, which, except that it is exclusively a statute of descents, is in almost all other respects similar to our Statute of 1831, came under consideration. The terms of the statute are: 'When any person having title to any real estate of inheritance shall die intestate as to such estate, it shall descend and pass in equal portions to his or her kindred in the following course: To his or her children or their in Kelly's Case (Kelly v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 555 (1855)), not meaning (but in such cases the donor or deviser becomes himself the propositus from which the descent was to be traced, the person last in title to possession or last invested with the vested remainder remaining the propositus whose nearest heirs are to be traced, such heirs being of the blood of the person from whom the benefit came. Oliver v. Vance, supra).

An estate given by a paternal uncle is ancestral as if it descended from the father, coming of bounty from one of the father's blood, and the same rule would apply on the mother's side. Ibid.

Where land devised to a daughter descended on her death to her son, who died intestate and without issue, and without brothers and sisters or their representatives, it was held that the land was no longer to be construed as ancestral estate, and that it descended to the next of kin of the son, though not of the blood of the testator. Clark v. Shauler, 46 Conn. 119 (1878).

Under the construction placed upon the Indiana statutes (see page 537, ante), sisters and brothers of the half blood will only be postponed to those who are of the blood of the ancestor from whom the lands descend, and uncles and cousins of the blood of such ancestor will not have preference, and where no brothers or sisters of the blood of such ancestor survive, brothers and sisters not of such blood will inherit. Robertson v. Burrell, 40 Ind. 323, 335 (1872).

Kindred of the half blood inherit equally in Indiana, except in case of estates coming by gift, devise, or descent from an ancestor, when the whole blood only inherit. Armington v. Armington, 28 Ind. 74 (1867).

In Cox v. Matthews, 17 Ind. 367 (1861), an intestate died seised, leaving a widow and a daughter, the daughter dying without issue, or brother, or sister, or their descendants, but leaving uncles and aunts half blood of the father. The father of the intestate had also issue by a first wife. The widow of the intestate married again and had two children, a son and a daughter, after the decease of the intestate's daughter. Upon the death of the daughter, the lands descended to the brothers and sisters of the intestate (the father), though of the half blood only, to the exclusion of her brothers and sisters of the half blood through the maternal line, who were equal in degree with the half brothers and sisters on the paternal side, half brothers and sisters born after the death of such daughter not being entitled to take the estate from the uncles and aunt in whom it had become vested, the doctrine of shifting descents not prevailing in Indiana.

Where an intestate died leaving one child by a first marriage, and one by a second marriage, and his second wife him surviving, upon the latter dying seised of her third without having married again, it was held that the husband's estate upon his death went to the widow and his two children in thirds, and that upon her decease her child, to the exclusion of the half-sister of such child, was entitled to her share, the widow being the ancestor, and the kindred mentioned in the Indiana statute being kindred of the person last seised. Smith v. Smith, 23 Ind. 203 (1864); McMakin v. McMichaels, 23 Ind. 462, 465 (1864).

A widow inherits in fee subject only to such qualifications as are prescribed by the statute of descent, and therefore the children of her husband by his former marriage, not being of the blood of such widow, cannot inherit lands of which she died seised in fee. McMakin v. Michaels, 23 Ind. 463 (1864),—in which case the widow acquired the land by purchase at a commissioner's sale. See also Heavenridge v. Nelson, 56 Ind. 90 (1877), infra, to the same effect.

But where lands descended on the death of the husband intestate to his widow and child, and the widow died leaving a child by a former marriage, her portion of the estate went to the children equally, section 6 of the Indiana Statute of Descent not governing the descent in that case, there being no question of half blood, the children being related to her in equal degree, each one having as much of her blood as the other, each being her child although by different husbands. McClanahan v. Trafford, 46 Ind. 410 (1874).

So in Heavenridge v. Nelson, supra, where intestate left a widow and children by his marriage with her and also by a former marriage him surviving, upon the death of the widow intestate leaving the children, and also children by a former marriage, her interest descended to all her children equally to the exclusion of the husband's children by the former marriage, the children of the husband by the former wife not being the heirs of his widow. McClanahan v. Trafford, supra, followed.

In Pond v. Irwin, 113 Ind. 243 (1886), the court, in applying section 2473 of the Indiana Statute of 1881, looked upon it as meaning that if the deceased had also left surviving her a half brother or half sister on her mother's side,—that is of the blood of the mother,—he or she would have taken the estate which descended from the mother to the entire exclusion of one who was not of the same maternal blood, but that as the deceased left no brother or sister either of the whole blood or half blood on the mother's side, her entire estate descended to kindred of the half blood, although not on the mother's side, as if to the whole blood.

In this case the intestate left no children or other lineal descendants, the next of kin representing or constituting the shares of seven brothers and sisters. One of such sisters married and soon afterwards died leaving one child and her husband her surviving. The husband married again and had issue a son. These two children survived him and became his heirs at law. The child of the husband by the first wife (the sister of the intestate) was the only lineal descendant of her deceased mother, and as such took a seventh share, and subsequently died unmarried and without issue leaving her brother of the half blood her surviving, such brother claiming her share upon partition proceedings. In this case the court stated that when a statute did not really require a different interpretation, justice was best promoted by preferring brothers and sisters of the half blood to others more distantly related. Pond v. Irwin, 113 Ind. 243, 247 (1886).

See Barnes v. Loyd, 37 Ind. 523 (1871), head IV., supra, No distinction between the whole and half blood; also Cornett v. Hough, 136 Ind. 387 (1893), under same head; Robertson v. Burrell, 40 Ind. 323 (1872), and Pearson v. Grice, 6 La. Ann. 532 (1751), head IV., supra.

In Hall v. Jacobs, 4 Harr. & J. 245 (1815), the testator devised his real estate to his three children as tenants in common. After his death two of such devisees died seised, intestate and without issue, their shares descending to their brother, the other devisee, who also died intestate and without issue, leaving no brother or sister of the whole blood, or descendants, . . . then to the father of such intestate; if there be no father, then to the mother, brothers, and sisters of such intestate and their descendants, or such of them as there be,' etc. [Rev. Laws 1822, p. 222]. The action was ejectment, and was brought to recover an estate which the plaintiff claimed as a brother of the intestate of the half blood, and the defendants claimed the same as heirs of the whole blood. Judge Story, in commenting upon the fourth paragraph of the Statute above noticed, said:

descendants of such brother or sister, but leaving three brothers and two sisters of the half blood, children of his mother by a second marriage, and also an uncle and two aunts, a brother and sister of the whole blood of the father. The court held that the question, whether the land descended to the brothers and sisters of the half blood, or to the uncle and aunts of the whole blood on the part of the father equally, or to the uncle to the exclusion of the aunts, depended upon the provisions of the Maryland Act of 1786, chap. 45, and that therefore, as to the interest which such son took under the will of his father, and which was acquired by purchase, his half brothers and sisters were entitled; and that with respect to the estate which came to him through the decease of his two brothers, the half blood were not entitled, but that it descended to the uncle, the brother of the testator, to the exclusion of his aunts, the sisters of the testator.

In that case the court in construing the Maryland Act of 1786, held the words "and not derived from or through either of his ancestors" to mean, "and not by descent."

The rules and canons of descent as established by the English law, and which originated from the feudal system, were changed by the Maryland Act of 1786, which provides that upon the death of an intestate and the failure of lineal heirs in the descending line, if the estate descended to the intestate on the part of the father, the estate should descend to the brothers and sisters of the intestate of the blood of the father without discriminating between those of the whole and the half blood, and therefore, when an estate descended from a father to two sons, and upon the death of one son descended to the other, that though the whole descent is immediate from the person last seized, yet the inheritable blood is from the ancestor from whom the estate descended. Stewart v. Jones, 8 Gill & J. 1 (1836).

By section 2816 of the Compiled Laws of Michigan the degrees of kindred are to be computed according to the rules of the civil law, and kindred of the half blood inherit equally with those of the whole blood in the same degree, unless the inheritance comes to the intestate by descent, devise, or gift of some one of his ancestors, in which case all those who are not of the blood of such ancestor are to be excluded from such inheritance.

The Michigan statute has been looked upon as the expression of a general policy characterizing the legislation of that state, and as putting the half blood on a footing of equality with the whole in the laws of descent; a discrimination against the half blood being the exception, not to be extended by construction beyond the obvious intent, such half blood only being excluded when there are others in the same statutory class preferred by reason of being of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate came to the intestate. Rowley v. Stray, 22 Mich. 70 (1875); Ryan v. Andrews, 21 Mich. 229 (1870).

Section 4213 of the Michigan Statute does not apply to personal estate, nor does it deal with the mode of distribution, but only with descents. Henderson v. Sherman, 47 Mich. 267 (1882).

Where the deceased, seized of lands derived by inheritance from his father, left surviving him no brother nor sister, no paternal grandparent, or maternal grandfather, and no paternal uncle nor aunt, or the issue thereof of the whole blood, but left surviving him paternal uncles and aunts of the half blood, and also a maternal grandmother and maternal uncles and aunts, the court held that, as there was no one else in the same degree of kindred with the maternal grandmother, she was the nearest of kin, and that the estate devolved solely upon her to the exclusion of the remoter kindred. Ryan v. Andrews, supra.

The question in the above case turned upon the construction of section 2816 of the Michigan Compiled Laws, the court holding that if there be but a single next relation, he or she would take the whole estate without reference to whether the kindred is on the side of the one parent or the other, but that if there are several next of kin, and they are not all related on the same side, then only such of them will take as are of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate was derived.

By the 12th section of the Missouri Act of July 4, 1807, there is no distinction in the distribution of any intestate's estate between kindred of the whole or half blood, unless the inheritance has come to the said person so seized by descent, devise, or gift of some one of his or her ancestors, in which case all those who are not of the blood of such ancestor shall be excluded from such inheritance.

Under such act it has been held that the law intended that the estate should continue in his blood from whom it was originally derived, therefore, where the deceased received the land by descent from his father, his estate under the law descended to his blood on the part of his father. Childress v. Cutter, 16 Mo. 34, 43, 44 (1853).

The Missouri Act of 1807 superseded the Spanish law of succession, and by the 12th section there is no distinction in the distribution of any intestate's estate between kindred of the whole or half blood, unless the inheritance came to the person so seized by descent, devise, or gift of some one of his or her ancestors, in which case all those who are not of the blood of such ancestor shall be excluded from the inheritance. The court, in construing the words "of the blood," as used in the above section, held that wherever the case that is provided for occurs, none can inherit who are not "of the blood" of the ancestor; and that the words "of the blood" excluded those only who have none of the blood, without reference to proportion or quantity, such as have none of the blood being entirely excluded; and then those "of the blood" who stand next in degree of proximity are, in reference to this inheritance, the next of kin and take as such, and therefore, if the property comes by descent, devise, or gift of a father, the half brothers are entirely excluded and the paternal aunts are the next of kin and inherit if the deceased died after the law took effect. Cutter v. Waddingham, 22 Mo. 206, 261-263 (1855).

So the court held that the expression, "came to the person so seized by descent, devise, or gift of some one of his or her ancestors, in which case all those who are not of the blood of such ancestor shall be excluded from such inheritance,"—was limited to the exclusion of those who were not of the blood of the immediate antecedent ancestor; and that therefore, where the estate descended to two brothers, and one died his half passing to the other, the intestate, the half brother of such intestate of the mother's side, is not excluded from inheriting the portion of the estate that came to the intestate

"The question is, whether brothers and sisters of the half blood are not within the purview of this clause. Unless the court can say that brothers and sisters of the half blood are not brothers and sisters in the general sense of the law, it is impossible to doubt the title in this case. The statement of the proposition carries its own answer. Brothers and sisters of the half blood are recognized by law as of kin in the degree of brothers and sisters, and as the act contains no qualification as to whole or half blood, from the deceased brother, and will succeed to the exclusion of paternal aunts. Cutter v. Waddingham, 22 Mo. 206, 286 (1855).

In Clark v. Pickering, 16 N. H. 284, 294, 295 (1844), it was contended that by the term "surviving brothers and sisters," as used in the New Hampshire Act of February 8, 1789, was embraced those of the half blood as well as others, in conformity with the construction given to the statutes of distribution as applied, not only to cases of intestacy in general, but also to those in which the blood of the intestate die unmarried and of age, in the lifetime of the mother. The court held that the term was not intended to embrace a different class of persons from those indicated in the same clause by the words "children of the intestate," and concluded that upon the death of a son unmarried and under age, his share of the estate derived by descent or intestacy from his father descended among his surviving brothers and sisters who were the children of the intestate, and to no other, and that therefore brothers and sisters of the half blood were excluded.

In granting letters of administration the half blood is admitted as well as the whole, being of the kindred of the intestate, and were formerly excluded from the inheritance of land upon feudal reason, and therefore a brother of the half blood excludes the uncle of the whole blood. Clark v. Pickering, 16 N. H. 284, 286 (1844).

Where the intestate died leaving children, and one of such children subsequently died under age and unmarried, leaving his brothers and sisters of the whole blood and also brothers and sisters of the half blood on the mother's side him surviving, the court held that, under New Hampshire Rev. Stat. 1842, his estate descended to his brothers and sisters of the whole blood to the exclusion of those of the half blood. Crowell v. Clough, 23 N. H. 207 (1851).

In the above case in passing upon the Revision Act of 1842, which omitted the word "surviving" in speaking of brothers and sisters, the court held that the legislature did not intend to make any such a change as would alter a rule of descent of an intestate's estate as established in that state, and that therefore, upon a child dying under age and unmarried his share was to be regarded as part of the deceased parent's estate, the intention of the legislature being to retain the entire rule, leaving the share of the deceased child to be divided among the surviving children of the deceased parent, so that the whole estate should be distributed as if the child had died in the lifetime of the parent, and not to introduce an exception to the general operation of the rule, wholly inconsistent with the reason upon which it was manifestly founded. Crowell v. Clough, 23 N. H. 207, 210, 211 (1851).

The New Hampshire statute of descent is taken from the English statute of distribution, and no distinction has been admitted between the whole and the half bloods, except where the statute has interfered to change the descent of property, which may have been derived in the particular manner set forth in the second section, which provides for cases in which an infant dies "under age and unmarried" when estates derived by descent or devise from a father or mother descend to the brothers and sisters, or their legal representatives, if any, to the exclusion of the other parent. Prescott v. Carr, 30 N. H. 428, 61 Am. Dec. 652 (1854).

In the civil law code the half blood is not excluded.

cluded, but postponed to the whole; no rule exists to limit the descent of the inheritance to the blood of the first purchaser, nor is any consideration had, whether the estate first came by the father's or mother's side. Den, Delaplaine, v. Jones, 8 N. J. L. 419 (1824), citing, 1 Bro. Civil Law, 223.

When the lands, tenements, or hereditaments come to the person dying seized, by descent, devise, or gift from some one of his ancestors,—that is, from some person from whom lands might by the established canons of descent come to him by descent in the absence of other and nearer heirs,—then brothers and sisters of the half blood of the person dying seized who are of the blood of the ancestor from whom the lands, tenements, or hereditaments come, shall inherit the lands; but brothers and sisters of the half blood who are not of the blood of such ancestor shall be excluded from the inheritance. Den, Delaplaine, v. Jones, supra.

In Den, Lloyd, v. Urison, 3 N. J. L. 197 (1807), the question turned upon the construction of the 2d section of the New Jersey Law which is as follows: "If any person possessed of, or entitled to, real estate in his or her own right in fee simple shall die without disposing thereof, and without any brother or sister of the whole blood, or any issue of such brother or sister, and shall leave a brother or sister of the half blood, such half blood shall inherit the estate as directed in the 1st section of the Act,"—the court construing the section as meaning that such half blood did not inherit where the estate did not come from a common ancestor, or was not acquired by the deceased; but in the above case there was a dissenting opinion by Justice Pennington.

Where the exclusion of the half blood is not the exclusion of the issue of an ancestor by different venters, which was intended to be prevented by the New Jersey statute, it does not carry the inheritance out of the family of the ancestor according to the interpretation of the term "ancestor," to the great injury of his remaining issue, which was the only evil sought to be remedied by the New Jersey statute, but keeps it out of the hands of strangers, preserves it in the family of the ancestor, and casts it upon the remaining issue of such ancestor. Den, Pierson, v. De Hart, 8 N. J. L. 78 (1809).

In Den, Stretch, v. Stretch, 4 N. J. L. 182 (1815), the New Jersey statute enabling the half blood to inherit was looked upon as extending only to brothers and sisters of the half blood, and not to the issue of such brothers and sisters, or to other collaterals related in a more distant degree.

By the proviso to the 5th section of the New Jersey Act of January 20, 1817, Rev. Laws, 608, if the lands, tenements, or hereditaments came to the person so dying seized by descent, devise, or gift of some one of her ancestors, all those not of the blood of such ancestor are to be excluded from such inheritance, and therefore, where the lands in question came to the deceased, "the person so dying seized," "by descent," and of "some one of her ancestors," they were within the operation of the proviso, which was not intended to form any new, distinct, or independent canon or rule of descent, its sole purpose being to limit and restrain the generality of the body of the section, by which, without the proviso, the half blood would in all cases inherit. Den, Delaplaine, v. Jones, 8 N. J. L. 419, 428 (1824).

The purport of the New Jersey statute declares the words must be taken in their common and usual sense.' The same case was afterwards taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the plaintiff had judgment. 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 58, 7 L. ed. 347. In the case of Sheffield v. Lovering, 13 Mass. 490, the same determination was made. By a statute of Massachusetts for the settlement and distribution of intestates' estates, it was enacted that the real estate of the intestate, when he shall leave no issue, shall descend to his father; if no issue nor father, it shall descend in that under certain circumstances the half blood shall be excluded is proved by the general nature of the proviso, its general object being to qualify, limit, or restrain the general enactment preceding it, and by the style and purport of the proviso, which is manifestly in its style merely exclusive and in its purport solely framed to limit and restrain what otherwise would have been general. Therefore where the person last seized became so by descent, devise, or gift from an ancestor, the proviso merely declares that those who are not of the blood of such ancestor shall not inherit, leaving those who are of the blood of such ancestor to inherit by force of the general language of the body of the section. Ibid.

It is not necessary that he that inherits be always heir to the purchaser, it is sufficient if he be of his blood, and heir to him who was last seized, and if, in the consideration of the proviso, the quality of the half blood be not disregarded, the exposition which would make these terms of the same import may be safely indulged, for if the inheritance be given to the next of blood of the ancestor among the half blood, the design of the legislature will be accomplished. Id. 419, 427, 428.

The person dying last seized is the propositus in the cases within the proviso of the New Jersey Statute of 1817, as well as in those within the body of the section, and the ancestor mentioned in the proviso does not in the former cases become the propositus. There is nothing in the language of the proviso to shift the character of the propositus from the person last seized to the ancestor; and to make the ancestor the propositus would totally exclude the half blood, as such, from the inheritance where the lands came to the person last seized by descent, devise, or gift from some ancestor. Id. 419, 428.

The case of Den, Lloyd, v. Urison, 3 N. J. L. 197 (1807), in which the majority of the courts held, notwithstanding the plain language of the section of the Act of 1780, that it meant only brothers and sisters of the half blood on the side of the parent from whom the land descended, was overruled by the later case of Arnold v. Den, Phoenix, 5 N. J. L. 362 (1820), in which the court of errors held to the literal meaning of the words in the section. Prior to the decision in the last case, the legislature repealed the section of the Act of 1780, and passed an Act February 15, 1816, expressly excluding all those who were not of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate came, from inheriting, which act was repealed and supplied by the 5th section of the Act of 1817, Rev. Stat. 606, which again expressly excluded from the inheritance in such cases all who were not of the ancestral blood through which the estate came; and with the same exclusive provision, this act was readopted under the Revision of 1844, Rev. Stat. 889, § 5, so that there is not, on the whole, anything in the course of legislation or judicial construction in that state which evinces any intention to abandon the general rule. Den, Banta, v. Demarest, 24 N. J. L. 481, 484 (1854).

In the fourth case specified in the New York Statute of Descents, 1 Rev. Laws, 53, it is provided that brothers and sisters of the half blood shall inherit equally with those of the whole blood, and the only exception to this rule is where the inheritance came to the intestate by descent, devise, or gift of some one of his or her ancestors. Champion v. Baldwin, 1 Paige, 563 (1829).

Where the intestate died, leaving a widow and 29 I. R. A.

three children him surviving, and the widow married again and died leaving one child by such second marriage, the court held that so far as the title came by descent the child of the widow by the second marriage, being of the half blood, was not entitled to take along with her half brothers and sisters of the whole blood of the intestate, in the share of the estate which descended directly from the intestate, and which was derived by one of the children of the whole blood of the intestate directly from the father, such estate coming to her by descent, but that as to the portion of the widow, which came remotely or indirectly by intermediate descent from the same source, and which formed no part of the ancestral inheritance, the half sister was entitled. Valentine v. Wetherill, 31 Barb. 655 (1860).

The common-law rule, which gives a preference to the blood of the father in the descent of a newly purchased inheritance, and which applies only where there are relatives on the side both of the father and mother, is expressly abolished by section 13 of 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. p. 733. Brown v. Burlingham, 5 Sandf. 418, 421 (1858).

In Brown v. Burlingham, supra, it was contended that, although the Revised Statutes of New York abolished the distinction between the whole and the half blood, so as to render the latter capable of inheriting, yet they had not abolished the rule of the common law, declaring that when the intestate was the first purchaser of the inheritance, relatives on the side of the father should be first entitled to take so as to exclude those on the side of the mother, until the blood of the father should be wholly exhausted. The court held, however, that such contention could not be reconciled with the terms of the statute, and was plainly inconsistent with its intent and spirit, and that such a rule was only applicable when the descent, for the want of nearer relatives, could only pass to collaterals on the side of the father or mother, and when, consequently, those only could be entitled to take who were able to trace their descent from a common ancestor, but that as between brothers and sisters it was settled law that the descent was not necessary to be traced from the common ancestor, but is immediate in the same sense as that from the father to a son.

In construing the provisions of the New York statute under consideration in that case, the court held that, in respect to brothers and sisters of the father and mother of the half blood, the rule of the common law was necessary to be abolished, since otherwise it would have applied, but that in respect to brothers and sisters of the half blood of the intestate its abolition was unnecessary, since by removing the disability of the half blood it ceased to be applicable. Brown v. Burlingham, 5 Sandf. 418, 423 (1858).

With respect to cases of descent not provided for by the New York statute, the rigid and technical rule might retain all its authority, and the common-law incapacity of the half blood may not have been removed, but upon this point the court gave no decided opinion. Ibid.

Where the land was part of property which descended to two as tenants in common, each being so seized solely and severally of an undivided share, it was held that upon the death of one intestate unmarried and without descendants, leaving no father, the fee descended to his mother to the exclusion of the brothers and sisters of the half equal shares to his mother, if any, and to his brothers and sisters; if no issue, father, brother, nor sister, it shall descend to his mother if any; but if no mother then to his next of kin in equal degree. The plaintiff demanded one fifth of the estate of which the intestate, Mary Marsh, died seised, and the question before the court was, whether a brother or sister of the half blood could claim as heir to Mary Marsh, or whether the whole of her estate descended to her mother. The court admits that this could not be made a blood, who were not of the blood of the ancestor. Conkling v. Brown, 57 Barb. 265, 5 Abb. Pr. N. S. 345 (1870). Morris v. Ward, 96 N. Y. 587 (1897), followed.

In a case where the relatives of the half blood claimed under section 10 of the New York Statute (1 Rev. Stat. 752), which provides that if there be no heir entitled to take under the preceding sections, the inheritance (if it came to the intestate on the part of the father) shall descend to the brothers and sisters of the father of the intestate in equal shares, if all be living, and, if any be living and any be dead leaving issue, then to the living brothers and sisters, and to the descendants of those who have died; and that in all cases the inheritance shall descend in the same manner as if all such brothers and sisters had been the brothers and sisters of the intestate,—in construing the above section along with sections 8, 9, and 15 of the same Act, in a case wherein the next of kin to the person last seised were the sisters of the whole blood of his father and a descendant of a deceased sister of the father, and the brother and sisters of the half blood of the father, the court held that the relatives of the half blood, and those of the whole blood, each derived title from the person last seised as if they were his brothers and sisters, and he had derived his title from his father, who would stand, for the purposes of the inheritance, as if he were the father of all of them, although by different venters; then, although the inheritance came to the intestate by descent from his ancestor (in that case from his father), there were none who were not of his whole blood. Beebe v. Griffing, 14 N. Y. 235, 239 240 (1856).

In Wheeler v. Clutterbuck, 52 N. Y. 67 (1873) the intestate died leaving a widow and two infant children his only heirs at law. The widow afterwards intermarried. The two children also dying without issue, leaving no lineal descendants or father, the question was as to what estate the half brother by the second marriage of the widow took. It was held that, as to the half of the property which came to the survivor of the two children of the former marriage of the widow by descent from his father, the half-brother had no title, not being of the blood of the intestate, but as to the other share which came to the deceased half-brother by descent from his sister, the brother of the half blood took subject to the life estate of his mother, all being born of the same mother although issue of different fathers, and being of the blood of the deceased sisters, it not being necessary to his capacity to take under the statute that he should be of the full blood.

This decision was followed by the court in special term, August, 1883, in Dargin v. Wells, N. Y. Daily Reg. August 9, 1883.

In Re Suckley, 11 Hun, 344 (1877), the deceased died intestate leaving him surviving a brother and sister and four grandchildren of a deceased half brother. The court held that the grandchildren were not entitled to share in the distribution, stating that the claimants, instead of being a brother's children, were grandchildren of a half-brother, and were therefore one degree beyond the statute.

Where the intestate died after the date of the North Carolina Act of 1784, and before the year 1795, leaving five sons, one of whom died between the years 1794, and 1808 intestate and without issue, leaving four brothers of the whole blood and a brother of the half blood on the mother's side him surviving, it was held the former took in pref.

erence to the latter. Pipkin v. Coor, 6 N. C. 231 (1813).

Under the North Carolina Act of 1784, the half blood cannot inherit when out of the common-law stocks of lines, although in equal or nearer degree. Doe, Sheppard, v. Sheppard, 7 N. C. 338 (1819).

The North Carolina Act of 1784, letting the half blood into the inheritance when in the line of inheritance, does not change or alter the stock or genealogical lines of the common law, the only difference being the addition of the half blood when in those lines, together with the ascent of real estate in certain cases. Id. 333, 406; Ham v. Martin, 8 N. C. 423, 424 (1821).

When lands descend on the part of the father to a son, who dies without issue, leaving a half-blood brother on the maternal side, and an uncle or more remote relative of the whole or half blood on the paternal side, those next in degree on the paternal side shall inherit to the exclusion of the maternal half blood, because they are of the blood of the first purchaser; the proviso to section 3 of the North Carolina Act of 1784 declaring that the maternal half blood shall not inherit until such paternal line be exhausted of the half blood (and of course of the whole blood), the heirs being sought in the paternal line ad infinitum before any on the maternal side can inherit, no matter how near in degree, and converso, where the lands descend on the maternal side. Doe, Sheppard, v. Sheppard, supra.

In Ballard v. Hill, 7 N. C. 410 (1819) the claims of the half blood in a case of a descended estate prior to the North Carolina Act of 1808, chapter 4, were considered.

In that case the intestate died leaving a son, who took by descent, a brother who afterwards died leaving a son, and a widow who married again and had issue, the issue of such second marriage surviving their brother of the whole blood of the intestate, who died in the year 1808. It was held that the half brothers and sisters, although on the mother's side, took under the Act of 1784, in preference to the cousin, the son of the intestate's brother, even though the estate vested in the person last seised by descent.

Where a son took as heir to his mother, and held until his death in 1802, when he left a niece the daughter of his sister of the whole blood under whom the defendant claimed, and brothers and sisters of the half blood, being issue of his father's second marriage, him surviving.

The defendant's claim was preferred, being governed by the two provisions of the 3d clause of the North Carolina Act of 1784; the first giving a preference, where intestate dies without issue, to the brothers and sisters of the half blood, on the side of the acquiring ancestor, in exclusion of the brothers and sisters of the half blood on the other side; the act by preferring one set of half blood necessarily preferring the whole blood of the ancestor from whom the estate descended, to the half blood of the one from whom it did not descend; the other proviso to the clause giving the same right to the issue of a brother or sister of the intestate dying in the lifetime of the intestate which their ancestor would have had if he had lived. Ham v. Martin, 8 N. C. 423, 424 (1821).

An uncle of the whole blood, where he represented the acquiring ancestor, would exclude an aunt of the half blood who did not, but to prefer him where he did not so represent the acquiring question at the common law, but says that the rules governing the descent and distribution of real and personal estate have generally been alike in their courts, depending wholly on the statutes of that commonwealth. The judicial construction of the English statute of distribution was adopted by the court, and judgment given for the demandant. From the terms of our statute, therefore, as well as from the construction given by other courts to statutes of similar import, we are of opinion that brothers and sisters ancestor would virtually repeal the law entitling the half blood to inherit. So held in Pritchard v. Turner, 9 N. C. 435, 436 (1823).

Here the controversy was between the paternal uncles on one side, and a maternal aunt of the half blood on the other side, the lands having descended from a maternal grandfather, no portion of whose blood flowed in the veins of either contestant, the parties being in equal degree of consanguinity to the intestate. The court held they took equally even if some were of the half blood. Ibid.

Where the lessor of the plaintiff was a paternal brother of the half blood, and the estate descended to his brother from his mother, the record not disclosing that there were any heirs nearer in degree on the mother's side, the court held the plaintiff entitled. Seville v. Whedbee, 12 N. C. 160 (1827).

In Bell v. Dozier, 12 N. C. 333 (1827), an estate acquired by purchase descended from a father, who left a mother and a maternal brother of the half blood, paternal uncles of the half blood, and more distant paternal collaterals. It was held that, under the North Carolina Act of 1808, provision 6, the mother took a life estate, the paternal uncles of the half blood taking the remainder in fee.

In Felton v. Billups, 19 N. C. 306 (1837), land was devised to a grandson, who was otherwise the heir at law, who died without issue, leaving cousins on the part of his grandfather and half brother ex parte materna. It was held that the former took in preference to the latter, who were not of the deviser's blood, under the North Carolina Act of 1808.

Where the land had been transmitted by descent from an ancestor to an only child, who died intestate leaving an only child a daughter, who died intestate and without issue leaving a brother and two sisters of the half blood ex parte paterna, the blood of the ancestor having become extinct the question was whether the land escheated to the university, but the court held that the inheritance descended according to the 5th Rule of the Canons of Descent (N. C. Rev. Stat. chap. 38) to the nearest collateral relations of the paternal line of the person last seised, who were the brothers and sisters of the half blood children of the father. Den, University of North Carolina v. Brown, 23 N. C. 327 (1841).

In McMichal v. Moore, 56 N. C. 471 (1857), the petition alleged that the person last seised died intestate leaving no issue, nor brother nor sister, nor the issue of such, but leaving her father her surviving. The inheritance was derived from an uncle who died intestate, the petitioners being the uncles and aunts and the children of uncles and aunts of such party last seised (brothers and sisters of the uncle from whom the inheritance was derived), the party last seised also leaving half brothers and sisters by the second marriage of her father. The court held that the petitioners, the uncles and aunts and their children, were of the blood of the ancestor from whom the land descended, and that the defendants the half brothers and sisters, although nearer in degree than the petitioners, were not of the blood of the ancestor, and that consequently the petitioners were entitled to the land as against the half blood, but, the father being alive, he was, under the general provisions of the 6th Rule of the Canons of Descent of the Revised Code of North Carolina, chapter 38, entitled to the inheritance without regard to the blood of the first purchaser or ancestor from whom the land descended.

The doctrine declared in the last case, — McMichal v. Moore, supra —, was followed by the court in Little v. Buie, 58 N. C. 10 (1859), the court holding that the father, upon the death of a son, took his entire interest in the land, and the half-sisters not being of the blood of the transmitting ancestor took nothing.

In Dozier v. Grandy, 66 N. C. 434 (1872), the intestate died seised of land inherited from his father, leaving a widow, who subsequently married and had issue, a daughter which survived her. Intestate also left a son to whom the lands descended as heir, but who died without issue or brother or sister of the whole blood, but leaving his half-sister ex parte materna, and near collateral relations of the intestate, him surviving. The court held that the latter took and followed the decision in Bell v. Dozier, 12 N. C. 333 (1827), and Lawrence v. Pitt, 46 N. C. 344 (1854), holding that such collaterals took in preference to the half-sister.

In Armstrong v. Miller, 6 Ohio, 118 (1838), lands which were inherited by an infant from his father were sold and converted into money under order of the court of chancery, and the infant died without attaining his majority leaving half brothers and sisters on the part of his mother by a second marriage. It was held that such half blood were entitled to such property as personal estate, but that had the property remained in the shape of land as it was transmitted to the intestate from his father, it would have passed upon the death of the intestate to his uncles and aunts or their descendants on the part of the father, and not to his half brothers and sisters on the part of his mother by a subsequent marriage, under the Ohio Statute Regulating the Distribution of Estates, 16 Ohio Laws, p. 36.

In Prickett v. Parker, 3 Ohio St. 304 (1854), the purchaser of lands died intestate, leaving two sons and a widow who married again him surviving, the plaintiff's lessors being the issue of the second marriage. One of the intestate's sons died intestate and without issue before the birth of the issue of the second marriage, the other son also dying intestate and without issue. The party in possession was a brother of the purchaser. The court held that upon the death of the first son of the purchaser he became the ancestor of the survivor who took his moiety of the land to which the half-brothers became entitled, under the 4th clause of the 1st section of the Ohio Statute Regulating the Descent and Distribution of Personal Estates, of 1831 (Swan's old ed.) 266.

The 9th section of the Pennsylvania Act of April 8, 1833, after making provision for the half blood in broad and general terms, provides that no person who is not of the blood of the ancestors, or other relatives from whom any real estate descended, or by whom it was given or devised to the intestate, shall in any of the cases before mentioned take any estate or inheritance therein.

The words in the proviso of the Pennsylvania Statute of 1833 have been held to no more exclude the half blood from the succession of an ancestral estate than they excluded it from the succession to a purchased one; any exclusion of a brother or sister being unnatural and impolitic, and were not to be supposed to have been intended by anything less than an express enactment or irresistible of the half blood are not excluded by the Act of 1851, but that the words 'brothers' and 'sisters' include as well brothers and sisters of the half as of the whole blood."

It thus appears that at the time of the enactment of the Statute of Descents of 1852, and continued in force to the present time, the words "brothers" and "sisters," used in a statute of descents, had a judicial construction so as to include by them as well brothers and sisters of the half as of the whole blood. It is a universal rule of construction, implication. Baker v. Chalfant, 5 Whart. 477, 479 (1846).

Where the land descended to an intestate from his mother, who was the devisee of her father, who took by devise from his father the purchaser, it was held that the grandchildren of the brother of such intestate's maternal grandmother were not of the blood of the first purchaser, and could not hold as against nephews of the father. Lewis v. Gorman, 5 Pa. 164 (1847).

In Lewis v. Gorman, supra, it was admitted that the plaintiff was not entitled by virtue of the 11th section of the Pennsylvania Act of 1833 giving the real and personal estate of an intestate, in every case not expressly provided for, to his next of kin "without regard to the ancestor or other relation from whom such estate may have come, for, they being the grandchildren of the intestate's paternal grandfather, the plaintiff was not next of kin, being one degree further removed, plaintiff based his claim upon the fact that he was the blood of the intestate's mother, from whom the estate was immediately derived by descent, and was therefore to be preferred to the kindred in nearer degree who had none of this blood in their veins. The court excluded him from any portion of the inheritance by virtue of the operation of the proviso in the 9th section of the Act of 1833, not being of the blood of those from whom the estate descended or by whom it was given or devised.

In order to ascertain who are the ancestors or other relations, within the meaning of the Pennsylvania statute, the first purchaser must be looked to as such person as the propositus from whom the inheritable blood is to be traced. Hart's App. 8 Pa. 83, 87 (1848); Lewis v. Gorman, supra.

Under the Pennsylvania Act of April 27, 1833, in the distribution of an intestate's estate the next of kin of the blood of the ancestor or other relation from whom real estate descended, or by whom it was given or devised, are alone entitled to such real estate if found entirely within the blood of such ancestor, without regard to the other relationship which they bear to the intestate. Ranck's App. 113 Pa. 95 (1886).

In May v. Espenshade, 1 Pearson (Pa.) 189 (1858), an infant inherited, under a void bequest, land acquired by his father by purchase, and died leaving his mother, grandmother on his father's side, and uncles and aunts, half-blood brothers and sisters of his father, him surviving. The half blood were held entitled before the grandmother or the mother of the infant, under the 9th section of the Pennsylvania Act of 1833, as being of the blood of the first purchaser, standing in the same right, as far as regards other kindred, as the whole blood, although they would have been postponed to the whole-blood brothers and sisters.

The provision in the Rhode Island Statute of 1822, which provides that an ancestral estate, where there are no children of the intestate, "shall go to the next of kin to the intestate of the blood of the person from whom such estate came or descended, if any there be," was a proviso to the canons of the statute, pointing out the degree of kindred prescribed by the act itself, and reckoned according to its canons. Smith v. Smith, 4 R. I. 1 (1854).

In Butler v. King, 2 Yerg. 115 (1836), it was held that if property came from a father by descent, it went on the death of the heir to the brothers and sisters of the whole and half blood ex parte paterna, but that if such property had been derived from a father by gift, upon the death of the son after the decease of a father, it would have vested in the heirs on the part of the father. Ibid.

Thus where the testator left a wife and two sons, and devised his real estate to his sons, and the wife married again and had a daughter by such marriage, one of the sons dying without issue and intestate, the surviving brother was held entitled to inherit to the exclusion of the sister of the half blood. Ibid.

The Tennessee Act of 1796, chap. 14, was construed as intending to let in sisters of the whole and half blood to share equally with brothers of the whole and half blood, where the estate, by the Act of 1784, was divided between brothers and sisters of the whole and half blood; in such a case by the Act of 1796, the estate being divided equally between brothers and sisters of the whole and half blood, brothers of the half blood who cannot inherit under the Act of 1784, not inheriting under the Act of 1796. Ibid.

The Tennessee Act of 1784, chap. 22, § 2, embraces the case of every person dying intestate seized of an inheritance, regardless of whether it has been acquired by descent or purchase, and also regardless of the source of the intestate's title, and places the whole and half blood upon precisely equal footing, not distinguishing between the half blood of the paternal and maternal lines, and if it were not for the restrictive qualifications found in the proviso, both would stand in exactly equal right to the inheritance, in all respects, without regard to whether the intestate had acquired the estate by descent or purchase, or whether it had descended from a paternal or maternal ancestor. Nesbit v. Bryan, 1 Swan, 468, 470 (1852).

But the provision in the Tennessee act of descents, giving a preference to the line of the transmitting ancestor, as between brothers and sisters of the half blood in the descent of real estate, is not to be applied to personalty. Kyle v. Moore, 3 Sneed, 188 (1855).

Where an intestate died without issue, seized and possessed of real and personal estate derived from his father, leaving brothers and sisters of the whole blood and a sister of the half blood ex parte materna, the former were held entitled to the real estate to the exclusion of the latter, who had no inheritable blood. Deadrick v. Armour, 10 Humph. 583, 597, 598 (1850).

The Vermont act for the settlement of testate and intestate estates, passed March 8, 1787, provides inter alia, that the remainder both of the real and personal estate shall descend in the proportions therein mentioned to every of the brothers and sisters of the intestate of the whole blood, and such as legally represent them, or if there be no such kindred, then to the parent or parents of the intestate, and if there be no parents, then in proportion as aforesaid to every of the brothers and sisters of the half blood of the intestate; but if there be no parent, brother or sister, then in proportion as aforesaid to every of the next of kin of the intestate in equal degree and those who legally represent them. Kindred of the whole blood taking in preference to kindred of the half blood in the same degree. Brown v. Brown, 1 D. Chip. 360 (1815).

In that case, brothers and sisters of the intestate of the half blood claimed a moiety as next of kin, the court reversing the decision of the court below, which gave the whole estate to the widow, holding the half blood entitled.

without an exception, that in enacting statutes the legislature will be presumed to have acted with reference to the construction given to former statutes couched in substantially the same language, and that they used the words in that sense. State v. Swope, 7 Ind. 91; Wiggins v. Keiser, 6 Ind. 259; Bross v.

State, 5 Ind. 75; Bowman v. Conn., 8 Ind. 58; Garrigus v. Parks County Comrs. 39 Ind. 73; Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Fountain County Comrs. Id. 315; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, p. 13; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. p. 546, § 424.

It follows that the provision quoted from

With respect to the share of the intestate's son, who predeceased his brother, under age and unmarried, and which descended to the brother, the court held that, under the Wisconsin statute, such portion did not descend as a portion of the estate of a deceased brother, but as a portion of the estate of his deceased father, and that therefore the inheritance came to such son by descent from his father, and not by descent from his brother, and that therefore the sisters of the half blood were not entitled, and that the lands descended to the living brothers and sisters and the children of deceased brothers and sisters of the original intestate. Perkins v. Simonds, 28 Wis. 90, 95 (1871); Kirkendall's Estate, Cramer's App. 43 Wis. 187 (1877).

In the latter case the court held that kindred of the intestate of the half blood inherited equally with those of the whole blood in the same degree, in all cases except in ancestral estates, when only such half blood as are of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate came shall inherit. Kirkendall's Estate, Cramer's App. supra.

In Perkins v. Simonds, supra, the contention was that section 4 of chapter 92 of Wis. Rev. Stat. 1853 was not applicable to a case where the intestate left issue, or a widow, father, mother, brother, or sister, but only where he left no such relative, and where his estate went to his "next of kin" pursuant to the provisions of subdivision 6 of section 1 of the same chapter, and that therefore, as the intestate's son last deceased left sisters of the half blood, they were not within the exceptions contained in section 4; but the court held that the statute did not admit of such construction, but applied to all cases falling within its terms, and was not limited to those in which the intestate died not leaving issue or a widow, father, mother, brother, or sister.

So in construing the same section the court, in a later case, held that by the word "unless" no general rule of inheritance was established—but a mere particular exception to the half blood as defined in the prior clause, and that a next of kin of the full blood of an intestate would take, though not of the blood of the ancestor of such intestate, holding the plain grammatical construction of such clause to be that kindred of the intestate of the half blood shall inherit equally with those of the whole blood in the same degree in all cases, except that if the estate was ancestral, only such kindred of the half blood as were of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate came shall inherit, approving of the construction as given by the court in Perkins v. Simonds, 28 Wis. 90 (1871), although in the present case there were no kindred of the half blood to be affected by the provisions of the statute. Kirkendall's Estate, Cramer's App. 43 Wis. 187, 174 (1877).

Where land acquired by devise descended to the devisee's three children, two of whom died, the survivor thus acquiring the whole, it was held that, under the Rhode Island Statute of 1822, the portion or third part vested in such survivor passed upon her decease to the heirs of the whole blood of the original testator. Gardner v. Collins, 27 U. S. 3 Pet. 56, 7 L. ed. 347 (1829).

It was the purpose of the legislature of Rhode Island to keep estates in the blood of the ancestor who was the stock of descent, such distinction being the only one intended to be made between ancestral and other estates. Cole v. Batley, 2 Curt. C. C. 562 (1855).

VI. When the statute not express.

In some few cases the state statutes make no express provision for the inheritance of the half blood, but yet the courts have construed them as admitting the half blood to an equal position.

This was the case in Indiana under the Statute of 1831, the case of Clark v. Sprague, 5 Blackf. 412, 414 (1840), deciding that, although the statute was not express in its terms, yet, there being no express exclusion of the half blood, they were equally entitled with the whole blood to the real and personal estate of the deceased.

So the Iowa statute makes no express provision for the half blood, yet in Neeley v. Wise, 44 Iowa, 544 (1876), where deceased died intestate without parents or issue seized of real estate, leaving brothers and sisters of the whole and half blood and a husband, who claimed half the estate upon partition, the brothers and sisters claiming the residue, the widow of the father of the deceased by his second marriage with her children of such marriage also claiming part,—the court held that under the revised code the children of the half blood inherited equally with those of the whole in cases where the inheritance was derived through a common parent.

The same conclusion would seem to have been reached by the court, under the Louisiana Civil Code, article 910, in the case of Pearson v. Grice, 6 La. Ann. 232 (1851). See this case more fully under head IV., supra.

So the Supreme Court of the United States placed a like construction upon the Rhode Island Statute of 1822, in the case of Gardner v. Collins, 27 U. S. 3 Pet. 56, 7 L. ed. 347 (1829), holding that the phrase "of the blood," as used therein, meant and included the half blood. See also this case, head III., supra.

VII. Cases wherein the whole blood is preferred.

In some states a preference is given to the whole blood; thus—

Where legacies were vested, the enjoyment only being postponed, and one legatee died before the happening of the contingencies mentioned in the will, leaving a child by a first and three by a second marriage, two of the latter dying, their portions in their father's legacy were held to vest in their sister of the whole blood to the exclusion of the sister of the half blood, the Alabama Statute (Clay's Digest, 168), section 2, preferring the whole blood in equal degree to the kindred of the half blood in the same degree. McLemore v. McLemore, 8 Ala. 687 (1845).

The Delaware statute only prefers brothers and sisters of the whole blood to brothers and sisters of the half blood. McKinney v. Mellon, 3 Houst. (Del.) 277 (1864).

Again, in King v. Neely, 14 La. Ann. 160 (1859), the heirs at law were the children of two sisters of the full blood and a sister of the half blood, and the property of the deceased was situate in Mississippi, the statute of which state, regulating the distribution of estates among collateral heirs, provided that when there shall be no children of the intestate, nor descendants of such children, the estate shall descend to the brothers and sisters of the intestate and their descendants in equal parts, the descendants of a sister or brother of the intestate to have in equal parts among them their deceased parent's share, there being no representation among collaterals, except with the descendants of the brothers and sisters of the intestate, and in no section 2470, Rev. Stat. 1881 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2635), casting the descent upon the brothers and sisters of the intestate living and the descendants of such as are dead, includes as well brothers and sisters of the half blood and their descendants, as those of the whole blood, unless this meaning is in some way controlled or modified by some other section. Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 238, says that "one who contends that a section of an act must not be read literally must be able to show one of two things,—either that case a distinction between the kindred of the whole and half blood, except the kindred of the whole blood in equal degree being preferred to the kindred of the half blood in the same degree. The court therefore held that the nephews and nieces of the full blood excluded the sister of the half blood by effect of representation.

The system of descent established by statute in Delaware as to real estate provides that when any person, having title or any manner of right, legal or equitable, to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, dies intestate as to the same, such lands descend and pass in fee simple, (1) to the children of the intestate, and the lawful issue of any such child or children who may have died before the intestate; but if there be no such child or children, or issue of such child or children, then, (2) to the brothers and sisters of the intestate of the whole blood and to the issue of such deceased brothers and sisters who may have died before the decease of the intestate; but if there be none such, then, (3) in like manner to the brothers and sisters and issue of such of the half blood, the statute not excluding the half blood from inheriting if there be no heir of the whole blood. Doe, Kean, v. Roe, 2 Harr. (Del.) 103, 29 Am. Dec. 336 (1836).

In Fatheres v. Fatheres, Walk. (Miss.) 311 (1828), plaintiff, a half-brother of the defendant, claimed a distributive share of a deceased brother's estate, the defendant claiming as heir of the intestate. The intestate left neither wife nor descendants. Under the Mississippi statute of distribution, the court held that among collaterals, such as brothers and sisters, those of the whole blood were to be preferred to those of the half blood; but if there were no collaterals of the whole blood, but of the half blood, then the half blood collaterals inherited, the same rule applying to both real and personal estate.

The Mississippi statute, under which the above case of Fatheres v. Fatheres was decided, provides that "there shall be no representation among collaterals, except with the descendants of the brothers and sisters of the intestate; and there shall in no case be a distinction between the kindred of the whole and half blood, except that the kindred of the whole blood in equal degree shall be preferred to the kindred of the half blood in the same degree."

In Hulme v. Montgomery, 31 Miss. 105 (1856), the court approved of the construction placed upon the Mississippi statute in the case of Fatheres v. Fatheres, Walk. (Miss.) 311 (1828), supra, stating that the language was so plain and unambiguous as scarcely to admit of construction at all, and that, even if they were doubtful as to the propriety of the interpretation which was then put upon the act, they would not feel authorized to dissent from it.

So in Scott v. Terry, 37 Miss. 65 (1859), the question was whether, when the brothers and sisters of the whole blood of a party dying intestate all died, leaving children, such children were entitled to the inheritance under the statute of descent and distribution by right of representation of their parents, to the exclusion of the sister of the half blood of the intestate who survived her brothers and sisters of the whole blood. The court held that such children were entitled by right of representation to the exclusion of such sister of the half blood.

held that lands in that territory did not, in the year 1807, descend to the half blood as well as to the whole.

In Den, Hancoe, v. McKnight, 11 N. J. L. 456 (1829), the testator devised a specific portion of his real estate to his executors with power to dispose of the same, and also the remainder of his real estate, as they might see best, together with the remainder of the personal estate. The proceeds to be applied to the support of his wife and children until the latter respectively attained the age of twenty-one years, when the overplus was to be equally divided between the wife and children or the survivors. The widow survived and only one child of the testator attained twenty-one and took the fee simple in equal portions with the mother. The widow dying leaving a child by a second marriage, the court held that upon the death of such surviving child of the testator without issue leaving no brother or sister of the whole blood, his moiety descended to his sister of the half blood by the same mother by virtue of the construction of section 3 of the New Jersey Act of 1790, adopted by the court in Arnold v. Den, Phoenix, 5 N. J. L. 362 (1830), to the exclusion of her half-sister by the second marriage of her father, the second husband of the widow of the testator.

The New Jersey Statute of May 24, 1807, provides that if any person possessed of or entitled to real estate in his or her own right in fee simple shall die without making a will disposing thereof, and without any brother or sister of the whole blood, and shall leave a brother or brothers, a sister or sisters, a brother and sister or sisters, or brothers and sister of sisters of the half blood, the said real estate of such person shall descend to and be inherited by such kindred, as the case may be, of the half blood, in the manner and proportions between male and female directed by the 1st section of this Act." Den, Pierson, v. DeHart, 3 N. J. L. 73 (1809).

In the above case the testator devised real estate to his wife for life, remainder in fee to his grandson, who died under age and without issue leaving a sister of the whole blood, who also died under age without issue, and a brother and sister of the half blood ex parte materna by the second marriage of his mother, and also uncles and aunts, children of the testator, under whom the defendant claimed. The widow, the mother of the grandson, also had issue of a third marriage, after the death of the sister of the grandson of the testator before the decease of the testator's widow under whom the plaintiff claimed. The court held the defendants entitled and excluded the half blood, such exclusion not being that of the issue of an ancestor by different venters, not carrying the estate out of the family of the ancestor.

See also Den, Lloyd, v. Urison, 2 N. J. L. 197 (1807); Den, Stretch, v. Stretch, 4 N. J. L. 122 (1813); Den, Delaplaine, v. Jones, 8 N. J. L. 419 (1824), the latter case decided under the New Jersey Act of 1817, supra, head V.

Under the laws of New Mexico, brothers and sisters of the half blood are excluded from the participation in the personal property of an intestate where there are brothers and sisters of the whole blood. In the Goods of Mercure, Tucker, 238 (1867),—in which case the half blood were excluded in the distribution of shares as next of kin in the personal estate of the intestate in the state of New York.

there is some other section which cuts down or expands its meaning, or else the section itself is repugnant to the general purview." There is no claim that the section referred to is repugnant to the purview. But it is assumed by appellants' learned counsel that the only provision for kindred of the half blood is made by section 2472, Rev. Stat. 1881 (1 Burns' Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2627), and, as it omits descendants of the half blood, none of the kindred of the half blood can inherit but half-brothers and half-sisters. It

If the estate does not come to the intestate by descent, but by purchase, it passes to the brothers and sisters of the whole blood only. Freeman v. Allen, 17 Ohio St. 527 (1867).

In Stembel v. Martin, Stone v. Dorster, 50 Ohio St. 495, 521 (1893), the question presented was whether, when the relic of a former deceased husband or wife dies intestate and without issue, possessed of real or personal estate which came to the intestate from such husband or wife, in the manner contemplated by the Act of April 11, 1877 (74 Ohio Laws, 81), the one half of the property passed and descended, under the provisions of that act and the statute to which it is supplemented, to the brothers and sisters of the whole blood of the former husband or wife and their representatives, in preference to those of the half blood and their representatives, or to both classes equally. The court was of opinion that half of the property which went to the brothers and sisters of the former deceased husband or wife descends in the same way; first, to the brothers and sisters of the whole blood or their representatives, and if there were none then to those of the half blood and their representatives, the other half going to brothers and sisters of the deceased relic and their representatives in like order, the statute, employing the same language in disposing of each half, must be presumed to have used it with respect to both in the same sense, there being nothing to indicate a different intention. The section in dispute was 4162 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio. (Justice Minshall dissenting.)

So it has been held that a moiety passing, under the provisions of § 4162 of the Ohio Revised Statutes, to brothers and sisters of a former deceased husband or wife, is governed by the statute to which such act is supplementary, and therefore those of the whole blood have precedence. Martin v. Falconer, 5 Ohio C. Ct. Rep. 584, 585 (1891).

The statute in force at the time of the passage of the Ohio Statute of April 11, 1877, supplementary to the act regulating descents and the distribution of personal estate (74 Ohio Laws, 81) shows the policy of the state to be that, excepting real estate ancestral in character, brothers and sisters of the whole blood take to the exclusion of those of the half blood. Ibid.

The pertinent provision of such act is that the estate shall pass, "one half to the brothers and sisters of such deceased husband," and full effect is given thereto by decreeing that the property passes to such brothers and sisters in the order established by §§ 3 and 4 of the former Act, that is to the whole blood, and, if none of such blood, then to those of the half blood and their legal representatives. Ibid.

In Cresoe v. Laidley, 2 Binn. 279, 285, 286 (1810), an intestate died seized in fee simple of lands which had come to him by descent from his father, leaving a mother, a brother of the half blood on the part of the mother, a maternal grandfather and grandmother, a paternal great aunt who was the plaintiff in the suit, and several cousins, children of paternal great uncles and great aunts. The plaintiff claimed a fifth as one of the next of kin and the defendant held under the heir at common law. The question was whether the case was included in either of the acts directing the descent of real estate of persons dying intestate. The court held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, not bringing her case within either of the 29 L. R. A.

acts of assembly of the 19th day of April, 1794, and the 4th day of April, 1797, the former of which enacts that "the real and personal estate of any person dying intestate, in case such person leaves neither widow nor lineal descendant, nor father or mother, nor brother or sister of the whole or half blood, nor lawful issue of any brother or sister of the whole or half blood, shall descend to and be divided among the next of kin of equal degree," the Act of 1797 making no alteration in the above provision, it being a casus omissus in the interstate laws, the heir at common law taking in such cases.

In Stark v. Stark, 55 Pa. 62 (1867), real estate was devised to a daughter, who died intestate leaving brothers and sisters of the whole and half blood. It was held that, under the Pennsylvania Act, § 27 (1 Brightly's Purd. Dig. 508), those of the whole blood took the estate in preference to the half.

When the half blood are called upon to inherit under section 9 of the Pennsylvania Act of 1833, as being of the blood of the first purchaser, they stand in the same right, so far as regards other kindred, as the whole blood, although they would be postponed and not share equally with the whole brothers and sisters. May v. Espenshade, 1 Pearson (Pa.) 139 (1858).

With respect to brothers and sisters inheriting from each other, the whole blood is preferred, under the Pennsylvania Intestate Laws of 1833. Danner v. Shiesler, 31 Pa. 289 (1858). See also Baker v. Chalfant, 5 Whart. 477 (1846), infra, VIII.; Ex parte Mays, 2 Rich. L. 61 (1845).

In Lawson v. Perdriaux, 1 McCord, L. 282 (1821), it was held that under the South Carolina Act of 1791, as amended by the Act of 1797, a brother of the half blood was not entitled, as a brother or sister of the whole blood, to a distributive share of the real estate of an intestate, who died leaving no brother or sister of the whole blood but a mother him surviving, and that the mother took the whole estate.

Under the above statute and amendment a brother of the half blood is by no construction to be placed upon the same footing with a brother of the whole blood. Ibid.

In Charleston v. Hagermeyer, 1 Riley, Eq. 117 (1867), letters of administration were granted of the intestate's estate which was entirely personal, and no claim was interposed by the next of kin, and an inquisition of escheat was prosecuted, the amount in the hands of the administrator being paid over to the city council. Upon a bill filed for distribution of the estate among the intestate's next of kin, who were, a sister of the whole blood who died a widow intestate leaving three children, another sister of the whole blood who died a widow leaving children, and children of a sister of the whole blood who died prior to the intestate, and also sisters of the half blood,—the court held that if there had been no brother or sister of the whole blood surviving the intestate, the sisters of the half blood would have been placed upon the footing with the children of the deceased sister of the whole blood, but that by the act of distribution they were not to be permitted to take while there were sisters of the whole blood; and as the rights of the parties were fixed by the death of the intestate, the estate was distributable into three parts, one part to each of the three sisters of the whole blood and their descendants.

Brothers and sisters of the half blood cannot inherit from a colored man, under the South Carolina statutes legalising marriages between former provides that "kindred of the half blood shall inherit equally with those of the whole blood; but if the estate shall have come to the intestate by gift, devise, or descent from any ancestor, those only who are of the blood of such ancestor shall inherit: provided, that on failure of such kindred, other kindred of the half blood shall inherit as if they were of the whole blood." It is to be observed that the principal object and purpose of this section, as appellants' learned counsel contends, are to limit the right of inheritance slaves, whether their mother is to be regarded under such statutes as the lawful wife of their father or not, where, without being sold or sent off in such a way as to make a dissolution of the marriage, the father left the mother for another woman, with whom he lived during the lifetime of the former and by whom he was the father of the man from whom the inheritance was claimed; and if the children of the first marriage are legitimate, the son of the second is not, and there can be no inheritance between them. Clement v. Riley, 33 S. C. 66, 83 (1890).

Where a testator died unmarried and without issue, leaving neither brother nor sister or their issue, nor father or mother, him surviving, having acquired lands in his lifetime, the question decided under subsection 2 of section 2420 of the Tennessee Code being as to the right of the heir on the part of the mother, who died leaving a brother and sister, the former dying unmarried and without issue, the sister marrying and having children, two of whom were living, the third having died leaving children, who also died without issue, the father of such last child marrying again and having five children by such marriage, such last-mentioned children claiming as half brothers and sisters, to inherit,—the court held that under the section of the code, the child of a sister of the mother took in preference to the half-brothers on the part of the deceased son of the deceased daughter of the sister, the statute calling for an heir "representing those in equal degree of relationship to the intestate," and not for a person representing one who is himself only a representative, subsection 1 of such section defining the representation of lineal descendants, and subdivision 2 providing for the representation of brothers and sisters by their lineal descendants. Selby v. Hollingsworth, 13 Lea, 145, 147, 148 (1884).

In Wardlow v. Miller, 69 Tex. 395, 398 (1887), it was held that by the civil law in force in Texas at the death of the deceased, in the year 1836, his brothers of the full blood and a daughter of a deceased brother of the full blood were entitled to inherit his estate to the exclusion of brothers and sisters of the half blood.

Again, in Franklin v. Piper, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 253, 259 (1890), where the land in question was patented to the heirs of the deceased, an unmarried man, who left brothers and sisters of the whole blood and brothers of the half blood and descendants of a brother of the half blood him surviving,—it was held that, under the law in force in Texas prior to the Act of 1848, the estate passed to the brothers and sisters of the whole blood to the exclusion of the brothers of the half blood and their issue, the laws of descent and distribution not having been changed until the Act of March 12, 1848. Wardlow v. Miller, supra, followed.

VIII. When half blood preferred to remoter relatives of the whole blood.

When a statute does not really require a different interpretation, justice is best promoted by preferring brothers and sisters of the half blood to those more distantly related. Pond v. Irwin, 113 Ind. 243 (1888).

In Cox v. Clark, 38 Ala. 400, 404 (1890), an action of ejectment, the owner died leaving three children, and grandchildren of two deceased children, a grandchild subsequently dying leaving no issue, and no brother or sister of the whole blood, but leaving brothers and sisters of the half blood, the plaintiffs in the action, neither father nor mother of the plaintiffs being a descendant of such deceased owner from whom inheritance was derived, the only title set up by them being that derived through the half-sister, the grandchild of such owner, who inherited a fifth, and who survived the intestate, her father. The court held that if the grandchild so dying had left surviving her a brother or sister on the maternal side, through whom the inheritance came, or children of such brother or sister, such would take to the entire exclusion of the half blood of the father's side; but, there being no child of the intestate, or brothers or sisters of the intestate on the maternal side, the half brothers and sisters, though on the father's side, were next in degree, and by force of the statute (Code, §§ 1915, 1919) and the qualifying words thereof, took in preference to the uncles and aunts, who were not in the same degree with the half brother or sister.

Where the intestate died owning lands which had descended to her from her husband, unmarried and leaving no children or other lineal descendants either of the whole or half blood, under the Indiana statutes a half brother of the blood of the ancestor took to the exclusion of kindred of the blood more distantly related. Pond v. Irwin, supra.

In Clay v. Cousins, 1 T. B. Mon. 75 (1824), the question was whether, on the death of an infant, lands which were derived from his father passed, by operation of law, to the brother and sister of his father, or descended to his half brother on the part of his mother. The court held the right of inheritance depended upon the principles established by civil institutions, and the legislature having enacted a law regulating the descent of estates in that state, the question was to be decided by the statute, and that under the statute of Kentucky, which contained the provisions of the Virginia Acts of 1785 and 1790, the estate descended to the brother of the half blood, and not to the brother and sister of the father.

In Conant v. Kent, 180 Mass. 178 (1881), the deceased died leaving no issue, father, mother, brother, or sister, but leaving nephews and pieces of the whole and half blood, and a grand nephew, son of a deceased niece of the whole blood. Under the Massachusetts Statute of 1876, chap. 220, § 1, providing that if a person dies intestate leaving no issue, and no father, mother, brother, or sister, his estate shall go to his next of kin in equal degree, the court held that the estate went to the children of deceased brothers and sisters as the next of kin of intestate to the exclusion of the children of deceased nephews and nieces, the nephews and nieces of the half blood taking equally with those of the whole blood, the Statute of 1880, chap. 212, abolishing the distinction and allowing the issue in whatever degree of every deceased brother or sister to share by right of representation in all such cases, not affecting the rights acquired under the Statute of 1876.

In Rowley v. Stray, 23 Mich. 70 (1875), the land in controversy descended to the deceased from his father, who died leaving the estate and a widow him surviving, the nearest surviving kindred of the intestate being his father's mother and the children of his mother's (the widow's) second marriage, the question being whether the father's mother or the brothers and sisters of the half blood inherited. The court held that the half blood took under the by kindred of the half blood. But the limitation is not in the direction of confining the right of inheritance exclusively to the half-brothers and half-sisters, as contended by appellants; but it is to limit the right to those of the half blood only who are of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate shall have come to the intestate by gift, devise, or descent, if there are any such half-blood kindred, or rather, to exclude from such inheritance kindred of the half blood who are not of the blood of the ancestor, statute in priority to the grandmother, even though the latter was in the same degree of kinship to the intestate as computed by the rules of the civil law, and was of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate came to the intestate, while the former were not.

And under the Spanish law, which prevailed in Missouri prior to September, 1807, if a man died without descendants or ascendants leaving brothers of the half blood only and paternal aunts, the brothers of the half blood succeeded to the exclusion of the paternal aunts. Cutter v. Waddingham, 22 Mo. 203, 200 (1855).

In Doe, Sheppard, v. Sheppard, 7 N. C. 333, 403, 404 (1819), the claim was one of the half blood, the lands having been devised in tail to the first, second, third, and fourth sons of the testator in succession, three of the sons being by his second wife. The first son, becoming seised in fee under the North Carolina Act of 1784, devised a portion to each of two of such brothers. One of such brothers dying intestate leaving issue who subsequently died without issue, the other brother also dying intestate without issue but leaving a maternal sister of the half blood by the second marriage of the testator's widow and a nephew of the whole blood, the question was whether the kindred on the paternal side, who were further in degree, or the maternal half sister, were entitled. The court held that the latter were entitled inasmuch as the lands were acquired by purchase.

In Ohio where the estate comes by purchase the husband or wife of the intestate, as well as the brothers and sisters of the half blood, stand before the uncles and aunts. Frickett v. Parker, 3 Ohio St. 394 (1845).

In White v. White, 19 Ohio St. 531, 536 (1860), it was held that the 5th clause of the Ohio Statute of 1857, section 1, relating to descent and distribution, was not to be read as a mere adjunct to the 4th clause, making both alike applicable exclusively to estates which come by deed of gift, such a rendering of the section or clause being against the plain language thereof, there being no good reason for making property coming from an ancestor by deed of gift descend otherwise than it would if acquired by descent or devise.

In that case the property had descended from a grandfather through the father to a daughter who died seised. It was held that upon the death of the latter it passed to the half brother and sister of her father in preference to the brothers and sisters of the grandfather, even though such half brother and sister were not of the whole blood of the immediate ancestor, nor of the blood of the grandfather under the 5th clause of section 1 of the Ohio Statute of 1857.

Where an intestate died seised of an estate by descent from a brother, leaving no widow nor children nor brother nor sisters of the whole blood, but leaving a sister of the half blood and uncles on the father's side, under the Pennsylvania Act of April 9, 1833, the sister of the half blood took in preference to remoter kindred of the whole blood. Baker v. Chalfant, 5 Whart. 477, 479 (1846).

In Simpson v. Hall, 4 Serg. & R. 387 (1818), the intestate died having made a small improvement upon vacant land, but without making any settlement or having a view to residence. Subsequently a warrant to include this improvement was issued to the brother on behalf of the daughter of the deceased, but the court held upon the death of the daughter that such estate did not come to her as parte paterna but as a new acquisition, which, upon her death, descended to a brother of the half blood on her mother's side, in preference to more remote kindred of the whole blood.

In Hart's App., 8 Pa. 32 (1843), a lunatic died unmarried and without issue, or father or mother or brother or sister of the whole blood, or uncle or aunt on the father's side, but leaving three brothers and one sister of the half blood, the children of his mother by a subsequent marriage, and ten cousins, the children of deceased uncles on his father's side. A portion of the real estate having been sold for his maintenance under order of the court, the balance left was claimed by his half brothers and sister, upon the ground that the mother was a descendant of the lunatic's paternal great-grandfather from whom the real estate came, the cousins also claiming in the same line, a portion of the estate being also claimed from the grandfather of the intestate lunatic, the persons last seised by the intestate being his father and a paternal uncle who died intestate. The court held the half brothers and sister entitled in equal proportions, under the Act of April 2, 1833, and preferred them to the cousins.

Where an intestate died possessed of real and personal estate, leaving as his nearest relations an uncle and aunt of the half blood, and cousins of the whole blood, and other more distant relations, the uncle and aunt of the half blood, being in the third degree, under the South Carolina Statute of February 19, 1791 (abolishing the rights of primogeniture), were entitled to the estate in preference to the first cousins of the whole blood. Karwon v. Lowndes, 2 Desaus. Eq. 210 (1806). To the same effect, Perry v. Logan, 5 Rich. Eq. 302 (1853).

In Chaney v. Barker, 3 Bart. 424 (1874), the question was whether half-sisters of a child of the second marriage took the interest in the land which descended from his mother, or whether the uncles and aunts on the mother's side were entitled. The court held that under the Tennessee code the half brothers and sisters were entitled, to the exclusion of the uncles and aunts, following the construction placed upon the provision of the Act of 1784 (Code, § 2420, subsec. 2) in the case of Neabit v. Bryan, 1 Swan, 468 (1852), ante, head IV., although by such construction of the act the land passed entirely out of the blood of the ancestor from whom it was derived.

IX. When half blood takes half portions.

The legislatures of some states have thought fit to make a distinction between the whole and the half blood in relation to the exact portions to be taken by each, giving the former the preference so far as the value or amount thereof is concerned.

This will be found to be the case in Colorado, under Stat. 1883, § 1041; Fla. Stat. 1881, chap. 92, § 4; Ky. Gen. Stat. 1881, chap. 31, § 3; La. Rev. Civ. Code 1875, § 918; Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, § 2164, ed. 1889, vol. 1, p. 1023, § 4468; Tex. Rev. Stat. 1879, art. 1648; Va. Code 1873, chap. 119, § 2; W. Va. Laws 1882, chap. 94, § 2; and Wyoming Comp. Laws 1876, chap. 42, § 3, Rev. Stat. ed. 1887, p. 553, § 2233.

In Texas, however, the statute provides for their taking whole portions where they are all "of the half blood."

By section 27 of the Kentucky Act of 1827 (1 Statute Laws, 660) the personal estate of an intestate dying without wife or child is directed, after pay-where there are other kindred of the half blood who are of the blood of the ancestor. In Robertson v. Burrell, 40 Ind. 828, this court construed this section as if it read as follows: "Kindred of the half blood shall inherit equally with those of the whole blood; but if the estate shall have come to the intestate by gift, devise, or descent, from any ment of debts, "to be distributed in the same proportions and to the same persons as lands are directed to descend in, by an act entitled 'An Act Directing the Course of Descent.'"

In Nixon v. Nixon, 8 Dana, 6 (1839), where the intestate died without father, mother, or child, leaving no descendants of a deceased brother or sister, his eight surviving brothers and sisters (seven of whom were of the half blood), his nearest collateral kindred were, by the 4th section of the Act of 1785, his only heirs and distributees. The 18th section of the Act provides that "if part of such collaterals be of the whole blood, and the other part of the half blood only, those of the half blood shall inherit only half as much as those of the whole blood, but if all be of the half blood they shall have the whole portions, only giving to the ascendants, if there be any, double portions." The question raised upon this clause was whether, when part of the collaterals are of the half blood and the other part of the whole blood, the statute intended that those of the half blood, as a class or body, should be entitled only to half as much as those of the whole blood as a class, or whether it intended that each of those of the half blood should be entitled to only half as much as each of those of the whole blood. The court held that the statute, in making the apportionment between collaterals of the whole and half blood, regarded the individuals of the two classes, and not the two classes collectively; and fixed the ratio of apportionment with reference to the individuals, and not to the classes as such, and therefore each one of the whole blood took twice as much as any one of the half blood, and each of the half blood half as much as any one of the whole blood.

So in Petty v. Maller, 15 B. Mon. 591 (1855), where the owner of land died, leaving a mother and sisters and brothers of the whole and half blood, the latter inherited half portions with the mother and brothers and sisters of the full blood.

Again, in Miller v. Calvert, 1 Met (Ky.) 472 (1858), a testator died leaving a widow and one child of such marriage and children by a former marriage, a child of the second marriage dying shortly afterwards, an infant and without issue, leaving his mother and half brothers and sisters him surviving, and the question was whether the collaterals, who were all of the half blood, took as brothers and sisters equally with the mother, as provided in section 1 of the Kentucky Statute (Rev. Stat. chap. 80). The court held that the language of the statute clearly meant nothing more nor less than that they should inherit only half as much as collaterals when they take with them, and the same proportion when they take with ascending kindred, the mother in that case being the ascending kindred, and as such entitled to take a share equal to a brother or sister of the whole blood, which in that case meant that they share double that of either of the collaterals of the half blood.

The effect of the 2d and 4th sections of the Texas Act of 1848, regulating descent and distribution (Hart's Digest, arts. 598, 596) is to give one half of the estate of the deceased (having no children) to the surviving husband, and if the intestate's mother be dead the other half is to be divided in equal portions, one to the surviving father and the other to brothers and sisters of the deceased, the term "brothers and sisters," as used being general, and those of the half blood as well as those of the whole are strictly within their scope and signification, all doubt upon the question being dissipated by section 6 (art. 597), which declares that where the inheritance is directed to pass to the collateral kindred of the deceased, if part of such collaterals be of the whole blood and the other part of the half blood only of the intestate, those of the half blood shall inherit only half as much as those of the whole blood, but if all be of the half blood they shall have whole portions. Marlow v. King, 17 Tex. 177 (1856).

In that case deceased died without issue leaving her husband her surviving. Her mother had predeceased her and her father married again and had issue of such marriage who were of the half blood of the deceased. The brothers and sisters of the half blood and the father survived the deceased.

The provision, as contained in section 6 of the Texas Statute of 1848, is a qualification of the grant in the preceding sections, to the brothers and sisters, showing that half brothers and sisters are not excluded, but that they are entitled to only half as much as those of the whole blood. Marlow v. King, supra; Lee v. Smith, 18 Tex. 141 (1856).

In Browne v. Turberville, 2 Call (Va.) 391 (1809), the intestate died seized and possessed of real estate, part of which he took by devise from his father, and part by descent from his brother, leaving no issue or widow, but an uncle and cousins, the children of a deceased uncle of the whole blood on his mother's side, an uncle of the half blood on the mother's side, and relations on his father's side. The court ordered such estate to be divided into two portions, one of which the relatives on the father's side were to be entitled to and the other to go to those of the mother's side, the uncle of the whole blood taking two fifths, and the cousins two fifths, the uncle of the half blood taking one fifth.

Where a sister of the whole blood derived lands from a brother to whom they were devised by his father, and died without issue, leaving a mother and sister of the whole blood, and a brother and a sister of the half blood, her surviving, the court decreed a third to the mother and a third to the sister of the whole blood, and one sixth each to the brother and sister of the half blood. Blunt v. Gee, 5 Call. (Va.) 481 (1806).

Where a testator devised the residue of lands to his son, who died having attained the age of twenty-one, intestate and without issue, leaving a mother, two sisters of the whole blood, a brother of the half blood, and a sister of the half blood born after his decease, the court decreed two sevenths of such estate to the mother, and two sevenths to each of the two sisters of the whole blood, one seventh to his brother of the half blood, to the exclusion of the sisters of the half blood subsequently born. Idid.

X. Shifting descents.

In the case of Cox v. Matthews, 17 Ind. 397, 379 (1861), head V., supra, after the death of the daughter of the intestate, the mother married again and had issue of such marriage three children, who were brothers and sisters of the half blood to such deceased daughter, and the court held that had they been born prior to her decease they would have inherited, but, the estate having upon her death vested in her uncles and aunts of the half blood prior to the birth of such brothers and sisters, the estate was not devested by their subsequent birth, the doctrine of shifting descents, although part of the common law, not prevailing in Indiana.

In North Carolina, if one purchases land and dies without issue, it descends upon his brothers and sisters then in being, but if any are subsequently ancestor, those kindred of the half blood only who are of the blood of such ancestor shall inherit: provided, that on failure of such kindred of the half blood having the blood of such ancestor, other kindred of the half blood shall inherit as if they were of the whole blood." From the organization of the state to the enactment of the statute under consideration, kindred of the half blood inherited equally with those of the whole, without limitation or qualification. This section put a limit or qualification upon that born they become equally entitled, and the same law prevails with relation to half blood where they are entitled to inherit. Cutlar v. Cutlar, 9 N. C. 324 (1823).

The next collateral relation to the person last seized, though ex parte paterna, is entitled to inherit, under the North Carolina Act of 1784, an estate descending ex parte materna, even though such collateral be of the half blood born after the decease of such person last seized. Serville v. Whedbee, 12 N. C. 160 (1837); Cutlar v. Cutlar, supra.

In Serville v. Whedbee, supra, the testator devised the lands to his wife, who subsequently married, had issue, and died, leaving a son and her second husband her surviving. Such husband married again and had further issue, the lessor of the plaintiff. The issue of the widow of the testator by her second marriage died seized before the birth of his half-brother. The court held that the case was not distinguishable from that of Ballard v. Hill, 7 N. C. 410 (1819), where the maternal half-brother was preferred to a more distant collateral, though the estate descended upon the brother under whom he claimed, from the father. In that case the contest was between the maternal brothers and sisters and the paternal cousin, who was heir at common law, while in the present case the lessor of the plaintiff was the paternal half-brother, and the estate descended to his brother from his mother. The plaintiff was allowed to recover, he becoming the heir although born after the death of his half-brother, the court following the case of Cutlar v. Cutlar, 9 N. C. 324 (1823), upon the latter point.

And the birth of a child by the mother's second marriage will displace the estate of uncles and cousins, and upon the subsequent birth of other children of that marriage the inheritance will open to admit them as coheirs with those previously born, under the North Carolina Act of 1784. Caldwell v. Black, 27 N. C. 463 (1845), citing Cutlar v. Cutlar, supra.

In Caldwell v. Black, supra, the intestate, who was seized by descent from her father, died prior to the North Carolina Act of 1808, intestate without issue and leaving no brothers or sisters or their issue, but leaving a mother and a paternal uncle. The land descended to the uncle, but was held devested by the subsequent birth (some prior to the year 1808) of half-sisters by the subsequent marriage of intestate's mother, who became entitled as heirs of the propositus, a half-brother born after the passing of such act being also entitled. The court, however, stated that if the title vested in the uncle had not become devested by the birth of such half brothers and sisters before the act of 1808, the birth of the half-brother after the date of such act would not have devested his estate. Ballard v. Hill, and Cutlar v. Cutlar, supra. Davis v. Cooke, 10 N. C. 608 (1835); Den, Trustees of University, v. Holstead, 2 N. C. Law Repos. 406 (1816); Allen v. Gentry, 3 N. C. Law Repos. 609 (1816); Bell v. Dosier, 12 N. C. 333 (1837); McBee v. Alexander, 12 N. C. 322 (1837); Gentry v. Wagstaff, 14 N. C. 270 (1831),—followed and approved.

Where one seized died leaving neither father, brother, sister, nor descendants, but leaving a mother, the estate went to his next of kin of the blood from which it came. It was held that, upon the mother's marrying again and having issue, such issue took as heirs of the half blood. Dunn v. Evans, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 169 (1835).

The 4th clause of the Ohio Statute of Descents of 1824 (2 Chase's Statute, 1812, § 1), preferred the brothers and sisters of the intestate of the half blood to the next of kin to the intestate of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate descended, provided such next of kin were more remote from such ancestor than his brothers and sisters or their representatives; therefore, if the brother of the half blood was living at the time of the death of the person last seized of the whole blood, he would take by descent. Ibid.

But in Drake v. Rogers, 18 Ohio St. 21, 40 (1861), the intestate died leaving an only child and his widow him surviving. The child subsequently dying without brothers or sisters or issue, the lands descended to the next of kin of the father. The court held that the issue of a subsequent marriage of the mother, half blood to the deceased child of the intestate, did not divest an estate vested in the father's next of kin, under the Ohio Act of March 14, 1853, the court distinguishing the case from that of Dun v. Evans, supra, on the ground that the latter case was decided under the Statute of 1824, the Act of 1853 differing somewhat from the former act.

In Baker v. Heiskell, 1 Coldw. 641 (1860) a half brother and sister born after the death of a half-brother dying seized and possessed of real estate were held entitled to inherit with the brothers and sisters of the whole blood, the law not being changed by the Tennessee Act of 1843, chap. 109, § 2.

But no share of the estate of a deceased brother or sister would vest in the brother or sister born after the death of such brother or sister, except they be born within the period fixed by law. Grimes v. Orrand, 2 Heisk. 398 (1871).

XI. Equitable conversion.

The doctrine of equitable conversion has in some instances been held to control the question of descent to the half blood.

Thus, where lands inherited by an infant were sold and converted into money under an order of the court of chancery, and the infant died under age leaving half brothers and sisters on the part of his mother, such half blood took the same as personal estate, although had such property remained real estate the half blood would have been excluded. Armstrong v. Miller, 6 Ohio, 118 (1833).

Section 4313 of the Michigan Statute does not apply to personal property, not dealing with the mode of distribution, but only with descents; therefore where property is devised to a trustee in trust for sale, the proceeds to be applied to the benefit of the cestui que trust, such property becomes personal and not within the statute. Henderson v. Sherman, 47 Mich. 267 (1885).

In Orr v. White, 106 Ind. 361 (1886), the question was whether a wife took, by descent or purchase, title to property purchased by her with the proceeds of property inherited by her from her father and voluntarily sold by her, the court holding that she took as purchaser, equity not following the fund in such cases, and therefore half-blood relations were entitled to take along with the whole. Armington v. Armington, 28 Ind. 74 (1867).

The ancestral quality of the estate does not follow it in such cases. Brower v. Hunt, 18 Ohio St. 311 (1866); Fraser v. Clifford, 94 Ind. 433 (1883). E. W.

rule, and excluded the half-blood kindred only where they were not of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate came by gift, devise, or descent to the intestate, where there were half-blood kindred of the blood of the ancestor. As before observed, that was the principal object of that section. But this section would be practically meaningless if section 2625, Rev. Stat. 1894 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2470), were left out. It is only by looking to that section—providing, as it does, for the inheritance by brothers and sisters living and the descendants of such as are dead, and carrying its provisions into force—that the section under consideration can be given any operation whatever. If there were no provision for inheritance by brothers and sisters, the provision in favor of kindred of the half blood would be an idle fulmination of words. So we must look to both sections to get the meaning of either, as though both sections formed and were but one. And thus the provision in section 2625, Rev. Stat. 1894 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2470), that the brothers and sisters of the intestate, and the descendants of such as are dead, shall take the inheritance,—meaning, as we have seen, brothers and sisters of the half blood and their descendants, as well as those of the whole blood,—may be looked to in determining the scope and meaning of the phrase, “kindred of the half blood shall inherit equally with those of the whole blood,” in section 2627, Rev. Stat. 1894 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2472). If the two sections were one and the same section, no one could doubt that the phrase, “brothers and sisters of the intestate and the descendants of such as are dead,” would all apply to the kindred of the half blood mentioned later on in the section, especially as that part of the section is silent as to whether the descendants of the kindred of the half blood that are dead are to inherit; and it is practically conceded by the learned counsel for appellants that the two sections should be construed as one section. And that is true, because the latter section is practically inoperative without the other. Thus construing the two sections, it is provided that kindred of the half blood, and the descendants of those that are dead, shall inherit equally with those of the whole blood, subject to the limitations and qualifications specified in the latter part of said section 2627, Rev. Stat. 1894 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2472). We therefore hold that the descendants of the half-blood brothers and sisters inherit equally with those of the whole blood. It follows that the court did not err in its conclusions of law.

The judgment is affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

City of CHICAGO, Appt.,

v.
Elise BURCKY.

1. Vacating a portion of a city thoroughfare across railroad tracks, and erecting a viaduct beside its location to carry travel over them, in such a way as to shut land cornering on the vacated portion off from all direct access from beyond both the tracks and the viaduct, and destroy its former availability for business purposes, entitles the owner to damages for the injury thus caused to his property.

2. The right of a land owner to damages for the vacation of a portion of a street so as to leave his property upon a blind court is not affected by his subsequently opening a street which separates his property from the vacated portion of the original street, as his rights are fixed at the time of closing the street.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by the closing of a public highway.
Affirmed.

Statement by Craig, Ch. J.:

This was an action brought by Elise Burcky against the town of Lake, to recover damages sustained to a tract of land fronting east 337 feet on State street and south 556 feet on Sixty-first street, in Chicago, caused, as is alleged, by the vacation of a portion of Sixty-first street, joining her land on the southwest. The following plat shows the location of plaintiff's property, the streets and railroads, at the time the action was brought:

As will be seen by the plat, west of plain-tiff's property several railroad tracks belonging to the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Company and the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railroad Company crossed Sixty-first street at about right angles. Just south of and adjoining Sixty-first street and State street those railroad companies owned a large tract of land, which was used by them for a switching yard and other usual railroad business, and was covered with numerous railroad tracks. The town of Lake and the railroad companies considered the railroad crossing at Sixty-first street dangerous, and the town, on the 14th day of January, 1885, passed an ordinance authorizing the making of a contract with the railroad companies, whereby the companies were to erect on a strip of land 25 feet wide belonging to them and adjoining the south line of Sixty-first street, a viaduct, extending from a point 170 feet east of the east line of Wentworth avenue to a point 210 feet west of the west line of State street, the town to build the approaches thereto from Wentworth avenue and State street. When completed, the viaduct and approaches were to become a public highway. When the companies completed the building of the viaduct, the town was, by proper ordinance, to vacate that part of Sixty-first street at the railroad tracks commencing 189 feet east of the east line of La Salle street, and running to a point 198 feet further east, and to the west line of plaintiff's property. The contract, as thus provided for in the ordinance, was duly executed, and the viaduct built, and on December 30, 1885, the 198 feet on Sixty-first street, at the railroad crossing as above described, was vacated.

When this writ was commenced plaintiff's property consisted of an entire tract, as shown by the plat heretofore mentioned, but before the trial of the cause in the circuit court plaintiff subdivided the land by opening through it two streets running north and south from Sixty-first street, one known as Butterfield street, on the west side of the tract, and the other about half way between Butterfield and State streets. The streets were each 66 feet wide, and the west line of Butterfield street is the west line of plaintiff's property as situated when the action was begun.

After the evidence was all introduced the defendant requested the court to instruct the jury as follows:

"The jury are instructed that, it being admitted that the fee-simple title to the street in question (Sixty-first street) was in the city, and it appearing from the evidence that the property claimed to be damaged does not abut upon that portion of Sixty-first street that was vacated, but is situated in another block east of the block in which the portion of said Sixty-first street was vacated, the plaintiff has failed to prove any actionable injury on account of the said vacation of Sixty-first street, and all evidence of any damage done to plaintiff's property by reason of the said vacation is not to be considered by the jury in arriving at a verdict in this case."

This instruction was refused, and the decision is relied upon as error.

Messrs. John Mayo Palmer, W. S. Johnson, and Byron Boyden, for appellant:

The diversion of anticipated trade, and the inconvenience to travel, were not proper elements of legal damages.

Hohmann v. Chicago, 140 Ill. 228.

The plaintiff has free access to all her property by public streets. She is merely disabled from going west on Sixty-first street at grade, and this disability is shared by the public generally.

That part of Sixty-first street that the town of Lake vacated was located between Butterfield and La Salle streets. Plaintiff's property was all located in the blocks between Butterfield and Dearborn and Dearborn and State streets, east of the block in which the vacation occurred.

Plaintiff cannot, therefore, recover for damages to her property by reason of the vacation.

A property owner has no cause of action against a municipality for damages to his property by the vacation of a public highway, where no part of his property abuts upon the portion of the highway vacated, with the two exceptions:

First. Where a property owner owns property situated on a street, sometimes called a court, opening only at one end, and the authorities of the city or town decide upon a discontinuance or a vacation of the street into which the court or stub of the street enters, then, although no part of the property upon the court would abut upon the street vacated, still his means of access to and egress from his property would be cut off, and, of course, his property damaged, and he would have a good cause of action against the municipality:

Second. If a person owned a tract of land connected by a private way or easement to a public highway, and the authorities should vacate the highway, then he would lose the benefit of his estate or be compelled to open a way at his own expense, which would be a direct and tangible damage, and he would have a right of recovery.

Mr. Alex. Clark, for appellee:

The law governing this class of cases is very clearly set out in Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn., 102 Ill. 879, 40 Am. Rep. 598. The court there says: "First, for any act obstructing a public and common right, no private action will lie for damages of the same kind as those sustained by the general public, although in a much greater degree than any other person; second, an action will lie for peculiar damages of a different kind, though even in the smallest degree; third, the damages, if really peculiar, need not always be direct and immediate, like the loss of a horse, but may be as remote and consequential as in other cases of tort; fourth, the fact that many others sustain an injury of exactly like kind is not a bar to individual actions of many cases of a public nuisance."

There would seem to be no difficulty about the right of recovery in the Burcky case. The property there is not only damaged in the smallest degree in a peculiar way, but in a manner where the damages seem so apparent that it is only necessary to understand the geography of the case to at once appreciate them.

Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64.

Although cities and villages have been given power by the legislature to vacate streets, yet this power was vested in them with the reservation of an action for damages to the property injured.

Parker v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 146 Ill. 158.

The measure of damages in this case is the difference between the value of the tract of ground, taken as a whole, as it stood before and after the closing of the street, and the construction and operation of the viaduct, and as affected by the same.

Craig, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The viaduct and its approaches, constructed along the south line of Sixty-first street, were about one quarter of a mile long, and extended from Wentworth avenue to State street. The construction of the viaduct opposite the plaintiff's land prevented the laying out of any streets south, and stopped all travel in that direction, while the vacation of that portion of Sixty-first street crossed by the railroad tracks stopped all travel west, so that the property of plaintiff abutting on Sixty-first street between the railroad tracks and State street was shut in, and all access shut off from the south and from the west. By the construction of the viaduct south of plaintiff's property, and by closing the street west of the property, and thus stopping all communication south and west, it is plain that plaintiff's property was seriously damaged. But it is contended that the damages she has sustained are not special in their character, but are of the same kind as those sustained by the general public, and upon this ground no recovery can be had. If the damages sustained by the plaintiff are of the same kind as those sustained by the public at large, differing only in degree, and not in kind, or if the damages sustained by the plaintiff are of the same kind sustained by the general public, the only difference being in the excess of damages sustained by plaintiff, then, under the well-settled rules of law which control cases of this character, she could not recover. Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn., 102 Ill. 879, 40 Am. Rep. 598; East St. Louis v. O'Flynn, 119 Ill. 900, 59 Am. Rep. 795; Parker v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 146 Ill. 158.

Where damages are sustained by the public at large, but in different degrees, the law does not confer a remedy. Thus, in Davis v. Hampshire County Comrs., 153 Mass. 218, 11 L. R. A. 750, it is said: "The general doctrine is familiar that ordinarily one cannot maintain a private action for loss or damage which he suffers in common with the rest of the community,—even though his loss may be greater in degree." The reason of the rule is that a contrary doctrine would encourage many trivial suits.

In Shaw v. Boston & A. R. Co., 159 Mass. 597, the court says: "The only right of the plaintiff to use the highway is that of the public generally. 'Where one suffers in common with all the public, although, from his proximity to the obstructed way, or otherwise from his more frequent occasion to use it, he may suffer in a greater degree than others, still he cannot have an action, because it would cause such a multiplicity of suits as to be of itself an intolerable evil.'"

In Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 254, in passing on the question, the court held that a land owner could not recover unless he suffered a special damage not common to the public.

In Heller v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 28 Kan. 625, in the discussion of the question, the court said: "Where a party owns a lot which abuts on that portion of the street vacated so that access to the lot is shut off, it is clear that the lot owner is directly injured, and may properly challenge the action. The closing up of access to the lot is the direct result of the vacating of the street, and he, by the loss of access to his lot, suffers an injury which is not common to the public; but in the case at bar access to plaintiff's lots is in no manner interfered with. The full width of the street in front and on the side is free and undisturbed, and the only real complaint is that by the vacating of the street away from her lots the course of travel is changed. But this is only an indirect result."

In the discussion of the question in Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn., 102 Ill. 379, 40 Am. Rep. 598, it is said (p. 398): "In the American Law Register, New Series, for October, 1880, one of the learned editors of that periodical, Mr. Edmund H. Bennett, in a note to Fritz v. Hobson [L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 542], after a very elaborate review of the principal cases bearing upon the question now before us, comes, as we think very correctly to the conclusion: 'First, for any act obstructing a public and common right no private action will lie for damages of the same kind as those sustained by the general public, although in a much greater degree than any other person; second, an action will lie for peculiar damages of a different kind, though even in the smallest degree; third, the damages, if really peculiar, need not always be direct and immediate, like the loss of a horse, but may be as remote and consequential as in other cases of tort; fourth, the fact that many others sustain an injury of exactly like kind is not a bar to individual actions of many cases of a public nuisance.'"

Other cases holding a like doctrine might be cited, but we have referred to enough to show the current of authority bearing on the question. There is less difficulty in determining what the law is, than in making a proper application of the law to the different cases that may arise. In this case we think it plain that plaintiff was entitled to recover. Her property fronted on Sixty-first street. It extended west to and cornered with that part of the street which was vacated. By the vacation of the street and the erection of the viaduct her property, extending from the railroad tracks east to State street, was shut in, and all access from the south and the west was shut off. What was originally a thoroughfare along the entire line of plaintiff's property fronting on Sixty-first street was by the action of the town turned into a blind court. No other property was damaged or affected in the same way, except the small tract lying between Wentworth avenue and the railroad tracks. The property of the general public was not affected like plaintiff's, nor was the damage sustained by the public of the same kind. Before the action taken by the town, plaintiff's property fronting on Sixty-first street was so situated that it was available as lots for business purposes, but after the action of the town it was rendered useless for that purpose.

It is also claimed that by making the subdivision and opening Buttersfield street, which separates plaintiff's property from the vacated portion of Sixty-first street, plaintiff has barred herself of the right to recover.

When the street was closed up and the viaduct constructed, the town became liable to pay such damages as the plaintiff had sustained. The rights of the parties, so far as the question of damages was concerned, were fixed, and any future subdivision which the plaintiff might make of her property could not deprive her of a right to recover such damages as she had sustained.

From what has been said, if we are correct, the instruction did not announce a correct rule for the determination of the case, and it was properly refused.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

(158 Ill. 45.)

1. The interest of a prior mortgagee cannot be displaced by the lien of a judgment for damages in consequence of the sale of intoxicating liquors, under the Dramshop Act, § 10, providing that if any person shall rent or lease to another any building to be used for the sale of such liquors, or knowingly permit it to be so used or occupied, it may be sold to pay any such judgment against any occupant.
2. The provision of the Dramshop Act, § 10, making the building and premises where intoxicating liquors are sold with permission of the owner liable to sale under a judgment against the occupant for damages from the sale of such liquors, applies only to owners or those having a rentable interest in the property, and not to a contingent interest, such as that of a mortgagee.

ERROR to the Appellate Court, Second District, to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Kendall County refusing to give a judgment recovered under the Civil Damage Law priority over an antecedent mortgage on the property of the dealer who sold the liquor. Affirmed.

Statement by Phillips, J.:

At the October term, 1892, of the circuit court of Kendall county, a bill was filed by defendant to foreclose a certain mortgage dated December 21, 1889, executed by Albertina Helmuth and Jacob, her husband, on certain real estate in Yorkville, Illinois, given to secure a note for $2,000. To this bill plaintiffs in error, consisting of Sarah Bell and her five children, were made parties defendant, for the reason, as it appears, that on December 22, 1891, they had recovered a judgment against Jacob Helmuth and Albertina Helmuth for damages suffered by reason of the death of the husband of Sarah Bell, caused by the sale to him of intoxicating liquors by Jacob Helmuth, who occupied and used the mortgaged premises as a saloon. Plaintiffs in error filed their answer to the bill in foreclosure, and also their cross-bill, by which they sought to subject the mortgaged premises to the lien of their judgment, rendered in 1891, and declared superior to the mortgage of Cassem, given in 1899.

NOTE.—The question involved in the above case as to a priority between a judgment establishing a lien under the law regulating the business of dramshops and a pre-existing mortgage on the premises seems to be here decided for the first time. As to the priority between mortgages and mechanics' liens, see note to Wimberley v. Mayberry (Ala.) 14 L. R. A. 808.

The answer and cross-bill in substance set forth that the premises in question, known as the "City Hotel," in Yorkville, were owned and occupied by Albertina and Jacob Helmuth, who were engaged in the business of selling intoxicating liquors, and that at the time of taking the mortgage in question, and at all times thereafter, the defendant in error, Cassem, had knowledge of this fact, and knowingly permitted the same to be so used; that by reason of the sale by the Helmuths to the husband of plaintiff in error, Sarah Bell, he became intoxicated and lost his life by drowning, on account of which plaintiffs in error had recovered judgment for $5,000, as above stated; that execution had been issued thereon March 4, 1892, and a levy made on the mortgaged premises, and ask that the mortgage be declared subordinate to the judgment.

Exceptions were filed in the trial court to the answer and to the answer of the guardian ad litem, which were in substance the same, and demurrer to the cross-bill, which were sustained by the court and the cross-bill dismissed for want of equity. Decree of foreclosure was entered on the original bill, finding the amount due defendant in error, ordering sale of the premises, and finding that the interest of the plaintiffs in error accrued since the mortgage lien of Cassem. On appeal to the appellate court for the second district this decree was affirmed, and from that judgment this writ of error is prosecuted to this court.

Until the commencement of the suit against him for that purpose, the judgment creditor acquires no interest in the property; and if, before the suit is brought, it has been sold and conveyed, it cannot be subjected to the payment of such judgment.

8 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 1182; Bellinger v. Griffith, 28 Ohio St. 619.

Phillips, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented in this court requires a construction of section 10 of the Dramshop Act, which is as follows: "For the payment of any judgment for damages and costs that may be recovered against any person in consequence of the sale of intoxicating liquors under the preceding section, the real estate and personal property of such person of every kind, except such as may be exempt from levy and sale upon judgment and execution, shall be liable, and such judgment shall be a lien upon such real estate until paid; and in case any person shall rent or lease to another any building or premises to be used or occupied, in whole or in part, for the sale of intoxicating liquors, or shall knowingly permit the same to be so used or occupied, such building or premises so used or occupied shall be held liable for, and may be sold to pay, any such judgment against any person occupying such building or premises." 1 Starr & C. p. 978.

It is contended, from the fact that this act makes the building and premises liable where the owner permits their use for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and provides that the judgment thus recovered shall be a lien, and the premises shall be held liable for and may be sold to pay such judgment, that therefore a judgment recovered under this act is a paramount lien to a mortgage upon the building where the liquors were sold, notwithstanding the mortgage bears a prior date of execution and recording to the rendition of the judgment. This statute will not bear the construction attempted to be deduced from it, that if one loans or advances money on property which is or afterwards may be used and occupied for dealing in intoxicating liquors, his mortgage lien shall be subordinated to that of a judgment which may at some later date be recovered against the owner of such property. There can be no doubt, from a consideration of this section, that it was the evident intention of the legislature to make only owners of property, and those having rentable interests, amenable to the provisions of the act. A mortgagee, by virtue of his mortgage only, and before any condition broken, has no legal right to rent or lease the incumbered premises to any person or for any purpose. Having no such control over it, he cannot be said to permit the premises to be occupied for any purpose. If premises on which money had been loaned and a mortgage executed should at some time thereafter be leased or rented by the mortgagor for dealing in intoxicating liquors, the law does not recognize the right of the mortgagee to compel the vacation of such premises without some clause in the mortgage giving such power. Until some condition of the mortgage is broken, the control of the mortgagor is as absolute, except in the permitting or committing of waste, as if no mortgage lien existed. At the time the mortgage in this case was executed the cause of action of plaintiffs in error had not accrued, and it could not be anticipated that it ever would. To hold that a judgment recovered on such a subsequently accrued cause of action should precede a former mortgage lien would have the effect, in many cases, as in this, to absolutely nullify the mortgage, as the premises would be absorbed in the satisfaction of a large judgment. The large commercial transactions and interests of the country and the interchange of capital demand the borrowing of money and the securing of the same by real estate mortgage, and a mortgagee is compelled to rely upon the condition of the title as shown by the records at the time of the advancement. It would be entirely against public policy to hold that a judgment on a subsequently accrued cause of action should defeat a lien otherwise valid. No investor could safely advance capital if such were the law. Until the commencement of a suit in some cases, and the rendition of a judgment in most others, the judgment creditor acquires no interest in the property, and if, before the suit is brought, it has been sold and conveyed, it cannot be subjected to the payment of such judgment. Bellinger v. Griffith, 23 Ohio St. 619.

In the case last cited a judgment was recovered, under a statute similar to our own, against a tenant who occupied the premises and used them for the purpose of selling intoxicating liquors. After the recovery of the judgment a suit was instituted against the owners of the property at the time of the unlawful sale of the liquor, to subject the real estate to the payment of the judgment. Meanwhile, after the recovery of the judgment against the tenant, but before this proceeding was instituted, the premises had been sold, in apparent good faith, to a third party, and it was held by the court that the title passed free from any lien of the judgment. It was contended by the plaintiff that the judgment against the tenant who unlawfully sold the liquor became a lien on the property from the time the cause of action accrued.

The court said: "It is true the statute declares that the property shall be held liable for the damages assessed against the occupier. But this liability is not spoken of in the sense of creating a lien. . . . To give the statute the construction contended for would go far towards rendering titles insecure. No one could safely purchase real estate on the faith of its appearing from the public records to be clear of liens and incumbrances. A purchaser would be compelled to take the risk of ascertaining who had been the previous occupiers of the premises, and whether any judgments or causes of action existed against them for the unlawful use of the property while in possession. Surely no such innovation upon the policy of the state in regard to requiring liens upon real property to appear of record could have been intended, without an explicit legislative declaration to that effect."

If it should be held that one holding a judgment rendered on a cause of action similar to that of plaintiffs in error was entitled to a superior lien to that of a prior mortgage on the premises in which the liquor was sold, then by the same reasoning it must be held that such judgment would be a valid lien as against a purchaser of the same property, although the conveyance was made before the rendition of the judgment. The adoption of such a rule would not be the legitimate result of the construction of the statute under consideration, but would be judicial legislation by which a priority of liens would be declared and determined without legislative action on which to base the same, and would permit conspiring and fraudulent owners of property to defeat a mortgage lien or valid conveyance of their property by collusion with other parties claiming a cause of action under this statute.

We hold, therefore, that the true construction of this section of the statute is, that it applies only to owners or those having a rentable interest in the property, and not a contingent interest, such as is that of a mortgagee. It was not error, therefore, for the Appellate Court to affirm the decree of the Circuit Court, and the judgment of the Appellate Court for the Second District is affirmed.

Catlin v. Valentine, 9 Paige, 575, 4 L. ed. 821, 38 Am. Dec. 567; Brady v. Weeks, 3 Barb. 157.

Start, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The information charges that the respondent kept and maintained a pigpen within 100 feet of an inhabited dwelling house, in violation of a regulation made by the state board of health. To this information the respondent demurred. The demurrer was overruled, information adjudged sufficient, and the respondent ordered to plead over; to which the respondent excepted.

No. 93, section 6, of the Acts of 1886, as amended by No. 83, section 11, of the Acts of 1892, provides that the state board of health shall have authority to promulgate and enforce such regulations for the better preservation of the public health in contagious and epidemic diseases, and regarding the causes which tend to their development and spread, as they shall judge necessary; and any person or persons or corporation neglecting or refusing, after having been duly notified in writing, to comply with the requirements of such regulations, shall, upon conviction thereof, pay to the treasurer of the state a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100. Acting under the authority conferred by these enactments, the board of health promulgated a regulation that no pigpen should be built or maintained within 100 feet of any well or spring of water used for drinking purposes, nor within 100 feet of any street or inhabited house.

The power of the legislature to prevent the introduction and spread of infectious and contagious diseases cannot be questioned. All property in the state is undoubtedly held subject to the reasonable supervision of legislative authority, to an extent necessary to the reasonable preservation of the public health. While the necessity and propriety of particular regulations are primarily of legislative determination, their character, whether reasonable, impartial, and consistent with the state policy, is a question for the court. Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, 197; Parker & Worthington, Public Health & Safety, 68; Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 819, 825, 829; Mugler v. Kansas, 128 U. S. 623, 81 L. ed. 205; Minnesota v. Barber, 186 U. S. 813, 84 L. ed. 455, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 185.

By the enactment in question, the legislature attempted to confer upon the state board of health power to promulgate and enforce reasonable regulations in respect to contagious and epidemic diseases and causes which tend to their development and spread. If the board of health, in promulgating the regulation in question, were in the reasonable exercise of the power attempted to be conferred upon them, all pigpens built or maintained within 100 feet of any well or spring of water used for drinking purposes, or within 100 feet of any street or inhabited house, must be regarded as infected with contagious or epidemic diseases or causes which tend to their development and spread; or, under such circumstances, it must be inferred that there are reasonable grounds for apprehending that they are thus infected or are such causes. A regulation so general and far-reaching, affecting business and the use of property, cannot be held to be reasonable or justifiable, unless there are reasonable grounds for a belief that the necessary protection of the public health requires it. The regulation in question cannot be held to be reasonable or justifiable because some few individuals in the state maintain pigpens in such a manner as to endanger public health. To justify promulgating such a regulation, there must be reasonable grounds for apprehending that all pigpens affected by it are, or may be, a menace to public health. It cannot be said that all pigpens situated within 100 feet of a well or spring of water used for drinking purposes, or within 100 feet of a street or inhabited house, endanger public health, or that there are reasonable grounds for apprehending that they do. They may or may not thus endanger the public health. Very much depends upon the manner of construction, the way they are kept and occupied, the means for keeping them clean, the location and surroundings, the character and slope of the land, their nearness to or remoteness from thickly settled communities, and the existence or nonexistence of diseases and causes of diseases. A pigpen may be a menace to public health when situated in a city or village and perfectly harmless when situated upon a farm; and the fact that a pigpen situated in a city or village is a nuisance, and endangers public health, and ought to be abated, furnishes no reasonable ground for abating a pigpen upon a farm, which is not a nuisance, and in no way affects the public health. The regulation, if valid, had the effect to abate and cause to be removed every pigpen within the prohibited limit. It deprived every owner of land within the limit of its use for purposes that, under proper conditions, are harmless and legitimate. By it, the citizen living miles from neighbors, and from epidemic diseases and causes which tend to their development and spread, and whose possessions do not extend beyond the prohibited limit, is unreasonably and unjustly deprived of his right to build and maintain a pigpen and engage in a business which has ever been regarded, when conducted under proper conditions, as legitimate. The regulation is intended to have force and effect throughout the entire state. It affects alike those pigpens which are, as a matter of fact, maintained in such a manner as to be offensive, and those which are maintained with every possible degree of cleanliness; it affects alike those situated upon farms and those situated in thickly settled communities; and it affects all pigpens within the prohibited limit, without reference to the existence or nonexistence of epidemic or contagious diseases and the causes which tend to their development and spread, in any particular locality. It is intended to affect alike a business which is so conducted as not to be a nuisance, or in any way endangering public health, or furnish reasonable grounds to apprehend that it will do so, and business which is so conducted as to be a nuisance, and furnish reasonable grounds for a belief that it will endanger public health if continued. It reaches beyond the scope of necessary protection and prevention into the domain of restraint of lawful business and use of property. It is founded on fear and apprehension of a remote possible danger to the public health, and not upon its existence, or upon reasonable grounds to apprehend that any considerable portion of the pigpens affected by it endanger or will endanger public health. It is an unreasonable and unjust interference with a legitimate and recognized business pursuit and use of property, without reference to its location or the manner in which it is conducted, or the existence or nonexistence of epidemic or contagious diseases or causes which tend to their development and spread, in any particular locality. It is too broad and sweeping to be upheld by any necessity of protecting the public health, and we cannot regard it as a reasonable and legitimate exercise of the power attempted to be conferred by the enactments in question.

Judgment reversed; demurrer sustained; information adjudged insufficient and quashed; respondent discharged.

Taft, J., concurs in the result:

The keeping of pigs, not pigpens, is the evil. The board had no authority to prohibit the building of a pigpen.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

ALPINE TOWNSHIP SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 11, Plff. in Err.,

v.
Aloys BATSCHE.

(..... Mich.)

1. The occupancy of a part of a school-house as a residence, by a teacher, for the purpose of enabling him the better to perform his contract to teach, does not make him a tenant of the school district employing him, but his occupation is that of the district.
2. A teacher lawfully in possession of the schoolhouse, who holds over without right, becomes a tenant at sufferance if the owner permits him to remain a sufficient length of time to imply an intentional acquiescence in the occupancy, although his previous holding was not that of a tenant, and a consent to the occupancy, either express or presumed from lapse of time, is not essential to create that relation.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kent County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of a portion of a school building. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Wolcott & Ward, for plaintiff in error:

There was an implied agreement that defendant should vacate at the close of his school term, and it was contrary to the terms of that agreement for him to continue in possession and refuse to vacate.

Wilkinson v. Williams, 51 Mich. 155.

There are many things to distinguish the holding of this defendant from that of a person whose occupancy of a building is incident to, and for the better performance of, his duties in the service of his master.

Every case where a man has been held to be a mere servant supports the doctrine that he may be forcibly ejected, and it would be held clearly contrary to the spirit of our law to permit the plaintiff, under the circumstances here stated, to put an end, with a strong hand and without due process of law, to an occupancy, of seven years' duration, of rooms which had been continuously the home and residence of the defendant and his family.

The defendant should not be heard to complain that the more peaceable and orderly method was adopted.

Bristol v. Burr, 8 L. R. A. 710, 120 N. Y. 427.

If Batsche was a tenant his refusal to go unless expelled by force or legal process was not forcible detainer.

Under ordinary circumstances an occupancy of three months' duration, without special circumstances to rebut the presumption of a tenancy, would raise that presumption.

The defendant is estopped from objecting that the school district cannot be a landlord.

Messrs. Carroll, Turner & Kirwin, with Mr. F. A. Stace, for defendant in error:

A tenant at sufferance is one who enters into premises by lawful lease, and holds over by wrong.

Wood, Land. & T. § 14.

In order to create a tenancy of any nature, the two following elements must concur:

1. The person going into possession must occupy the premises in subordination of the other's title;

2. An express demise of the premises, or an occupancy under such circumstances that a contract of letting can fairly be implied therefrom.

Wood, Land. & T. p. 26; Finlay v. Bristol & E. R. Co. 7 Exch. 410; Cole v. Galt, 14 Iowa, 587; Chatard v. O'Donovan, 80 Ind. 20, 41 Am. Rep. 783; Hildebrand v. Scheich, 55 Mich. 468.

The mere fact that defendant remained under a naked possession for six or seven months after the right of occupancy under the contract of hiring was at an end, and of which both parties were well aware, does not create a tenancy of any kind.

Wood, Land. & T. §§ 9, 10; King v. Chesnut, 1 Barn. & Ald. 478; King v. Stock, 2 Leach, O. C. 1015, Russ. & R. O. C. 185; Watson v. McEachin, 47 N. C. 207; State v. Pridgen, 30 N. C. 84; State v. Curtis, 20 N. C. 232.

If a tenancy of any kind sprang up after the termination of the contract of hiring between the parties as claimed by the plaintiff, then it follows from the law of landlord and tenant that certain reciprocal rights and duties must consequently exist and accompany such relation.

Merrill v. Mackman, 24 Mich. 236, 9 Am. Rep. 124.

Under such circumstances as exist in this case, the plaintiff cannot maintain against the defendant assumption for use and occupation.

Marquette, H. & O. R. Co. v. Harlow, 37 Mich. 554, 26 Am. Rep. 538; Boston v. Binney, 11 Pick. 1, 22 Am. Dec. 858; Merrill v. Bullock, 105 Mass. 486; Wilmarth v. Palmer, 84 Mich. 847; Lockwood v. Thunder Bay River Room Co. 49 Mich. 538; Bancroft v. Wardell, 13 Johns. 489, 7 Am. Dec. 896; Wyman v. Hook, 2 Me. 387; Central Mills Co. v. Hart, 124 Mass. 128.

Hence all the incidents of tenancy are wanting.

There was absolutely no privity of estate or contract between the parties after the determination of the defendant's employment.

A school district cannot become a landlord.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding was instituted before a circuit court commissioner to recover possession of the lower floor of a school building, the complaint alleging that the said school district is landlord of said premises, and that said Aloys Batsche is the tenant of said school district, and that said Aloys Batsche holds said premises unlawfully and against the will of said school district, and that said school district is entitled to possession of the same. The building in question is a two-story building; the schoolroom being on the second floor, and the rooms beneath being occupied, in connection with the school room, by the teacher. In 1885, the defendant contracted with the district board to teach school for seven months, and, in pursuance of the contract, took possession of the building the same as any teacher does. He had possession of the keys of the building, and continued to teach the school throughout the term, and remained there afterwards, and has always, from that time until the commencement of this suit, been in possession of the building. Every year the district has contracted with him, and he has continued to teach the school. The school term ended in June, 1893, and August 31, 1892, notice to quit was served. The case turned in the court below upon the question of whether the relation of landlord and tenant existed. The circuit judge, being of the opinion that it did not, directed a verdict, and plaintiff brings error. Numerous questions are discussed in the brief of the complainant's counsel but we think it cannot be fairly said that the circuit judge was called upon to pass upon anything more than the simple question of whether the relation of landlord and tenant existed. Not only was this the question presented by complainant's and defendant's counsel as the sole question in the case, but the complaint upon which this suit was founded was based upon this relationship. This question, however, resolves itself into two branches: First, Was the occupancy in the first instance as a tenant? and, second, Was complainant entitled to treat defendant's subsequent holding as that of a tenant at sufferance?

It is fairly inferable from the statement made by plaintiff's counsel below that the occupation of the premises was incident to, and deemed essential for, the performance of the duties of the defendant as teacher. It was not proposed to show that there was a distinct letting of these premises occupied by defendant, or that any rent was received. It has been held that under such circumstances the occupant's possession is that of the employer, and that the relation of landlord and tenant does not exist. King v. Chesnut, 1 Barn. & Ald. 478; State v. Curtis, 20 N. C. 222; Stock's Case, 2 Leach, 1015; Haywood v. Miller, 8 Hill, 90; Kerrains v. People, 60 N. Y. 221. The case last cited is well reasoned, and, we think, notes the proper distinctions. It states the case of Hughes v. Chatham Overseers, 5 Mann. & G. 54, in which it was said: "There is no inconsistency in the relation of master and servant with that of landlord and tenant. A master may pay his servant by conferring on him an interest in real property, either in fee for years, at will, . . . and if he do so the servant then becomes entitled to the legal incidents of the estate, as much as if it were purchased for any other consideration." But in the main case the court held that, where the occupancy of the house was for the purpose of enabling the servant the better to perform the service, the occupancy was that of the master, and not of the servant. We think that this is the rule in a case where, as in the present, there was no letting in terms, no rent reserved, and where it is clear that the purpose of the occupancy was to enable the employé to perform the service of his employer. The case of Bristor v. Burr, 120 N. Y. 427, 8 L. R. A. 710, cited by counsel, does not overrule Kerrains v. People, but is entirely consistent with it, the court placing its conclusion in that case upon the ground that the relation of master and servant did not exist between the defendants and the plaintiff. But we think that, upon the statement of counsel (upon which the case was decided below), defendant became a tenant at sufferance. That such a relation may grow out of an occupancy by a servant is recognized in Kerrains v. People. In that case it was said, it is true that, in order to have the effect to create a tenancy by sufferance, the occupancy must be sufficiently long to warrant an inference of consent to a different holding, but we are aware of no case which fixes the precise time within which such consent may be inferred. In People v. Annis, 45 Barb. 804, it was held that on the termination of the tenancy the continued occupancy of the servant must be deemed that of a tenant by sufferance. The court says: "The contract for the service having been terminated, and an end put to it, in this way the right of occupancy under it went also, and was ended. The relator, after that, was in possession, not as a trespasser, but as one holding after his right of occupancy had been extinguished; and, of course, he became a tenant at will or sufferance."

It is contended by defendant's counsel that, in order to have a tenancy grow into one by sufferance, it must originally have been created by an agreement for one by the parties, and that, as no agreement for a tenancy ever existed, the relation cannot arise. We do not so understand the law. We think the rule is that a person in possession of land lawfully, who holds over without right, becomes a tenant at sufferance, if the owner suffers him to remain in possession a sufficient length of time to imply an intentional acquiescence in the occupancy, and it is not necessary that the previous holding be that of a tenant. It is stated in defendant's brief that the lapse of time was not sufficient to raise a presumption of consent. But a consent to occupancy is not necessary to create a tenancy by sufferance. It is said in Wood on Landlord and Tenant (sec. 7): "The tenancy is of such a nature as necessarily implies an absence of any agreement between the owner and the tenant, and if express assent is given by the owner to such possession the tenancy is thereby, instantly, converted into a tenancy at will, or from year to year, according to the circumstances." A contract to pay rent is not essential to create the relation of landlord and tenant. Wood, Land. & T. § 1.

It is suggested that, on the showing of plaintiff, the title to land came in question. But we think not. If the possession was received from plaintiff, he is not in position to raise a question of title. If it was not, clearly the relation of landlord and tenant never existed.

Judgment will be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

The other Justices concur.

An order by a consignee to deliver goods to a common carrier, to be shipped to him at a given point, when the directions are complied with, and the goods are delivered to the carrier, passes the title from the consignor to the consignee, and the consignee is the only party that can maintain an action against the carrier for damages to the goods.

Finn v. Western R. Corp. 112 Mass. 524, 17 Am. Rep. 128; Hutchinson, Carr. § 730.

Buchanan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error brought an action on the case, against the defendant in error, for damages for failing, as a common carrier, to deliver at their destination, within a reasonable time, two car loads of vegetables and fruit.

The verdict of the jury and the judgment of the trial court were in favor of the defendant, and to that judgment this writ of error was allowed.

The principal error complained of was the refusal of the court to give instruction No. 5 asked for by the plaintiffs, and the giving of an instruction of its own in lieu thereof. The instruction asked for, and which was refused, was as follows:

"The court further instructs the jury that, when the risk of the safe transportation of the goods is upon the consignor, he will be considered as the owner, for the purpose of maintaining an action against the carrier for their loss or injury.

"Therefore if the jury shall believe from the evidence in this case that the risk of the transportation of the goods and produce set out in the plaintiffs' declaration was upon them [plaintiffs], they are entitled to maintain this action for said loss or injury."

The instruction the court gave in lieu of it is in these words: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs contracted to sell to De Witt & Co. and Bayer & Son certain produce; and if the jury believe that, according to the true intent and meaning of the said contracts between the said plaintiffs and the said De Witt & Co. and Bayer & Son, the plaintiffs sold the said produce to the said De Witt & Co. and Bayer & Son at an agreed price, free on board the defendant's cars at Rural Retreat, and that the plaintiffs did deliver said produce on the defendant's cars at Rural Retreat, and consigned the same to said De Witt & Co. and the said Bayer & Son at Columbus, Ohio, and Charleston, S. C., to be delivered to the said consignees at their destinations by the defendant, and that plaintiffs charged the said De Witt & Co. and Bayer & Son, on the books of the plaintiffs, with the price of said goods so shipped to them,—then the plaintiffs cannot maintain this action, and the jury should find for the defendant."

On the trial of the cause, the defendant does not seem to have controverted its liability for failure to perform its duty in carrying the goods shipped, but relied entirely upon the defense that the plaintiffs had no interest in the goods shipped after they were delivered to the defendant, and therefore had no right of action against it for such failure of duty, or, if they had any right of action at all, it was an action of assumpsit on the contract, and not an action on the case in tort.

The question has been very much discussed in this country whether the shipper or consignor can maintain any action against a common carrier for damages done to goods after they have been received by such carrier for the purpose of carriage, and before they have been delivered to and received by the consignees, when the shipper or consignor had no right of property, general or special, in the goods, and no right or interest in their safe carriage, except that arising from the bill of lading.

One line of cases holds that, since the shipper or consignor has parted with all interest in the property, he cannot be injured by the failure of the common carrier to perform its duty, or to keep its contract, and the consignee or owner alone can maintain the action.

Another line of cases holds that, inasmuch as the contract for shipment was made by the shipper or consignor, he has the right to maintain such action, because the carrier agreed with him to carry the goods safely, and within a reasonable time, and the action is for the breach of that agreement.

This subject was discussed at length, and with great learning and ability, by Chief Justice Shaw, in the case of Blanchard v. Page, 8 Gray, 281. The facts of that case showed that the plaintiffs in the action against the carrier had sold goods to another party, who had paid for them, and they afterwards delivered the goods to the common carrier, to be forwarded for them. When they delivered them to the carrier, they took from it a bill of lading purporting to be a contract with the shippers to carry and deliver the goods to the purchaser. The goods were lost, and an action was brought by the shippers against the carrier for their value, upon the contract in the bill of lading. It was admitted that the shippers had no interest or property in the goods at the time of the shipment, and it was for that reason contended that they could not maintain the action; but the court held, notwithstanding the fact that they had no interest in the goods shipped, that an action could be maintained upon the contract. And this position was sustained by an argument, both upon general principles and upon authority, which, as Mr. Hutchinson says in his work on Carriers, seems unanswerable. In a later case decided by the same court, it was held that, where there was no bill of lading, nor other writing evidencing the contract, an action could be maintained by the consignor, who had no interest in the property shipped, nor an express contract with the carrier. Finn v. Western R. Corp. 113 Mass. 524, 17 Am. Rep. 128.

Mr. Hutchinson, in his work on Carriers, after discussing this question at length, reaches the conclusion that the consignor, who has made a special contract with the carrier, may always maintain an action upon it for the loss of or damage to the goods, regardless of the question of interest or property in them. Nor would it appear to be material whether the freight upon them has been paid by him or another. If not paid, he is the party to whom the carrier may look for its payment, in case the consignee should refuse to accept the goods, or to pay the carrier's charge upon them. And if paid, no matter by whom, the payment would be a sufficient consideration for the contract with the consignor. Section 728.

Angell on Carriers, § 499, says that the rule upon this subject is properly stated by Park, J., in Freeman v. Birch, 1 Nev. & M. 420, in which it was held "that the person employing the carrier must bring the action, but that the circumstance of the legal right, being in one person, may be evidence of employment by that person. Hence it follows that, in order to decide who is the proper party to be made plaintiff in an action of this nature, the first inquiry must be whether any special agreement for the carriage of the goods in question exists. If there is none, it then becomes necessary to ascertain in whom the right of property is vested. In the former case, the remedy for any breach of contract belongs to the party with whom such agreement is made. Therefore, where the consignor agrees with the carrier for the conveyance of the goods, and is to pay him, the action is well brought."

The plaintiffs in this case, according to their evidence, not only made a special contract with the defendant, by which they guaranteed the payment of the freight, but the consignees were not entitled to the possession of the goods until they accepted the drafts attached to the bills of lading. The sales in this case were made by telegram. The Columbus purchasers or consignees, De Witt & Co., wired the plaintiffs for prices, who replied that they would sell them the produce shipped, at a certain price, "f. o. b. the cars [free on board the cars] at Rural Retreat, shipment subject to draft with bill of lading attached." De Witt & Co. then wired the plaintiffs not to send draft, and they would remit. The plaintiffs answered, refusing to ship unless they would agree to their terms. De Witt & Co. then wired them to ship according to their first proposition. The same kind of a contract, it seems, was made with Bayer & Son, the Charleston purchasers or consignees. It is very clear from their contracts that the plaintiffs did not intend to part with all interest in the goods when they delivered them to the defendant for shipment. The evidence shows that when the consignees refused to receive the goods, on the ground that they were damaged, the plaintiffs, upon being notified of the fact, refused to give directions as to the disposition of the goods, on the ground that they had sold them to the consignees, and the goods were shipped at their risk. This action of the plaintiffs could not change the original contract between them and the consignees. The most that can be said of it is that their conduct at that time is inconsistent with their claim now. It is also equally true that the conduct of the defendant at that time was inconsistent with its present claim. Then it treated the plaintiffs as the owners of the goods, and insisted upon paying, and did pay them, the balance of the amount received upon the sales of the goods shipped to Charleston, after paying the freight. Now it insists that the plaintiffs had no interest in the goods shipped after they were delivered to it for shipment. While the conduct of both parties has been inconsistent with their present claims, such conduct cannot affect their legal rights in this case, as neither acted upon the other's conduct to his prejudice.

The evidence shows, or, at least, tends to show, that the consignees had no right to the possession of the goods shipped until they paid the drafts which were attached to the bills of lading. In such a case, Mr. Benjamin says, in section 390 of his work on Sales (2d Am. ed.), "that where a bill of exchange for the price of goods is inclosed to the buyer for acceptance, together with the bill of lading, the buyer cannot retain the bill of lading unless he accepts the bill of exchange; and, if he refuses acceptance, he acquires no right to the bill of lading, or the goods of which it is the symbol."

Mr. Angell says: "Where the direction is not to deliver the goods in case of the existence of certain circumstances, nor until payment should be made by the consignee in cash, the property in the goods continues in the consignor." Section 511.

Hutchinson on Carriers, in discussing this subject, says: "But, after all, the question whether the property in the goods has passed to the consignee by a delivery to the carrier, will depend upon the intention of the transaction, and this may always be shown. And goods may be shipped to the order, and on account of the consignee as purchaser, and yet his right to the possession of them may be incomplete, as where the direction to the carrier is not to deliver the goods until payment of the price or a compliance with some other condition by the consignee. In such cases, of course, the title to the goods remains in the consignor until the conditions upon which delivery is to be made have been complied with." Section 734.

There are cases which hold, where goods are sold and shipped C. O. D. the title passes; but in those cases it is admitted that the seller has a special property in the goods sold. In the case of Pilgreen v. Stais, 71 Ala. 368, which was a case where a liquor dealer received an order requesting him to send whiskey by express, C. O. D., to the party ordering it, it was said: "The general property, however, passed to the buyer by the delivery to the express company at Calera [the place from which the whiskey was shipped]. The risk of loss then passed to him, though there may have remained in the seller a special property, and though the buyer could not, without payment of the price, entitle himself to the absolute property, and to the actual possession. . . . The seller has a lien upon the property for the price, and the right of possession until it is paid."

Whether the contracts in this case vested the title to the goods sold in the consignees, when delivered to the defendant company for shipment, subject to the lien for the purchase price, and the right to the possession until the drafts were accepted, or whether the title did not vest in them until the drafts were accepted, is not material, for, in either case, the plaintiffs had such interest and rights in the property as would entitle them to maintain an action; for it is well settled that where both the consignor and the consignee have an interest in the goods, one having a general and the other a special property, either may sue; but a recovery by one constitutes a bar to an action by the other. Freeman v. Birch, 1 Nev. & M. 420; Mayall v. Boston & M. Railroad, 19 N. H. 123, 40 Am. Dec. 149; 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 902, 903. The plaintiffs having such interest in the goods shipped (if any interest be necessary where they have made a special contract with the carrier for their shipment, and guaranteed the payment of freight) as gives them the right to maintain an action against the defendant, the question arises, Can they maintain an action of tort, or must they bring assumpsit?

That they can maintain an action on the case, as well as an action of assumpsit, we think is well settled.

In the case of Boorman v. Brown, 3 Q. B. 511, Chief Justice Tindal, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "That there is a large class of cases in which the foundation of the action springs out of privity of contract between the parties, but in which, nevertheless, the remedy for the breach, or nonperformance, is indifferently either assumpsit or case upon tort, is not disputed. Such are actions against attorneys, surgeons, and other professional men, for want of competent skill or proper care in the service they undertake to render; actions against common carriers, against ship owners on bills of lading, against bailees of different descriptions, and numerous other instances occur in which the action is brought in tort or contract at the election of the plaintiff." The principle in all these cases would seem to be that the contract creates a duty, and the neglect to perform the duty, or the nonfeasance, is a ground of action upon a tort.

Angell on Carriers, § 422, says, in discussing this question: "But, in respect to the proper form of action at common law against all common carriers, there was for a long time a question, and one much agitated among pleaders; and it was natural that the question should arise out of the innovation upon the common-law duties of carriers. As long as their occupation was considered only as a public duty, the breach was tort, for which they were liable to an action on the case, founded upon the custom of the realm; or, in other words, upon the common law. In time, however, they succeeded in establishing the existence of a contract, and then they at once became liable to an action of assumpsit on their undertaking; and a very long-established, continued, and uniform usage has sanctioned the principle and adopted the advantages of both forms of action; so that the case may be considered either way, as arising ex contractu or ex delicto, according as the neglect of duty, or breach of promise, is intended to be relied on as the cause of injury. The practice of declaring against common carriers on the custom of the realm was as ancient as the law itself, and was uniformly adopted until the case of Dale v. Hall (decided in 1750) [1 Wils. 281], when the practice of declaring in assumpsit succeeded; but for four hundred years before that time the declaration was in tort on the custom."

It is said by Hutchinson on Carriers "that, since this recognition [in the case of Dale v. Hall] of the right of the bailor of the goods to sue upon his contract with the carrier, the two forms of action, the one in assumpsit for breach of contract, and the other in tort for the breach of duty, have been adopted indifferently, or as best suited the purposes of the pleader." Sections 788-740; 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 908; 8 Rob. Pr. (New) 437-441.

This court, in the case of Southern Exp. Co. v. McVeigh, reported in 20 Gratt. 264, 284, held that where there is a public employment, from which arises a common-law duty, an action may be brought in tort, although the breach of duty assigned is the doing or not doing of something contrary to an agreement made, in the course of such employment, by the party upon whom such general duty is imposed. In that case, as in this, there was a special agreement, and this court held that the plaintiff had the right to bring, as he did, an action of tort. In Ferrill v. Brewis, 25 Gratt. 765, 768, Judge Staples said: "There is a class of cases [among them that of bailment] in which the foundation of the action springs out of the privity of contract between the parties, but in which, nevertheless, the remedy for the breach or non-performance is indifferently in assumpsit or in case upon tort."

The plaintiffs made the contract with defendant for the shipment of the goods, and guaranteed the payment of the freight. They are therefore parties to the contract, and had an interest in the safe delivery of the goods; and it is not for the defendant, who made the contract with them, to say, upon a breach of that contract, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover damages which are the direct and natural consequence of such breach of contract. Blanchard v. Page, 8 Gray, 281, 301.

Even if the defendant had not required the plaintiffs to guarantee the payment of the freight, we do not think its right to recover the same, if it had performed its duty, and the proceeds of the goods shipped were insufficient to pay its freight, could be made to depend upon what may prove to be the legal effect of the dealings between the consignors and consignees upon the title to the property which was the subject of transportation. It had the right to look for its compensation to the plaintiffs, who required it to perform the service by delivering the goods to it for transportation. And the plaintiffs, unless they were the mere agents of the consignees, have the right to enforce the contract made with the defendant, and to sue for its breach; and their right to do so cannot be made to depend upon the question whether or not the title to the goods shipped passed by their dealings with the consignees. There can be but one recovery against the defendant for its breach of contract, or its failure to perform its duty, whether the action be brought by the plaintiffs, with whom the contract was made, or by the consignees, if they were the owners of the goods. Finn v. Western R. Corp. 112 Mass. 524, 533, 534, 17 Am. Rep. 128.

The consignees in this case, if they had the right to do so, have brought no action, and there is not only no suggestion that they have ever made any objection to the plaintiffs' maintaining this action, but they, or members of their firms, are introduced as witnesses by the plaintiffs in proving their case.

We think that an action on the case in tort may be brought against the carrier, by the party who makes the special contract with it, for its breach of the contract, unless there be in the contract some undertaking by the carrier which it would not be its duty to perform under the common law. In such case damages for a breach of such additional undertaking could, perhaps, only be recovered in an action ex contractu.

The plaintiffs, we think, had the right to maintain this action against the defendant, if they proved either that they had made a special contract with it for the transportation of the goods, or that they had any interest or property in the goods, either general or special, and that the defendant had committed a breach of its contract, or failed in the performance of its duty; and that the jury should have been so instructed.

It follows from what has been said that the circuit court erred in the instruction complained of; and for such error its judgment must be reversed, and a new trial awarded, to be had in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

Evidence that a grantor of a part of a tract of land told the grantee that a well nearly on the boundary line, but on the land not conveyed, "belonged to" and "would be sold" with the land conveyed, is inadmissible to show the legal effect of the deed as against a subsequent purchaser of the remaining land.

4. A grantee of a part of a tract of land, who is told by the grantor that a well on the boundary line partially on the land unconveyed will go with the part sold, is not entitled to an injunction against covering such well with a building, where he has never used it since his purchase, and it has been covered with a flagstone all that time, and pipes connecting it with his buildings are entirely on his land.

The adjudications in this country may be said to have occurred in three periods of eras.

The first period contains the cases of Story v. Odin, 12 Mass. 157 (1816) and United States v. Appleton, 1 Sumn. 492 (1838). Both these cases strictly followed the English rule.

A few years later several cases involving this question were decided apparently contrary to the English rule.

Myers v. Gemmel, 10 Barb. 537, and Palmer v. Wetmore, 2 Sandf. 816, and some others in New York, which were overruled by Lampman v. Milles, 21 N. Y. 512, and Mullen v. Stricker, 19 Ohio St. 185, 2 Am. Rep. 879, which have been overruled by Rennyson's App. 94 Pa. 152 (1880). Mullen v. Stricker was practically overruled by National Bkch. Bank v. Cunningham, 46 Ohio St. 587.

This line of authority culminates in the case of Keats v. Hugo, 115 Mass. 204, 15 Am. Rep. 80.

The later decisions show that the English rule, with slight modifications, has now been established as the only fair and equitable rule in this country.

Fenn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the complaint of the plaintiff, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendant from doing certain acts on the defendant's own land, adjacent to land of the plaintiff, the court of common pleas for New Haven county found the following facts:

On September 21, 1883, one William Waite was, and for a long time had been, the owner in fee of certain premises on the northerly side of Bradley street in the city of New Haven, 61 feet front on said street, and 98 feet deep. A dwelling house stood on the westerly part of said lot. On said day said William Waite, through a third person, conveyed to his wife, Elizabeth, the westerly part of said lot, 40 feet front, on which said dwelling house stood. On August 23, 1888, the said 40-foot lot was, by warranty deed, 29 L. R. A.

conveyed to the plaintiff by an agent of Mr. and Mrs. Waite, to whom it had been previously conveyed for that purpose. On October 6, 1888, William Waite quitclaimed his right, title, and interest in the remaining 21 feet of the original lot to the defendant. On the boundary line between the premises of the plaintiff and the defendant there stands a maple tree of about forty years' growth, about 16 inches in diameter, and with a branch extension of from 40 to 50 feet. This tree is a valuable one to the plaintiff as a shade tree and ornament, and shades a part of the plaintiff's premises. The boundary line runs substantially through the middle of the trunk of said tree. At the time that said William Waite erected said dwelling house,—which was more than twenty years previous to the plaintiff's purchase,—he dug and connected with said dwelling house, by pipes, a well, and used said well of water as appurtenant to said house during the period of his ownership, up to and within a short time previous to said purchase. For some five years previous to the plaintiff's purchase, and up to the time when said Waite ceased to use said well, such use was by means of a curb and bucket. The plaintiff has never used said well, which has been covered up ever since he has owned the premises. The defendant does not intend to destroy the well. At the time of the plaintiff's purchase the well was connected with the house by means of pipes, and there was a concrete walk leading from the house to the well, across said boundary line, and continuing into that part of the premises owned by the defendant, along the extent of the flagstone that crowns the well. This stone, which is about 5½ feet in length, extends some 3½ feet upon the defendant's land. The well is 2½ feet in diameter, and adjoins the line, but is practically all of it upon the land of the defendant. On the trial the plaintiff and said William Waite both testified that a few days previous to the plaintiff's purchase, and while negotiations were pending, said Waite told the plaintiff that said well went with the house, and would be sold to him: and this statement was a substantial inducement to the plaintiff in making said purchase. To the admission of this evidence the defendant objected, but the court overruled the objection, and admitted the evidence, the defendant duly excepting, and the court found the facts to be as testified. The plaintiff's principal sitting room and the room over it, the dressing room, are on the east side of the house, and derive their light solely from a bay window, having its windows on the easterly, northeasterly, and southeasterly sides thereof. Said rooms are so inclosed on all sides by other parts of the structure that no other means of light than from the east side is possible, without a substantial reconstruction of that part of the building. The east face of said bay window is between 5 and 6 feet beyond the line of the side wall of the house from which such window projects, and is 5 feet from said boundary line. The stairway and hall of the dwelling house is lighted by a stained-glass window in the easterly side of the house.

and has also a glass in the south door. The defendant threatens and intends to build, and has made a contract for the building of, a dwelling house to extend down along the boundary line for a distance of 58 feet from a point about 6 feet from said Bradley street, the wall of which is to be about 20 feet high, and threatens to remove so much of the tree as is on his side of said boundary line. The construction of a dwelling house on the line, as the defendant intends to construct it, would cover the well, and that portion of the premises on his side of the line on which said tree stands; and the removal of that portion of the tree which the defendant threatens to remove would destroy the life of the whole tree. Such construction would also deprive the plaintiff of the supply of light which has come across said 21 feet now owned by the defendant, and would make it necessary for the plaintiff to light his sitting room and dressing room with gas, or some other light, in the daytime, in order to obtain sufficient light for the reasonable use of the rooms. At the time of purchase by the plaintiff, and at the time of the purchase by the defendant, there was no fence or other visible sign of demarcation marking said boundary line. And said original tract of land owned by William Waite was, at the time of the erection of said dwelling house thereon, and ever afterwards until the execution of the deeds above mentioned, an undivided tract of land. The defendant, previous to his purchase, had lived within 100 feet of the premises, and was fully acquainted with the same. Upon these facts the court, overruling the claims of the defendant, rendered judgment for the plaintiff, enjoining and restraining the defendant "from such interference with the tree mentioned in the complaint as will destroy or injure the same, and such interference with the well mentioned in the complaint as will deprive the plaintiff of the use of the same; also from erecting any building upon the premises described as the property of the defendant, so near as to exclude the light from the plaintiff's dwelling house." The defendant's appeal assigns eleven reasons, some of which are not important. Taken as a whole, however, they present, in substance, four alleged grounds of error which we deem it necessary to consider. First, in restraining the defendant from interference with the tree; second, with the well, including the admission of evidence; third, from excluding the light; fourth, that the judgment rendered is uncertain. We will examine each of these, and in the order above indicated.

First, in reference to the tree. Upon the subject of the rights of the parties in a tree situated as this is, it is said in 1 Washburn on Real Property, § 7a: "The law as to growing trees may be regarded so far peculiar as to call for a more extended statement of its rules as laid down by different courts.

In the first place, trees which stand wholly within the boundary line of one's land belong to him, although their roots and branches may extend into the adjacent owner's land.

But the adjacent owner may lop off the branches or roots of such trees up to the line of his land. If the tree stand so nearly upon the dividing line between the lands that portions of its body extend into each, the same is the property in common of the land owners. And neither of them is at liberty to cut the tree without the consent of the other, nor to cut away the part which extends into his land, if he thereby injures the common property in the tree." This is the doctrine of our own court in Lyman v. Hale, 11 Conn. 177, 27 Am. Dec. 728, cited by Washburn. See also, 26 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 558. We may therefore limit our investigation to the inquiry as to the logical application of the principles of that case to the present one. In that case the tree stood upon the plaintiff's land, but its branches extended some distance across the line, and some of its roots ran into the defendant's ground. The action was trespass quare clausum fregit for entering upon the plaintiff's land and picking up pears, the fruit of the tree. The defendant claimed to be either tenant in common or joint owner with the plaintiff, or exclusive owner of the pears gathered, which fell on his own land from overhanging branches. The claim of joint ownership urged rested on the fact that the roots extended into the defendant's ground, and that the tree derived a part of its nourishment from his soil. In reviewing and disapproving the authorities cited in support of such claim, this court said: "Is it the doctrine of these cases that whenever a tree growing upon the land of one man, whatever may be its distance from the line, extends any portion of its roots into the land of another, they therefore become tenants in common of the tree? We think not; and, if it were, we cannot assent to it. Because, in the first place, there would be insurmountable difficulties in reducing the principle to practice; and, in the next place, we think the weight of authorities is clearly the other way. How, it may be asked, is the principle to be reduced to practice? And here it should be remembered that nothing depends upon the question whether the branches do or do not overhang the lands of the adjoining proprietor. All is made to depend solely upon the inquiry whether any portion of the roots extend into his land. It is this fact alone which creates the tenancy in common. And how is the fact to be ascertained? Again, if such tenancy in common exist, it is diffused over the whole tree. Each owns a certain proportion of the whole. In what proportions do the respective parties hold? And how are these proportions to be determined? How is it to be ascertained what part of its nourishment the tree derives from the soil of the adjoining proprietor? If one joint owner appropriates all the products, on what principle is the account to be settled between the parties? Again, suppose the line between adjoining proprietors to run through a forest or grove. Is a new rule of property to be introduced in regard to those trees growing so near the line as to extend some portions of their roots across it? How is a man to know whether he is the exclusive owner of trees growing, indeed, on his own land, but near the line; and whether he can safely cut them without subjecting himself to an action? And again, on the principle claimed, a man may be the exclusive owner of a tree one year, and the next a tenant in common with another; and the proportion in which he owns may be varying from year to year, as the tree progresses in its growth. It is not seen how these consequences are to be obviated, if the principle contended for be once admitted. We think they are such as to furnish the most conclusive objections against the adoption of the principle." We have quoted so much at length because it must be obvious that by far the greater part of this most cogent reasoning applies with equal force against the doctrine of a tenancy in common of a tree standing upon the dividing line between two properties, and extending its body no matter in what proportion, into each. It is true, the opinion appears to concede that in such a case the tenancy would exist, and such is the familiar statement of the treatises and opinions. The expression is probably well enough and sufficiently accurate for practical purposes, but it is not entirely correct, as appears to us to be clearly shown in an article in the Albany Law Journal (vol. 10, p. 236), which points out that where a tree stands partly on the lands of each of two adjoining proprietors, the possession of each must be always confined to that portion of the tree which is on his side of the boundary line, in view of the greater dignity and permanence of real-estate tenure, as compared with the temporary and changing nature of growing timber.

In addition to what we have said, it must be apparent that the very nature of things differentiates such a so-called common interest from an ordinary tenancy in common, either of real or of personal property. In the case of a tree like the one in question, yielding no fruit, of trifling value for wood, if cut, of no value while standing, except for ornament or shade, what relief by any remedy, legal or equitable, provided for ordinary tenants in common, can a part owner of such tree, to whom its continued existence is of no advantage but an injury, obtain? Can he call upon the other part owner to account for the benefit which he has derived from such ornament or shade? Could he, in this state, procure a partition of the growing tree as real estate, under Gen. Stat., § 1304? And if he did, would not the lines of his own and the adjacent land divide the tree as they did before, leaving the rights of the parties identical in effect with what they were before? Could he obtain a sale of the tree under section 1807, either as real estate or personal property, that would carry the right to have it destroyed or removed? If it be conceded, as it must be, that he could do none of these, it will be evident, we think, that the tenancy in common in a tree is of a peculiar nature, if there be such a tenancy at all. It would really seem to come to this: that each of the land owners upon whose land any part of a trunk of a tree stands has an interest in that tree, a property in it, equal, in the first instance, to, or perhaps rather identical with, the part which is upon his land; and, in the next place, embracing the right to demand that the owner of the other portion shall so use his part as not unreasonably to injure or destroy the whole. There may, it is true, be a difficulty in applying such a principle as this, and such difficulty appears to exist in the present case. It might perhaps fairly be urged that to prevent the defendant from removing that portion of the trunk of the tree upon his own land—thereby depriving him of the opportunity to build upon it as desired—would be likely to produce a greater irreparable injury to the defendant than such removal and the consequent destruction of the life of the tree would cause the plaintiff, and that, therefore, the equitable remedy of injunction (which is not adapted finally to adjust the rights of the parties) should have been refused, and the contestants left to settle such rights in methods pertaining to the legal, and not the chancery, jurisdiction. We are inclined to think such elements of discretion enter into this matter that we ought not to disturb the conclusion of the trial court upon it. But we think the law is already well settled in this state, as well as elsewhere, and, as before stated, that where the branches of a tree extend over an adjacent owner's land, he may lop them off up to the line, even though that were practically to the trunk of the tree. In this case a portion of the trunk is on the defendant's land, and the branch extension of 40 to 50 feet, as found, presumably reaches across it. That he should have less right to lop these branches because he owns a portion of the tree than if he owned none of it, appears to us to be unreasonable. The injunction should not extend further than to restrain the defendant from cutting any portion of the trunk and any further cutting of the branches or of the roots than he might lawfully have done had the trunk stood wholly upon the plaintiff's land, but reaching to the defendant's line. If in fact the trunk divides itself, as the tree extends upwards, into two or more parts, of similar size, with more of a perpendicular than horizontal extension, each of those parts should be regarded as a portion of the trunk.

In respect to the well, there was, we think, error in the action of the court, both in reference to the admission of evidence and in granting the injunction, whether the latter action be or be not regarded as influenced by such evidence. Concerning the testimony, the plaintiff seeks to justify its reception as being a declaration of the actual vendor at the time of the sale, and cites Norton v. Pettibone, 7 Conn. 823, 18 Am. Dec. 116; Deming v. Carrington, 12 Conn. 5, 30 Am. Dec. 591; Smith v. Martin, 17 Conn. 400; Ramsbottom v. Phelps, 18 Conn. 285. None of these cases, however, support his contention. For, waiving the point that the title to the premises now owned by the plaintiff was not at the time of such conversation in the declarant, William Waite, it is evident that the statement to the plaintiff "that the well went with the house, and would be sold to him," was not in its nature a declaration adverse to the declarant's title. It was not an assertion as to his title at all. There was no question then, nor is there now, that the declarant then had title to the land now belonging to the defendant on which the well is situated. It was therefore simply a statement of what interest or easement in land not to be conveyed "belonged to" and "would be sold" with the land to be conveyed. Whether, by the legal effect of the deed to the plaintiff, the well, or any right in it, was conveyed to him as an appurtenance or otherwise, is an inquiry to which the evidence under consideration is not relevant. If not so conveyed, whether the plaintiff has, or ever had before waiting so long, a cause of action for the reformation of the instrument, so as to include the well as a part of the grant, is another and distinct question. In this case, however, to which William Waite is not a party, in which no claim for reformation is made, but only the title of the plaintiff as derived from the deed as it stands is counted upon, such inquiry cannot be entered into. Nor would any conceivable answer to it affect the decision of the point as to the admission, in this case, of the evidence now under consideration. There is no claim that the defendant had any notice of this conversation, and its use to impair the title of a bona fide purchaser, for full consideration, without notice, actual or constructive, of an adjoining piece of land, is clearly improper. The fact that the defendant derived his title from a quitclaim deed is entirely immaterial. "In this state a quitclaim deed is a primary conveyance, vesting in the releasee all the interest, even in fee, which the releasor has so conveyed. As a conveyance, it is of as much force as a warranty deed, differing from it chiefly in the superadded covenants, which may operate by way of estoppel upon a future-acquired interest, or may secure the covenant against a bad or defective title." Sherwood v. Barlow, 19 Conn. 476. It might even be said that there is more reason why a releasee in a quitclaim deed should be protected from the operation of secret, unrecorded incumbrances on the property, where he purchased in good faith, and for full consideration, than such a purchaser whose title comes to him accompanied with covenants for his protection. But, further, in reference to the injunction, there was error. The plaintiff claims the record shows that the well, at the time of his purchase, was appurtenant to the dwelling house, and necessary thereto. We do not so understand the finding. At the time the dwelling was erected the well was dug, and connected with it by pipes. It was used as appurtenant to the house, either by pipes or by curb and bucket, up to and within a short time previous to the plaintiff's purchase. It was not so used at the time of the purchase. For the last five years of its actual use the curb and bucket had been employed. At the time of the purchase that also had been abandoned, and the well was covered by a flagstone. The pipes at that time connected the well with the house. Whether they do so still is not found. The plaintiff has never used the well. The defendant does not intend to destroy it, but the construction of his dwelling house would cover it. Why should he not so cover it, if he desired? It had already been covered when he bought, and it so remains. It is not found that the well has ever been, or ever is likely to be, necessary, or even useful, to the plaintiff. If it ever has been, why has he never used it? If he objects to its being covered, why did he receive his deed while it was in that condition? Why has he suffered it to remain so ever since? But he wishes, or he may, perhaps, wish hereafter, to revive the use of the pipe. It is entirely upon his own land, and reaches a well which the defendant has no intention to destroy. How, so far as the record discloses, will the proposed act of the defendant affect him in such use?

We come now to the question most extensively considered on both sides in the argument,—that in relation to light. The great practical importance of the subject presented will be our justification for a somewhat extended examination. By the common law, in England, the right to light and air over the land of another could be claimed in certain cases by prescription, and in certain others by implication, or what was called "implied grant." If the common law, as to the prescription, ever existed in Connecticut, it does so no longer. Gen. Stat. § 2970. But the plaintiff claims that the law as to implied grants of light and air does exist, and should be recognized in this state. That doctrine the plaintiff states as follows: "When a person, having erected a building upon a part of his land, and having placed therein windows opening upon the other part of his land, sells the building, with the land on which it stands, the right to the continual use and enjoyment of light and air through these windows passes to the grantee by implication." This asserted rule is a particular instance of the application of the doctrine of the creation of easements of various kinds,—the principal of which are perhaps ways and rights of passage by implication,—which doctrine is said to rest upon the application of the maxims: "A grantor cannot be allowed to derogate from his own grant," and "A grantor is presumed to convey, so far as it is in his possession, whatever is necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the thing conveyed." Again, it is said to be based upon the supposed intention of the parties, as deduced from the surrounding circumstances; the essential element of which is the situation, relation, and condition of the granted and retained portions of the land. If we assume this doctrine, generally speaking, to be correct, the inquiry arises as to its proper limitations; and to what would be such in any given case, provided the question of its application arose between the grantee and his grantor, who still retained the other portion of the land, there must be added an additional consideration, provided, as in the present instance, such original grantor does not so retain, but has afterwards parted with, such remaining portion to another person, who is a bona fide purchaser for value. The policy upon which our registration laws as to conveyances of real estate is based, would seem to make it essential that, in order to claim such easement against such purchaser, it must be of a character so evidently necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the granted premises, so continuous in its nature, so plain, visible, and open, so manifest from the situation and relation of the two tracts, as to fairly and clearly indicate to a prospective purchaser of the reserved portion the intention of the parties to the previous sale that it should remain, and to make such purchaser chargeable with knowledge that the law, based on justice, that equity, founded on good conscience, would forbid him, in case of his purchase, so to occupy the lot as to interfere with such easement.

The general doctrine of easements by implied grants, and the ground upon which it is based, are well stated by this court in Celins v. Prentice, 15 Conn. 39, 43, 38 Am. Dec. 61, in reference to private ways. In speaking of such ways, the court, by Waite, J., said: "It is well settled, as a part of the common law of England, that, if a man having a close, to which he has no access, except over his other lands, sell that close, the grantee shall have a way to it, as incident to the grant. . . . And although doubts have formerly been expressed upon the subject, it seems now to be as well settled that, if the grantor had reserved that close to himself, and sold his other lands, a right of way would have been reserved.

. . . The way, in the one case, in contemplation of law, is granted by the deed; and in the other case, reserved. And although it is called a way of necessity, yet in strictness, the necessity does not create the way, but merely furnishes evidence as to the real intention of the parties. For the law will not presume that it was the intention of the parties that one should convey land to the other in such manner that the grantee could derive no benefit from the conveyance, nor that he should so convey a portion as to deprive himself of the enjoyment of the remainder. The law, under such circumstances, will give effect to the grant according to the presumed intent of the parties. A way of this kind is limited by the necessity which creates it." These principles in reference to private ways—especially the limitation of such easements to cases of actual existing necessity—are further stated in Pierce v. Selleck, 18 Conn. 321; Seely v. Bishop, 19 Conn. 128; Woodworth v. Raymond, 51 Conn. 70. In Massachusetts, in reference to such ways, it was said in Buss v. Dyer, 125 Mass. 291: "It is a well-established and familiar rule that deeds are to be construed as meaning what the language employed in them imports, and that extrinsic evidence may not be adduced to contradict or affect them. And it would seem that nothing could be clearer in its meaning than a deed of a lot of land, described by metes and bounds, with covenants of warranty against incumbrances. The great exception to the application of this rule to the construction of deeds is in the case of ways of necessity, where, by a fiction of law, there is an implied reservation or grant to meet a special emergency, on grounds of public policy, as it has been said, in order that no land should be left inaccessible for purposes of cultivation. This Action has been extended to cases of easements of a different character, where the fact has been established that the easement was necessary to the enjoyment of the estate in favor of which it was claimed. In this commonwealth, grants by implication are limited to cases of strict necessity." Coming now directly to the subject of the application of this doctrine or "fiction" to light and air, it was said by Gould, J., in Ingraham v. Hutchinson, 2 Conn. 598, in speaking of what are called "ancient lights:" "Besides, to what extent does this privilege or protection go, where it actually exists? Does the adjoining proprietor lose all right to erect a building upon his own land, whenever it would, in the least degree, diminish the light of a privileged window? Is he precluded from building at the distance of three rods, or one rod, or even at a less distance, from his neighbor's windows? I am not aware that the rule was ever claimed to extend so far. It goes no further, as I understand it, than to protect windows, which have been long used, from being obstructed, or, as it is often expressed in the books, 'stopped up.'" But the plaintiff claims that a much broader extension of the rule, in case of an implied grant, was distinctly recognized in this state in Bushnell v. Proprietors of Ore Bed, 31 Conn. 150, a case upon which the plaintiff much relied. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff had formerly conveyed to the defendant, an ore-bed company, the right, in washing their ore upon a small stream that ran through his land, to discharge dirt upon his "meadow lot," lying below upon the stream. A great quantity of dirt accumulated on the meadow lot, filling the bed of the stream, and raising the lot above the adjoining land, so that the dirt washed upon the lot, spread, and was carried upon the plaintiff's pasture lot adjoining. The plaintiff had owned this lot at the time the deed was given. In holding that the defendant was not liable for any damage to the pasture lot resulting naturally from the discharge of dirt upon the meadow lot, this court (Dutton, J.) said: "A grantor is presumed to intend to convey, so far as it is in his possession, whatever is necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the thing conveyed. It is well-settled law that if the owner of a lot conveys it to another person while there is upon it a dwelling house with windows opening upon another lot of the grantor, neither he nor his heirs nor assigns can erect a building upon the second lot so near as to exclude the light from the dwelling house." Now, it is evident, as the opinion itself states (page 157), that the question for discussion in Bushnell v. Proprietors of Ore Bed was, What rights were in fact conveyed by the deed? This was a question solely of interpretation, in which the principles of the doctrine of implied grants, which do not, and have never been claimed to, rest upon interpretation of language used, were in no sense involved. The entire discussion of the doctrine, as well as the illustration cited, was, therefore, wholly obiter. Nevertheless, both the principle and the illustration, although vouching as authority two cases, both of which have been distinctly overruled in almost every American jurisdiction where the question has since arisen, may, we think, fairly be adopted as a correct statement of the law, provided proper care is exercised in construing the terms used, bearing in mind that the presumption against the grantor that it was not his intention "to convey land in such manner that the grantees could derive no benefit from the conveyance" must be fairly weighed and applied with due regard to the counter presumption that it could not have been his intention "to so convey a portion as to deprive himself of the enjoyment of the remainder." From this consideration—manifestly just where the effort is to extend by pure implication the language used, and to thus supply what might so easily have been procured to be expressed, if it were intended—it will follow that the word "necessity" and the term "reasonable enjoyment" can have no fixed arbitrary and unyielding meaning, but must find their explanation in view of the situation of the parties, of the nature, character, and adaptability of the property, and in the light of surrounding circumstances. They should also receive a strict construction, for the reason that such implied easement is an impairment of "the exclusive dominion of every man over his own soil and freehold, now held sacred by our constitution and laws." Pierce v. Selleck, 18 Conn. 330. It may be true, as stated in Bushnell v. Proprietors of Ore Bed, and the true ground of that decision, that the construction of a deed, if it is doubtful, must be taken most strongly against the grantor." But in the case before us there is no question concerning the construction of language used, no claim that this is doubtful, but the imputation of language never used; and surely caution and moderation should be exercised in that.

It further must follow, we think, as a corollary from what has already been said, that the doctrine of easements by implied grant—a doubtful exercise of power by the courts in all cases—should, when applied to easements of light, be most cautiously used; and, briefly stated, that in the above quotation the words "exclude the light" should not be regarded as equivalent to "exclude any light;" in other words, that "exclude" is not to be held synonymous with "impair." To borrow the emphatic language of Dillon, Ch. J., in Morrison v. Marquardt, 24 Iowa, 64, 92 Am. Dec. 444: "Surely such an easement, uncertain in its extent and duration, without any written or record evidence of its existence fettering estates, and laying an embargo upon the hand of improvement which carries the trowel and the plane, and, as applied to a subsequent purchaser, against the spirit of our recording acts, and not demanded by any consideration of public policy,—surely such an easement should not be held to exist by mere implication, when such implication originates in no reasonable necessity." A careful examination of the cases in the United States upon the subject, both those cited in the very able and exhaustive brief in behalf of the plaintiff and others, justifies the statement that in what we have said we have been in harmony with the views held in the principal American jurisdictions. Wherever the doctrine of easements by implied grants of light and air has been recognized at all, it has been carefully restricted; and no well-considered case in this country, at least in recent years, can be found that has gone to the extent, in the application of such doctrine to the facts, to which it would be necessary to go in the present case in order to justify the judgment of the court below.

In Keats v. Hugo, 115 Mass. 204, 15 Am. Rep. 80, which is a well-considered, and may be regarded as a leading, case, three actions were tried together. In the principal one the defendants conveyed to the plaintiff, by warranty deed in the usual form, a certain lot of land with a dwelling house thereon, situated on the line between the parties, created by said conveyance; the lot so conveyed being a part of a larger lot then, and the remainder of which was at the date of the action, owned by the defendants. The dwelling house had windows and a door in that part of the house adjoining the line. After said conveyance, the defendants placed a structure and woodshed on their own land, against said house, within about 8 inches of the same. The question was "Whether a person, who sells a house having windows overlooking land retained by him, thereby deprives himself of the right to build on that land so as to obstruct the passage of light and air to the windows." The court (Gray, Ch. J.), in the opinion, said: "The question being of great practical importance to owners of real estate, and having heretofore been the subject of some variety and conflict of judicial opinion, we have thought this a suitable occasion to review the cases in this commonwealth, and to refer to the principal ones in other states." The court then proceeds to do this in an exhaustive manner, and concludes by saying: "By nature, air and light do not flow in definite channels, but are universally diffused. The supposed necessity for their passage in a particular line or direction to any lot of land is created, not by the relative situation of that lot to the surrounding lands, but by the manner in which that lot has been built upon. The actual enjoyment of the air and light by the owner of the house is upon his own land only. He makes no tangible or visible use of the adjoining lands, nor, indeed, any use of them which can be made the subject of an action by their owner, or which in any way interferes with the latter's enjoyment of the light and air upon his own lands, or with any use of those lands in their existing condition. In short, the owner of adjoining lands has submitted to nothing which actually encroached upon his rights, and cannot therefore be presumed to have assented to any such encroachment. The use and enjoyment of the adjoining lands are certainly no more subordinate to those of the house where both are owned by one man, than where the owners are different. The reasons upon which it has been held that no grant of a right to air and light can be implied from any length of continuous enjoyment, are equally strong against implying a grant of such a right from the mere conveyance of a house with windows overlooking the land of the grantor. To imply the grant of such a right in either case, without express words, would greatly embarrass the improvement of estates, and, by reason of the very indefinite character of the right asserted, promote litigation. The simplest rule, and that best suited to a country like ours, in which changes are continually taking place in the ownership and the use of lands, is that no right of this character can be acquired without express grant of an interest in, or covenant relating to, the lands over which the right is claimed. In accordance with these views, the English doctrine of implied grants of rights of light and air has been wholly rejected in several well-considered cases. Palmer v. Wetmore, 2 Sandf. 816; Myers v. Gemmel, 10 Barb. 587; Haverstick v. Sipe, 33 Pa. 368; Mullen v. Stricker, 19 Ohio St. 185, 2 Am. Rep. 879; Morrison v. Marquardt, 24 Iowa, 85, 92 Am. Dec. 444. And with the single exception of Janes v. Jenkins, 34 Md. 1, 6 Am. Rep. 800, all the opinions of American judges, with which the learning and research of counsel have supplied us, in favor of the acquirement of such a right by mere implication from the conveyance of a house, have been either, as in Lampman v. Milks, 21 N. Y. 505, 512, obiter dicta, or, as in Robeson v. Pittenger, 2 N. J. Eq. 57, 32 Am. Dec. 412, in those states in which a like right is held to exist by prescription, and therefore of no weight as authority in this commonwealth. Considering, therefore, that by the preponderance of reason and of authority no grant of any right of light or air over adjoining lands is to be implied from the conveyance of a house, we have only to apply this rule to the facts of the cases pending before us." Judgment was ordered for the defendants.

The case of Keats v. Hugo has been quoted with approval, and recognized as authority in other states. Doyle v. Lord, 64 N. Y. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 629, was a case where the facts were that the plaintiffs leased the first floor of a building in the city of New York for a store. In the rear was a yard attached to and exclusively appropriated for the use of the building, to which all the occupants had access through a hall running from the front to the rear of the building, and, as the building was occupied when the plaintiff leased, no tenant could dispense with it. The rear of the store received light necessary for the transaction of business therein from windows opening into the yard. In holding that the lessor could, upon the facts found, be restrained from building in the yard so as to obstruct the light, the court (Earle, J.) said: "This conclusion is reached without any departure from what may be called the American doctrine as to light and air, as distinguished from the English common-law doctrine, and the law as laid down in the following authorities is fully recognized: Parker v. Foots, 19 Wend. 815; Palmer v. Wetmore, 2 Sandf. 816; Myers v. Gemmel, 10 Barb. 587; Mullen v. Stricker, 19 Ohio St. 185, 2 Am. Rep. 879; Haverstick v. Sipe, 33 Pa. 368; Keats v. Hugo, 115 Mass. 304, 15 Am. Rep. 80. . . . Under these authorities, if the lessor had sold the store and lot upon which it stood 25 feet by 51, the grantee would have taken no right to light and air from the balance of the lot. In that case the grantor could have built upon the balance of the lot, and thus have darkened the windows in the store without violating any rights of the grantee. In this case, if the yard had not been part of the lot upon which the building was standing, and if it had not been appropriated to use with the building so as to pass as appurtenant thereto, so far as to give easements therein to the tenants of the building, the plaintiffs could not have complained of the acts of the defendants alleged in the complaint."

Pa. 368; Keats v. Hugo, 115 Mass. 304, 15 Am. Rep. 80. . . . Under these authorities, if the lessor had sold the store and lot upon which it stood 25 feet by 51, the grantee would have taken no right to light and air from the balance of the lot. In that case the grantor could have built upon the balance of the lot, and thus have darkened the windows in the store without violating any rights of the grantee. In this case, if the yard had not been part of the lot upon which the building was standing, and if it had not been appropriated to use with the building so as to pass as appurtenant thereto, so far as to give easements therein to the tenants of the building, the plaintiffs could not have complained of the acts of the defendants alleged in the complaint."

In Turner v. Thompson, 58 Ga. 268, 24 Am. Rep. 497, an executrix sold a half lot of land, with a tenement thereon, opening upon the other half lot; and bought the other half herself at the same sale. It was held that she "will be estopped from obstructing the passage of light and air through such windows, if those windows were necessary to the admission of sufficient light and air for the reasonable enjoyment of the tenement which she sold; aliter, if sufficient light and air could be derived from other windows opened, or which might conveniently be opened, elsewhere in the tenement, to make the rooms reasonably useful and enjoyable." The court (Jackson, J.) cites with approval Keats v. Hugo, supra, adding: "The principle applied by the supreme court of West Virginia, in a recent case there, seems to us sound and sensible, and we shall adopt it in this case. . . . That principle is, that 'an implied grant of an easement of light will be sustained only in cases of real necessity, and will be denied or rejected in cases when it appears that the owner claiming the easement can, at a reasonable cost, have, or substitute, other lights to his building.'" The court adds: "We apply this principle the more readily because it appears to be the conclusion of Washburn (Easem. p. 618), drawn from a consideration of all the English and American authorities, and because, as before stated, it strikes us as reasonable and right. . . . So Tyler approves the same principle, Tyler, Boundaries, 550; and Judge Story is authority to the same point. United States v. Appleton, 1 Sumn. 492-502, Fed. Cas. No. 14,463." In this case the injunction granted was dissolved, because the "decree, as it stands, might be held to enjoin her from building, if these lights were at all impaired; and we think such action ought not to be had except in case of necessity as before explained."

In Rennyson's App., 94 Pa. 147, 153, both Keats v. Hugo and Turner v. Thompson are cited and approved, the opinion saying of the latter: "It is worthy of remark, however, that this case limits the general application of Keats v. Hugo as between dominant and servient tenement in one important respect. I think the limitation is wise and right. It is that an implied easement of light and air will be sustained in case of real necessity." The opinion then proceeds to lay down the following rules: "(1) No implication of a grant of the right to light and air arises upon a sale of one of two adjacent lots having a house upon it, with windows overlooking the land of the grantor. (2) The grantor, by such sale, is not estopped from improving his retained lot by building upon it, though his erection darkens the windows of his vendee, and excludes the access of light and air from such windows. (3) That the limitation of these two propositions depends upon the fact as to whether such windows are a real necessity for the enjoyment of the grantee's property. If they be, then the implication of the grant of an easement of light and air will be sustained; if they be not, or can be substituted at a reasonable cost, with a view to the purposes of the dominant tenement, then such implication will be denied and rejected. (4) The American doctrine as to light and air requires an express grant or agreement, unless a real and actual necessity exists, to vest a dominant tenement with such light. (5) The doctrine of ancient lights is not recognized."

A somewhat earlier case than those just cited is that of Morrison v. Marquardt, 24 Iowa, 85, 92 Am. Dec. 444, to which reference has already been made, and in which a very elaborate opinion was written by Dillon, Ch. J., and strong ground is taken against the implication of an easement of light and air, except in cases of strictest necessity. See also, Sutphen v. Therkelson, 38 N. J. Eq. 318; White v. Bradley, 66 Me. 254; Brande v. Grace, 154 Mass. 210, 212,—where, in case of a plaintiff lessee, held entitled to a remedy, the court said: "We do not regard this view of the rights of the parties as at all inconsistent with the decision in Keats v. Hugo, 115 Mass. 204, 15 Am. Rep. 80, and other cases, which hold or intimate that the necessity must be pretty plain in order to warrant the implication of a grant." See, also, Case v. Minot, 158 Mass. 577, 23 L. R. A. 536,—a case similar to Doyle v. Lord, supra, to which it refers.

Applying these principles to the case before us, what result is fairly reached? Here was a lot located on Bradley street, about six blocks from the center of the city of New Haven, with a frontage of 61 feet, and a depth of 98 feet. A dwelling house stood upon the westerly part of said lot. The plaintiff purchased said westerly part, 40 feet frontage, with said dwelling house thereon. That left the grantor a lot 21 feet front, which shortly afterwards was sold to the defendant. If we are to go into the business of raising presumptions,—as we must, to support implied grants,—it is fair to suppose the plaintiff did not pay the price and value of the 61-foot lot, for his 40-foot lot. But it would have been just for him to have done so, provided he intended to avail himself of the only beneficial use of it,—keeping it open and unoccupied, in order to have no obstruction to the light of his sitting and dressing room derived from his bay window. It is also fair to presume that his grantor would not have sold a portion for a less price than the whole, provided the remainder was thereby to become practically useless to him; and, if he had charged the price of the whole for a portion, would not the plaintiff have insisted upon taking the whole instead of a portion only? But the grantor would not have sold a portion only, unless the part retained was beneficial to him. But in what could any substantial benefit from such a lot consist unless it could be built upon? And if building was contemplated, there could be little question, apparently, in view of the narrowness of the lot, that such building would require to extend substantially to both sides of the ground. The fact that the plaintiff purchased land extending 5 feet beyond the east face of his bay windows, and from 10 to 11 beyond that of his house, is significant. Such additional width of 5 feet would evidently have been useful to a 21-foot lot. But the plaintiff purchased it, thereby giving himself in fact, whatever his purpose may have been, a strip of that width, upon which no structure could be constructed without his act, to either exclude or impair his light. When the defendant, who lived near, and was fully acquainted with the property, bought, what was the evident situation? He found a narrow, vacant lot, adapted to the purposes of building; presumably to no other use. The plaintiff's house, itself upon a lot so narrow that it extended nearer to the opposite side of the lot than to the side in question, on which there were 5 feet clear beyond the uttermost extension in a bay window, which projected 5 or 6 feet from the side of the house. Could any one purchasing property under such circumstances have supposed that it was the intention of the parties, in making and accepting the grant of the portion of the original premises which had been conveyed to the plaintiff, that there should go with such premises, by implication—by implied grant—a right in the remaining portion of such premises, paramount to and preventative of their beneficial use and enjoyment? We think not. Should the defendant, then, have been enjoined from the acts proposed. His intention was to build a dwelling house to extend down along the boundary line, for a distance of 58 feet from a point about 6 feet from Bradley street, the wall of which was to be about 20 feet high. It is found by the court that "the erection of said dwelling house would deprive the plaintiff of the supply of light which has come across said 21 feet, now owned by the defendant, and would make it necessary for the defendant to light his sitting room and dressing room with gas or some other light in the daytime, in order to obtain sufficient light for the reasonable use of the rooms." This is a finding of fact which we are not at liberty to review. But we have the right, and it is our clear duty, to interpret the language, so far as the same, by reason of indefiniteness, requires interpretation, by the aid of those facts which pertain to that common and general fund of knowledge and information which belongs to the domain of things of which all courts are bound to take judicial notice. By this assistance it becomes evident that the depreciation of light which would ensue from the intended act of the defendant is far from total. The plaintiff would not only be left with so much light as would come from the unobstructed space between the buildings, including the additional space covered by the northeastern and southeastern sides of his bay window, to which he could add by putting in windows elsewhere, or differently constructed; he would also have the light from overhead, beyond the top of a wall 20 feet high; and as to his dressing room on the second story of his house, which does not extend so far eastward into several feet as the sitting room bay window projection, the angle in which the light would be admitted would seem to be such as to make the obstruction comparatively small. It seems to us, therefore, that the proposed act of the defendant would be, in view of all the circumstances, an interruption of light to the plaintiff to the extent of that which is convenient only, not to that which is necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of his dwelling. Indeed, that enjoyment is not reasonable which deprives the defendant of any use of his property, in order merely that the plaintiff may, by reason of such deprivation, have a more comfortable, convenient, and better use of his own. In view of the facts found, as we interpret the finding, we conclude that an injunction could not have been granted had not the trial court adopted what we hold to be the wrong standard, substituting convenience for necessity as the test by which to determine the existence of the right claimed. In this respect also the court erred.

The court also erred in granting an injunction in so indefinite terms. It is impossible to lay down any precise rule of universal application upon the subject. But the person enjoined is entitled to know with reasonable certainty what acts he may and may not do without making himself liable as in contempt of an order. In reference to light, it was the claim of the defendant throughout—a claim which we are not at liberty to say was not made in good faith—that the erection intended to be made by him would not be of such a character or “so near as to exclude the light from the plaintiff’s dwelling house.” This claim the court overruled. But there is nothing in the injunction to indicate whether any erection, or, if so, how near, or of what a character, would be permissible. Without endeavoring to state what degree of certainty would have been reasonably practicable under the circumstances, which is unnecessary in view of what we have held upon the other questions in the case, it is sufficient to say that it seems to us the language employed falls short of the degree of definiteness which could without inconvenience be attained, and should be required.

There is error, and a new trial is granted.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Alexander BELFORD, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Melinde WOODWARD.

(158 Ill. 122.)

1. A provision in a judgment for a specific sum of money, with interest, that it be paid in United States gold coin, does not constitute it a variance from a declaration describing the judgment as for a certain number of dollars or for money simply,—especially where the complaint upon which it was rendered describes the notes upon which the suit was brought as notes for the payment of so many dollars, and not so many dollars in United States gold coin, and the judgment was one by default.
2. A default judgment ordering payment of the amount adjudged in gold coin is void as to such provision, where the complaint showed no promise to pay in coin, but is not invalid as a whole.
3. A judgment of another state adjudicating a matter not presented by the pleading or within the issues may be held invalid as to such adjudication, but valid as to other matters which the judgment record shows upon its face to be easily and naturally separable and within the issues.
4. Variance in a suit upon a judgment alleged to be simply for a sum of money, in that the judgment proved is payable in gold coin, does not constitute cause for reversal, where the judgment recovered thereon contains no direction for payment in any particular kind of money.

5. A judgment payable in United States gold coin is not within the rule that debt will not lie on any obligation except for the payment of a sum specifically certain, as calling for the payment of an unliquidated amount to be determined by the fluctuations of the gold market, but is an obligation to pay in money, or an agreement to deliver a certain weight of standard gold ascertainable by count of coins made legal tender by statute.

6. Any clerical mistake in the amount for which a judgment is entered in the Illinois appellate court may be corrected in the supreme court, where there is sufficient in the record and on the face of the judgment itself to show the correct amount.

(October 11, 1896.)

ERROR to the Appellate Court, First District, to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court of Cook County in favor of plaintiff in an action upon a foreign judgment. Affirmed.

Statement by Magruder, J.:

This is an action of debt begun on June 6, 1893, by defendant in error against plaintiff in error upon a foreign judgment rendered on April 29, 1893, in favor of defendant in error and against plaintiff in error in the superior

NOTE.—Form of judgment and procedure in case of liability to make payment in coin.

I. Form of judgment.

- a. On contracts to pay coin.
- b. On contracts for coin or equivalent.
- c. For coin converted or misapplied.
- d. For damages in other cases.
- e. For obligations created by law.
- f. For costs.

II. Pleadings and procedure.

I. Form of judgment.

In the note to Skinner v. Santa Rosa (Cal.) ante, 512 (1895), it is shown that valid obligations may be created for payment in gold or silver. The present note considers the form of judgment and procedure in such cases.

a. On contracts to pay coin.

The leading case of Bronson v. Rhodes, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 229, 19 L. ed. 141 (1869), held that judgments in such cases may be entered for coined dollars and parts of dollars. And this has become the established rule, although there has not been entire uniformity in the contracts.

It was said, as to a note payable in specie in Butler v. Horwitz, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 258, 19 L. ed. 149 (1869): "The damages should have been assessed at the sum agreed to be due, with interest, in gold and silver coin, and judgment should have been entered in coin for that amount, with costs."

That judgment on a contract payable in specie should be entered for payment in coined dollars and parts of dollars is again decided, in Treblicook v. Wilson, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 397, 20 L. ed. 460 (1873).

A decree for gold and silver coin of the United States was ordered in Forbes v. Murray, 3 Ben. 498 (1869), on an obligation for payment of a certain sum in pounds sterling of Great Britain.

The same was decided in The Surplus of the Edith, 5 Ben. 146 (1871).

In California, where it was provided by statute that judgment for the plaintiff on a contract might be made payable in gold or silver if the contract specifically promised to make payment in such money, this statute was sustained, and judgments in that form were rendered in numerous cases.

Thus it is held that on a contract for payment in United States gold coin judgment should be rendered, under Cal. Code Civ. Proc., § 667, for the same kind of money or currency that is specified therein; Sheehy v. Chalmers (Cal.) 36 Pac. Rep. 514 (1894); Burnett v. Stearns, 33 Cal. 408 (1867); Carpentier v. Atherton, 26 Cal. 564 (1864).

Judgment for gold coin was also rendered under proper complaint on a contract to pay gold, although this was originally an oral contract, where a written contract dated before the commencement of the suit was made pending the suit. Meyer v. Kohn, 29 Cal. 278 (1866).

Under this statute the questions in dispute were generally as to the right to the benefits of the statute, rather than as to the form of the judgment, and many of the cases arising under it are not referred to in this note for that reason, but are found in a note to Skinner v. Santa Rosa (Cal.) ante, 512 (1895), as to the validity of contracts or obligations to make payments in coin. Other cases under this statute are found below in division II., as to Pleadings and procedure.

Judgment for "gold dollars" was held in Hittson v. Davenport, 4 Colo. 169 (1873), to be properly rendered in an action on a note payable in gold.

So in Chesapeake Bank v. Swain, 29 Md. 483 (1868), it was held that a judgment on an obligation payable in coin should be entered for dollars and parts of dollars payable in gold or silver.

On a policy of insurance payable in gold, it was court of the city and county of San Francisco, California, for \$3,908.46 with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum debt, and \$13.50 costs. A number of pleas were filed to the declaration, to wit: (1) Nul tiel record; (2) nul debit; (3) that there was no such court as the one set forth in the declaration; (4) that the superior court of San Francisco had no jurisdiction to render the judgment; (5) that the defendant was never served, etc. Replications were filed to the pleas and rejoinder to the replications. The cause was tried before a jury, who returned a verdict finding "the issues in debt in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of thirty-nine hundred and sixteen and $\frac{1}{100}$ dollars (\$3,916.96) and damages in the sum of two hundred and eighty (\$280) dollars." After overruling motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment, the court below rendered judgment upon the verdict "that the said Melinde Woodward do have and recover of and from the said Alexander Belford the sum of three thousand nine hundred and sixteen dollars and ninety-six cents (\$3,916.96), her debt aforesaid, and two hundred and eighty dollars (\$280), her damages aforesaid, and also her costs to be taxed by the clerk of this court, and that said Melinde Woodward have execution against the said Alexander Belford for her said debt, damages and costs." This judgment has been affirmed by the appellate court, and is brought here for review by writ of error.

The judgment roll from the California court, introduced in evidence, showed service upon Belford; that he appeared and filed a demurrer to the complaint; that the demurrer was overruled; that he filed no answer, and that default was entered against him. The judgment roll also sets forth in full the complaint which describes the cause of action. The liability charged in the complaint against Belford was that of indorser upon two notes executed by one Cogan to the plaintiff, Woodward. The complaint avers that Cogan made one of these notes, "whereby he agreed and promised to pay to plaintiff the sum of $1,443.75 in eight months from date" and the other of said notes "whereby he agreed and promised to pay to plaintiff the sum of $1,512.50 in fourteen months from date." The complaint prays for "judgment for the sum of $2,956.25 together with interest thereon from the time the said promissory notes matured and for costs of suit." The judgment rendered by the superior court of San Francisco, as the same is set out in the judgment roll, concludes as follows: "It is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff, M. Woodward, in the above entitled cause, do have and recover of and from the defendant, Alexander Belford, in said cause, the sum of $3,908.46, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum from date hereof until paid, together with plaintiff's costs and disbursements incurred in said action, amounting to the sum of $13.50, and that said sum of $3,916.96 and said interest be paid in United States gold coin."

held, in Warren v. Franklin Ins. Co. 104 Mass. 521 (1870), that judgment must be rendered for gold coin specifically.

The doctrine of Bronson v. Rodas was also followed in Foster v. Atlantic & P. R. Co., 1 Mo. App. 390 (1876), where the decision was that judgment should be for the amount due payable in gold.

Judgment to be paid in coin was also rendered in an action on a draft, calling for payment in gold, in the case of Chrysler v. Renols, 43 N. Y. 209 (1870).

Yet, in Bank of Prince Edward's Island v. Trumbull, 68 Barb. 459 (1868), judgment was rendered on a contract payable in gold for the value thereof in legal tender notes. But here the plaintiff asked for such recovery.

On a promissory note payable in gold or silver, judgment was entered for payment in coin, in Phillips v. Dugan, 21 Ohio St. 466, 8 Am. Rep. 69 (1871).

A mortgage to pay "lawful silver money" was enforced in McCalla v. Ely, 64 Pa. 254 (1870), by judgment for the amount due in lawful silver money of the United States following Bronson v. Rodas.

So judgment for gold was held in Smith v. Wood, 37 Tex. 616 (1872), to be properly rendered on a promissory note calling for a certain number of dollars in gold.

It was declared in Buehgeger v. Shultz, 13 Mich. 420 (1866), that the courts have no power to render a judgment payable in one species of money only, and this seems to have been a somewhat common doctrine before the case of Bronson v. Rodas, supra, which established the contrary.

Before the decision in Bronson v. Rodas it was decided in a considerable number of cases that judgments could not include a specific provision for payment in gold or silver or in any particular kind of money, but that they must be rendered simply for dollars and parts of dollars, and would then be payable in any lawful money. These cases are presented in the note to Skinner v. Santa Rosa 29 L. R. A.

(Cal.) ante, 512 (1895). But they are not important on the present subject, since they were based on the denial of the validity of the obligation to pay in coin, rather than upon the mode in which the obligation was to be enforced. They are also overruled by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court upholding the validity of such contracts.

b. On contracts for coin or equivalent.

That a judgment on a note payable in gold coin or its equivalent should be rendered according to the market value of such gold coin at the time and place of trial in legal tender paper dollars, was decided in Wells, F. & Co. v. Van Sickie, 6 Nev. 45 (1870), and that a judgment simply and solely for gold coin was erroneous.

So, on a note for a certain number of dollars payable "in gold, or its equivalent in the currency of the country," judgment was rendered for the value of the gold estimated in currency, that is, by adding to the nominal amount enough to compensate for the depreciation of the treasury notes. Mitchell v. Henderson, 63 N. C. 648 (1890).

A note made in 1866 payable in "gold or its equivalent" was the subject of adjudication in Atkinson v. Lanier, 69 Ga. 460 (1882), in which case it appeared that although gold was at a premium at the maturity of the note, and subsequently became of par value with the currency, yet recovery in a suit could be only for the amount of gold or its equivalent specified therein at that time with interest, and not for the value in currency at the time of the maturity, as this, when the two kinds of money had become equal, would require payment of more than the note called for.

This case disapproved of Bond v. Greenwald, 4 Helsk. 453 (1871), in which it was held that the relative value of gold coin and legal tender notes should be taken at the time of the breach of the Messrs. Newman & Northrup, for plaintiff in error:

A judgment for United States gold coin is, in contemplation of law, materially different from a judgment for dollars simply.

Bronson v. Rodes, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 240, 19 L. ed. 141; Dewing v. Sears, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 379, 20 L. ed. 189; Butler v. Horwitz, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 258, 19 L. ed. 149; Gregory v. Morris, 96 U. S. 626, 24 L. ed. 742; McGoon v. Shirk, 54 Ill. 408, 5 Am. Rep. 122; Myers v. Kaufman, 37 Ga. 600, 95 Am. Dec. 367; Dutton v. Pailaret, 52 Pa. 109, 91 Am. Dec. 185.

The plaintiff having offered no evidence whatever to show the value in "dollars" of the amount of gold coin called for by the judgment, the amount of debt and damages could not be ascertained.

An action of debt will not lie on any obligation except one for the payment of "money," pure and simple, without any additional or qualifying provisions fixing the kind or character of money with which the debt is to be absolved.

Miz v. Nettleton, 29 Ill. 245; Wilson v. Hickson, 1 Blackf. 230; Deberry v. Darnell, 5 Yerg. 451; Scott v. Conover, 6 N. J. L. 270; Campbell v. Weister, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 80; Mattox v. Craig, 2 Bibb, 584; Brunner v. Kelsoe, 1 Bibb, 487; Osborne v. Fulton, 1 Blackf. 234; Watson v. McNairy, 1 Bibb, 859.

The verdict of the jury and the judgment were excessive, even on the plaintiff's own theory of the case.

Smith v. Luss, 80 Ill. App. 37.

Messrs. Prentiss, Montgomery & Hall for defendant in error.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When the judgment roll was introduced in evidence by the plaintiff below the defendant objected to it upon the alleged ground that there was a variance between the judgment set forth in the declaration and the judgment described in the judgment roll so offered in evidence, in this, that the judgment set forth in the declaration was therein described as a judgment for a certain number of dollars, or for money simply, whereas, as it is insisted, the judgment described in the judgment roll was a judgment for a certain number of dollars to be paid or payable "in United States gold coin." This objection was overruled, and exception was taken.

Counsel for plaintiff in error contend that a judgment calling for a certain amount of dollars payable "in United States gold coin" is in no respect different from a judgment calling for a certain amount of gold bullion; that without evidence showing the mercantile value of the quantity of gold coin called for, it was impossible for the court or jury to determine what, in fact, was the obligation fixed by the judgment in question, as gold coin is constantly fluctuating in value; and that, as the plaintiff offered no such evidence, she failed to make out a case showing the amount of principal debt or interest, if any, due to her from the defendant.

contract sued upon, where this called for payment in gold or its equivalent.

The Tennessee court did not, however, regard its decision as in conflict with Bronson v. Rodes and Butler v. Horwitz, supra. It said that as defendant had failed to elect to pay in gold complainant had a right to insist on the terms of the contract, which were that if the payment was not made in gold it should be made in an amount of currency equivalent in value to the gold. But if the time when this value is to be determined is taken, as in the Tennessee case, to be the time of the breach of the contract, it might happen that the depreciation of legal tender notes then existing might be much greater than at the date of judgment, in which case the rule would work an injustice. It is to avoid this that the Georgia case of Atkinson v. Lanier, supra, adopts a different rule, as above stated.

We do not find that the Supreme Court of the United States had decided any case in which the effect of an alternative provision for coin or its equivalent has been presented.

a. For coin converted or misapplied.

Judgment for the amount of gold coin was allowed a guest whose satchel containing gold coin was stolen from the hotel. Kellogg v. Sweeney, 46 N. Y. 291, 17 Am. Rep. 333 (1871).

Judgment and execution for gold coin were also allowed in Independent Ins. Co. v. Thomas, 104 Mass. 192 (1870), against an insurance agent for premiums which he had collected in gold.

But in Greentree v. Roenstock, 61 N. Y. 563 (1873), in an action against an agent for the value of gold which he had changed into currency, it was held that judgment might be rendered for the amount in currency which would be equivalent to the value of the gold.

As to a claim that the recovery should have been for gold instead of currency, the court said this view would have been correct had it not been for a stipulation by which various admissions were made. And it said: "The apparent purpose of these admissions was to authorize the referee, in case he found for the plaintiff, to order judgment for the sum named in currency. Besides, it was an admission that the defendant had the plaintiff's money in currency at the time he paid it over to the sheriff. Accordingly the plaintiff can recover it in that form. If an agent takes the gold of the principal and converts it into currency or other property, the principal is not confined to his claim for gold, but may, instead thereof, claim the currency or other property."

In a suit to recover gold coin deposited as security after its return was wrongfully refused it was held, in Gibson v. Groner, 63 N. C. 10 (1868), that the plaintiff could recover judgment for the face amount of the gold, with a sufficient amount added to make good the depreciation of the currency in which the judgment would be payable.

But this case was decided before that of Bronson v. Rodes, and the plaintiff did not ask for a recovery in coin. The court plainly regarded itself unable to order payment in any particular kind of money, and said: "In the present condition of the government and the courts, and as the process of the courts is now controlled, a plaintiff in execution can only collect currency, i. e., United States treasury notes."

d. For damages in other cases.

The validity of a judgment for coined dollars on account of a breach of contract to purchase iron is recognized in Thompson v. Butler, 96 U. S. 694, 24 L. ed. 540 (1878), in which the verdict was for $5,066.17 "in gold," but $66.17 was remitted and judgment entered for $5,000 "in coin." The question in the Supreme Court of the United States was whether or

The simple question involved in the objection is, whether there was such a variance between the declaration and the record of the California judgment as required the trial court to exclude the latter when it was offered in evidence. The declaration alleges that the plaintiff did, by the consideration and judgment of the superior court, etc., of San Francisco, recover against the defendant, in a certain action for the recovery of money, the sum of three thousand nine hundred and three dollars and forty-six cents ($3,903.46) with interest, etc., for her debt, and also the costs taxed at thirteen dollars and fifty cents ($13.50). The judgment, shown by the offered roll is a judgment ordering and adjudging that plaintiff recover against the defendant the same number of dollars with interest for her debt, which are mentioned in the declaration, and the same number of dollars for costs which are mentioned in the declaration. So far, there is an exact correspondence between the allegation and the proof.

Does the fact that the judgment set out in the roll contains at the end of it the words: "And that said sum of $3,916.96 and said interest be paid in United States gold coin,"—create a fatal variance? The declaration sets forth the recovery of a judgment for so many dollars; the judgment roll shows a judgment for the recovery of the same number of dollars. The only difference between the two is, that the latter directs that such number of dollars be paid in a specified kind of money. We are inclined to think that there was no variance, and that the direction as to the payment "in United States gold coin" was mere surplusage.

Before the decision in McGoon v. Shirk, 54 Ill. 408, 5 Am. Rep. 122, this court had held that, under the Acts of Congress of February 25, 1862, and July 11, 1862, known as the "Legal Tender Acts," a note or contract for the payment of a sum of money specifically in gold could be discharged by the payment of the same sum in legal tender notes, and that, not this judgment for coin, which was worth a premium, was for more than $3,000 so as to come within the jurisdiction, and it was held that it was not, but that the amount, and not the kind, of money determined that question.

In an admiralty case damages for collision causing the loss of goods shipped from a Canadian port was estimated at the value of the goods in that port in the currency of Canada which was equivalent in value to the gold coin of the United States. In the circuit court the decree was changed to give the value of the Canadian currency in legal tender notes. On appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, it appeared that, by reason of the largely depreciated value of legal tender notes since the decree of the circuit court was made, the libellant, if that decree was affirmed, would receive much more than the estimated value of the property. But the court held that the decree, being right when rendered, could not be disturbed, and therefore it was affirmed. The Telegraph v. Gordon, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 258, 20 L. ed. 807 (1872). Mr. Chief Justice Chase and Justices Clifford and Field dissented from this decision on the ground that the decree should have been made payable in coin, and that exact justice would have been secured thereby.

A person entitled to damages payable in gold may, if he chooses, with the approbation of the court take a judgment to be discharged in currency for the amount which would be the equivalent in currency of the specified amount of coin as bullion. Gregory v. Morris, 96 U. S. 619, 24 L. ed. 740 (1878).

But judgment for coin cannot be rendered in suits for unliquidated damages, where there is no contract expressly stipulating for coin. Calhoun v. Pace, 87 Tex. 454 (1873).

So judgment payable in gold coin cannot be supported in an action of tort. Livingston v. Morgan, 58 Cal. 22 (1878). This was an action for trespass on property.

The same was held in an action of slander, in Chamberlain v. Vance, 51 Cal. 75 (1875), where the words "gold coin" in a verdict were disregarded in entering judgment.

e. For obligations created by law.

In United States v. Erie R. Co., 107 U. S. 1, 27 L. ed. 386 (1883), which was an action for a tax of 5 per cent on interest paid in coin by the railroad company to foreign bond holders, it was held that as the payments were all made in pounds sterling, the computations must necessarily be on that basis, 29 L. R. A.

and that if there were any difference in value between coin and currency it would be proper to render the judgment for the coin or its equivalent in currency, but, as there was then no such difference, a general judgment for the amount due was all that was necessary.

A judgment for duties on imports was held in Sun Cheong-Kee v. United States, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 320, 18 L. ed. 72 (1866), to be properly amended during the term to make it "payable in gold and silver coin for duties." It was said that this merely declared the legal effect of the judgment, as only gold and silver would be received for duties, and, although the amendment was unnecessary, it did not make the judgment invalid.

So judgment for taxes, which, by state statute, were payable only in gold and silver coin, was rendered to be payable in such, in Lane County v. Oregon, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 71, 19 L. ed. 101 (1869).

f. For costs.

Upon entry of judgment on a promissory note payable in gold or silver, it was ordered in Phillips v. Dugan, 21 Ohio St. 468, 8 Am. Rep. 69 (1871), to be made for payment in coin, and not for currency equivalent in value, but the judgment for costs was ordered separately without any provision for payment in coin.

Judgment on a draft payable in gold, entered in Chrysler v. Renois, 43 N. Y. 209 (1870), was made payable in coin with the costs payable in currency.

The same form of judgment was adopted in Keillogg v. Sweeney, 45 N. Y. 221, 17 Am. Rep. 338 (1871), in case of a loss of coin by theft from a hotel.

In Hittson v. Davenport, 4 Colo. 169 (1878), a judgment on a note stipulating for payment in gold was amended so as to make the recovery payable in "gold dollars" and costs "in lawful money."

It was held, in Carpentier v. Atherton, 25 Cal. 564 (1864), that the judgment for costs in such a case might also be made payable in the kind of money stipulated in the contract sued upon.

That judgment "should have been entered in coin for that amount with costs" is the decision in Butler v. Horwitz, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 258, 19 L. ed. 149 (1869), in case of a contract to pay in gold and silver. Nothing more definite is said as to the medium in which payment of costs is to be made, or to distinguish the costs from the other part of the judgment in this particular.

So in Sun Cheong-Kee v. United States, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 320, 18 L. ed. 72 (1866), judgment for a specified in a suit upon such a note or contract, judgment could be entered up for the amount due upon the face of the instrument, and that the value of gold over legal tender notes was not a subject for consideration in an action brought on such a note or contract. But these prior decisions were overruled in McGoon v. Shirk, supra, because, after their rendition, the Supreme Court of the United States decided the cases of Bronson v. Rodes, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 229, 19 L. ed. 141, and Butler v. Horvitz, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 258, 19 L. ed. 149, taking a contrary view; and the construction given by that court to an act of congress was, of course, binding upon this court. Accordingly, the Bronson Case and the Butler Case were followed in the McGoon Case. In the latter the question was, whether a note payable in terms, in American gold, and executed after the passage of the Legal Tender Act of February 25, 1862, could be discharged by a tender of United States treasury notes; and the Bronson Case was there construed as holding that an express contract to pay coined dollars could only be satisfied by the payment of coined dollars; and the Butler Case was construed as holding that, when it appears to be the clear intent of a contract that payment or satisfaction shall be made in gold and silver, damages should be assessed and judgment rendered accordingly; and, after thus construing the two federal decisions, we said in the McGoon Case: "The note was payable in American gold, and in that medium alone, without the consent of the payee, could it be paid and satisfied. The court erred in holding the tender of treasury notes sufficient, and a compliance with the contract, and for this error the decree must be reversed."

In Hepburn v. Griswold, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 608, 19 L. ed. 513, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the Legal Tender Acts of 1862 and 1863, making United States notes a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, were unconstitutional so far as they applied to debts contracted before the passage of those acts; that, before February 25 1862, all contracts not expressly stipulating sum "payable in gold coin for duties, with costs," was rendered without any further specification as to the costs.

These cases leave the subject of costs somewhat unsettled in respect to the kind of money in which they shall be ordered to be paid. None of the other cases have anything to say on this point.

II. Pleadings and procedure.

Like the case of BELFORD v. WOODWARD, nearly all the other cases on the subject have held it to be necessary to ask for gold or silver in the complaint in order to be entitled to a judgment therefor.

Thus, on a default judgment an entry for gold coin is invalid where the complaint did not pray for it and the summons did not say that such judgment would be taken. Lamping v. Hyatt, 27 Cal. 99 (1884).

That the complaint must make a case under the specific contract act, which permits a judgment in gold coin, was also decided in McComb v. Reed, 28 Cal. 281, 87 Am. Dec. 115 (1885), and an allegation of the conversion of gold into "cash" and "money" is insufficient to support such judgment.

But the mere fact that a judgment is entered by default is not sufficient to prevent making it payable in gold coin when other requisites exist. Harding v. Cowing, 28 Cal. 212 (1885).

Where no issue was raised by the pleadings in an action of contract, as to whether plaintiff's demand was payable in gold coin, and the plaintiff made no averment on that point, the words "gold coin" in a verdict are mere surplusage to be disregarded in entering judgment. Watson v. San Francisco & H. B. R. Co., 50 Cal. 523 (1875).

In case of Smith v. Peabody, it was held by Judge Daniels, at special term in Buffalo in 1870, that judgment for coined dollars on foreclosure of a mortgage payable only in coin would not be rendered, unless a demand for coined dollars was made in the complaint, and that to order judgment for coined dollars would exceed the relief demanded.

So in Lillie v. Sherman, 39 How. Pr. 287 (1870), it was decided by Judge Dwight at a special term that a motion to amend a judgment of foreclosure and sale upon a mortgage directing payment in gold would be denied, because there was no ambiguity in the terms of the decree, and the term "dollars" there used meant only dollars in legal tender money.

These two cases last named are cited and disapproved in Ransford v. Marvin, 8 Abb. Pr. N. S. 429 (1870), in which Maaten, J., at a special term of the Buffalo superior court, decided that a judgment for a specified number of "dollars," without specifying the kind of money in which it should be paid, could not be discharged by a tender of the specified amount in legal tender notes, where the record showed that the complaint was based upon a contract which was payable only in coin, and that the word "dollars" in the judgment meant coined dollars, and that the contract was not merged in the judgment for the purpose of determining what kind of money should be paid.

The verdict need not make a specification as to the kind of money to be paid in order to permit a judgment for gold coin in an action on a contract specifically calling for such payment, the right to which also is shown by the pleadings. Winans v. Hassey, 48 Cal. 684 (1874).

An injunction is not the proper remedy for error, if error exists, in a judgment for gold and silver coin. Windisch v. Gussett, 30 Tex. 744 (1868).

In Miller v. Tyler, 58 N. Y. 477 (1874), it does not appear that any express provision was made for payment in coin by the mortgage which was there foreclosed. But it was declared that the reconsideration of the legal tender question by the Supreme Court of the United States with a result adverse to its first judgment did not affect existing judgments of state courts. Therefore, one who had paid in coin the amount called for by a judgment of foreclosure while the first legal tender decision was in force was denied the right to recover back the amount of the premium on gold after that decision was overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States. The question arose, however, on a motion to vacate the order by which the foreclosure decree was amended, to include a provision for payment in coin, and the court held that the decision of such motion was not reviewable on appeal.

It appears from the review of the decisions that they fully support all that is said in the above case of BELFORD v. WOODWARD in respect to judgments payable in coin. The result of the authorities clearly is, that a plaintiff may have his judgment specifically provide for payment in coin if his contract or other cause of action expressly calls for such money, and he demands it in his complaint.

B. A. R.

otherwise, were in legal effect contracts for the payment of coin, and that under the constitution the parties thereto were respectively entitled to demand and bound to pay the sums due, according to their terms, in coin, notwithstanding the provision in the Legal Tender Acts making United States notes a legal tender in payment of such debts. Following the Hepburn Case, this court held in Morrow v. Rainey, 58 Ill. 357, and Chamblin v. Blair, Id. 385, that contracts for the payment of money, made before the passage of the Legal Tender Acts, had reference to coined money "and could not be discharged, unless by consent, otherwise than by tender of the sum due in coin."

Subsequently the Legal Tender Cases (Knox v. Lee and Parker v. Davis) 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 457, 20 L. ed. 287, overruled the case of Hepburn v. Griewood, supra, so far as it held the legal tender acts to be unconstitutional as applied to contracts made before the passage of those acts; and, by consequence, the decisions in 58 Ill., also so holding, were rendered nugatory as authorities upon that point. The Legal Tender Cases, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 457, 20 L. ed. 287, held that the legal tender acts were constitutional as applied to contracts made before, as well as to contracts made after, the passage of those acts; but we do not understand that the decision of the Legal Tender Cases, so called, overruled the cases of Bronson v. Rodes and Butler v. Horvitz. The Legal Tender Cases decided that contracts payable in money, whether made before or after the passage of the legal tender acts, could be discharged by the tender of United States treasury notes, popularly known as "greenbacks;" but they did not decide that contracts specifically payable in gold and silver coin could not be enforced as such. It was only contracts payable in money generally, without specifying gold and silver coin, which were therein referred to. The decision in those cases recognizes two kinds of money as legal tender in the payment of debts, first, gold and silver coin, second, treasury notes made legal tender by act of congress. It was therein held that all debts, which the contract of the parties did not make payable in coin, could be discharged in legal tender notes, but the right to make and enforce contracts for payment in coin was not denied. Mr. Justice Strong, who wrote the opinion in the Legal Tender Cases, expressly says: "We speak now of contracts to pay money generally, not contracts to pay some specifically defined species of money."

The case of Bronson v. Rodes, supra, is recognized as authority in Trebilcock v. Wilson, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 687, 20 L. ed. 460, decided a year after the Legal Tender Cases were decided. In Trebilcock v. Wilson, the question arose, whether a note payable by its terms in specie could be satisfied, against the will of the holder, by the tender of notes of the United States declared by the Act of February 25, 1862, to be a legal tender in payment of debts, and it was there held that the use of the term "in specie" did not assimilate the note to a note payable in chattels, but that those words were descriptive of the kind of dollars in which the note was payable, "there being different kinds in circulation, recognized by law;" and, after stating the meaning of the words, "in specie," to be "that the designated number of dollars in the note shall be paid in so many gold or silver dollars of the coinage of the United States," the court says: "This being the meaning of the term 'in specie,' the case is brought directly within the decision of Bronson v. Rodes, where it was held that express contracts, payable in gold or silver dollars, could only be satisfied by the payment of coined dollars, and could not be discharged by notes of the United States declared to be a legal tender in payment of debts. These several coinage acts of congress make the gold and silver coins of the United States a legal tender in all payments, according to their nominal or declared values. . . . As the Act of 1862 . . . has been sustained by the recent decision of this court (79 U. S. 12 Wall. 457, 20 L. ed. 287), as valid and constitutional, we have, according to that decision, two kinds of money, essentially different in their nature, but equally lawful. It follows, from that decision, that contracts payable in either or for the possession of either, must be equally lawful and, if lawful, must be equally capable of enforcement. . . . We shall find little difficulty in holding that it (the Act of 1862) was not intended to interfere in any respect with existing or subsequent contracts payable by their express terms in specie; and that when it declares that the notes of the United States shall be lawful money, and a legal tender for all debts, it means for all debts which are payable in money generally. . . . The 20th section of the Act of 1792 . . . has reference to the coins prescribed by the act, and when, by the creation of a paper currency, another kind of money, expressed by similar designations, was sanctioned by law and made a tender in payment of debts, it was necessary, as stated in Bronson v. Rodes, to avoid ambiguity and prevent a failure of justice, to allow judgments to be entered for the payment of coined dollars, when that kind of money was specifically designated in the contracts upon which suits were brought." Accordingly, in the Trebilcock Case, the judgment of the supreme court of Iowa, holding that a tender of greenbacks or United States legal tender notes in payment of the note payable in specie was legal and sufficient, was reversed.

Still later, in Gregory v. Morris, 96 U. S. 619, 24 L. ed. 740, the Supreme Court of the United States again recognized the case of Bronson v. Rodes, and referred to it as holding that a contract for the payment of gold coin is "an agreement to deliver a certain weight of standard gold, to be ascertained by a count of coins, each of which is certified to contain a definite proportion of that weight," and that judgment may be rendered upon such a contract payable in coined dollars; and it was held in the Gregory Case that an instruction, telling the jury that "no agreement or contract to pay a certain number of dollars in gold can be enforced," was properly refused as being in conflict with Bronson v. Rodes.

Hence, any language used in Reinback v. Crabtree, 77 Ill. 182, which can be construed as holding that a contract payable in gold may be paid at the option of the debtor, and against the will of the creditor, in any currency which the general government has declared to be a legal tender in the payment of debts, must be regarded as being in conflict with the federal decisions, and is not binding as authority. Such language was used inadvertently, and was in conflict with the case of McGoon v. Shirk, supra, which was evidently overlooked.

We conclude that "express contracts to pay coined dollars," where creditors insist upon their enforcement, "can be satisfied only by the tender of payment of coined dollars, and judgments in suits brought on such contracts may be entered for coined dollars and parts of coined dollars, such contracts not being within the Legal Tender Acts." 15 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 705, and cases in notes; 1 Freem. Judgm. 4th ed. § 3, and cases in notes.

But it is only where the contract calls for the payment of the debt in gold coin that the judgment should be rendered for coined dollars. In the case at bar, it appears, from a reference to the judgment roll of the California court, where the complaint in the action is set out in full, that the notes, upon which the suit was brought in the California court, are described as notes for the payment of so many dollars, and not as notes for the payment of so many dollars in "United States gold coin." The judgment, by the use of the words, "and that said sum of $3,916.98 and said interest be paid in United States gold coin," goes beyond, and is not authorized by, the allegations of the complaint in regard to the terms of the note. The judgment is complete in itself without the added words as to the mode of payment; because it is therein adjudged that plaintiff do have and recover of and from the defendant the sum of $3,908.46 with interest, etc., together with costs, etc., amounting to the sum of $13.50, before the added words are reached. Their omission would detract nothing from the sufficiency of the judgment.

In Watson v. San Francisco & H. B. R. Co., 50 Cal. 523, the verdict and judgment were for gold coin; there was no allegation in the complaint warranting a recovery in gold coin; the Code of Civil Procedure in California requires the judgment to conform to the verdict; and the supreme court of California there held that, "if the verdict goes beyond the issues raised by the pleadings, and passes upon an extraneous fact not embraced therein, it is void pro tanto, and the surplus matter may be disregarded in entering the judgment." The court in that case proceeds to say: "In this case there was no issue as to whether plaintiff's demand was payable in gold coin, and the complaint contains no averment on that point. The words 'gold coin' in the verdict are, therefore, mere surplusage, and should have been disregarded in entering the judgment." To the same effect is Chamberlin v. Vance, 51 Cal. 75.

This ruling is applicable here, as the judgment sued upon was rendered in California. It is manifest that the judgment sued upon, being a judgment by default, went beyond the issue raised by the complaint in ordering the judgment to be paid in gold coin, and to that extent is void. The defendant below made this very objection to the admission of the judgment roll. The record shows that he objected to its admission upon the following ground, among others: "That the said judgment roll shows a void judgment in this, that the judgment therein shown appears to have been rendered by default in an action where the complaint of the plaintiff showed no promise or undertaking of the defendant to pay any sum in gold coin, but, notwithstanding this fact, judgment was entered therein for a sum of money payable in gold coin." We think that the objection was valid as to that part of the judgment which directs payment to be made in gold coin, but not as to the whole judgment.

A judgment of a court of another state, adjudicating a matter not presented by the pleadings or within the issue, is void even in a collateral proceeding. Reynolds v. Stockton, 43 N. J. Eq. 211. If the whole judgment is void when all the matters adjudicated by it are outside of the issue, then, when two matters adjudicated upon by a judgment are shown upon the face of the judgment record to be easily and naturally separable, and one of them to be within the jurisdiction of the court, and the other to be beyond its jurisdiction, the judgment may be held to be valid as to the former matter, and void as to the latter. In such case, the judgment will be sustained so far as it adjudges what the court has the power to adjudge as being within the issue, and will be void so far as it attempts to adjudicate upon what is beyond its power as being outside of the issue. This principle was applied in the late case of People v. Seelye, 146 Ill. 189, where the judgment of a probate court, approving the account of a guardian which appeared in the record to be a part of the judgment itself, was sustained in a collateral proceeding as to a part of the items of the account which the court had the power to pass upon, but was held to be void as to the items which were beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

The judgment sued upon in the present action being void only as to the last clause, which directs the mode of payment, and being valid as to that portion of it which adjudges that the plaintiff should recover the sum of so many dollars generally, it follows that there was no such variance as is insisted upon, because the declaration correctly declares upon the valid portion of the judgment according to its legal effect.

It is difficult to see how the defendant below could have been injured by the action of the court in admitting the judgment roll from California. In this action of debt upon the California judgment, the trial court rendered judgment against defendant for the sum of a certain number of dollars without any direction that it be paid in any particular kind of money. The defendant has not been required to pay the judgment in United States gold coin. The judgment against him being a judgment for the payment of dollars generally, he can discharge it in either one of the two lawful kinds of money, that is to say, either by paying gold and silver coin, or by paying legal tender notes. The plaintiff, by taking a judgment payable in dollars generally, has waived his right to insist upon payment "in United States gold coin."

Counsel for plaintiff in error claim that a judgment is a contract. Some courts have beld that a judgment is a contract, and others have held that it is not a contract. 1 Freem. Judgm. § 4; 1 Black, Judgm. §§ 7-11. The doctrine of this court is that a judgment is not a contract. Williams v. Waldo, 4 Ill. 264; Rae v. Hulbert, 17 Ill. 572; 1 Black, Judgm. § 10, and notes. But, even if the judgment here sued upon be a contract, we see no reason why the party seeking to enforce it may not waive the provision requiring payment to be made in gold coin, and give the debtor the privilege of paying in any kind of money which is legal tender under the acts of congress. The authorities hold that contracts payable in gold coin must be satisfied in that medium unless another mode of satisfaction meets with the consent of the creditor. With his consent they may be satisfied in legal tender notes. The prohibition against the satisfaction of a contract payable in gold coin by the payment of any other medium than gold coin only applies where the satisfaction in another medium than that of gold coin is against the will of the creditor. If the creditor does not choose to take a judgment payable in coined dollars, the debtor is not injured, as then he may pay in either coined dollars or legal tender notes.

Counsel for plaintiff in error invokes the well-settled rule, that debt will not lie on any obligation except one for the payment of a sum specifically certain, and insists that the clause as to payment in United States gold coin does not call for the payment of money or a sum certain, but for the payment of an unliquidated amount to be determined according to the fluctuations of the gold market. Even if the clause in question be regarded as a valid part of the judgment, we are unable to agree with counsel upon this point. We regard an obligation to pay "in United States gold coin" as an obligation to pay in money, or an agreement to deliver a certain weight of standard gold ascertainable by count of coins made legal tender by statute. A contract for the payment of so many dollars in gold and silver is a contract for the direct payment of money, and the judgment in a suit thereon should be entered for coined dollars and parts of dollars when such is the will of the creditor. Hart v. Flynn, 8 Dana, 191; Dewing v. Sears, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 879, 20 L. ed. 189. We do not regard the case of Miz v. Nettleton, 29 Ill. 245, where it was held that an action of debt would not lie upon a due bill for so many dollars payable in county orders, as having any application here.

It is claimed that the judgment here is for too large an amount. The judgment in the circuit court was for $3,916.96 debt and $280 damages or interest. In the appellate court the defendant in error remitted $6, and judgment there should have been entered for $3,916.96 debt and $274 damages, but, as matter of fact, the clerk entered up judgment affirming the judgment of the circuit court for $3,916.96 debt and $275 damages, the latter amount being too large by one dollar. There was here what was clearly a clerical mistake in putting the figures $275 instead of $274. As the judgment of the appellate court shows upon its face that the defendant "remitted the sum of $6 from the judgment entered in the lower court," and as the record of the lower court is before us showing that the judgment for damages there was $280, there is that in the record and upon the face of the judgment itself by which the latter can be amended, and the mistake of the clerk rectified. We are inclined to think, therefore, that we have the power to correct the judgment of the appellate court in the respect thus indicated. It is accordingly so ordered.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed for $3,916.96 debt and $274 damages, and costs.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

City of PHILADELPHIA, Appt.,
v.
OVERSEERS OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

(170 Pa. 257.)

A school is not a purely public charity, so that the property used for it is exempt from taxation, when conducted by a master as a business enterprise, under a contract by which he pays one eighth of the gross receipts from tuition to the corporation owning the property, and receives tuition for all pupils, although the corporation, which was organized to conduct a school for the rich at reasonable rates, and for the poor gratuitously, itself pays the tuition of a small part of the pupils out of income received from endowments and legacies.

(October 7, 1896.)

NOTE.—As to the effect of using property of an educational institution for revenue, upon its right to exemption from taxation, see notes to Book Agents of Methodist Episcopal Church, South, v. Hinton (Tenn.) 19 L. R. A. 239.

29 L. R. A.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas No. 3 for Philadelphia County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of taxes. Reversed.

The conclusions of the referee, Mr. J. Levering Jones, were as follows:

The William Penn Charter School is an academy or institution of learning, founded, endowed, and maintained by public or private charity, and is therefore, so far as the buildings situate at Nos. 8 and 12 South Twelfth street, and the land annexed thereto, necessary for the enjoyment of said buildings, exempt from taxation by the city of Philadelphia.

The exemption from taxation of a public educational institution sustained subsequently by charitable gifts, rests upon two grounds:

1. The relief that is afforded the state in the reduction of the burden imposed upon it in the education of its youth;

2. An acknowledgment of that generous spirit of humanity, that, speaking from the heart, gives something for the benefit or good of the public, not contaminated by the expectation of pecuniary returns.

The latter ground, however, is the fundamental one, and upon it the doctrine of exemption really rests.

A private school supported by private means, having no public object in view, but conducted solely for the advantage and convenience of those in control, or those availing themselves of the instruction given, may relieve the local government of some of the expenses incidental to the education of its children, but, the essential quality of charity being absent from their creation and maintenance, they are properly subjects of taxation.

The founder of the William Penn Charter School had as his primary thought the education of those children whose parents were unable to pay for their tuition. An advocate of educating the youth of all classes, it was to the poor that his attention was in this instance particularly directed. The terms of his grant fully indicate this, for he says, "those unable to pay for tuition are to be educated gratis, and the rich at reasonable rates." He wisely provided for the support of the school to be derived from gifts and legacies, and by those possessing wealth whose children should attend it for instruction. The main purpose of his plan has been a permanent and continuing influence in the career of the school. The services rendered by its managers, the endowments it has received, and the manner in which it has been conducted, have all been expressive of the original aim.

Now the William Penn Charter School rests upon a charitable foundation. This is evident from the study of its charter.

It has been endowed by charitable gifts and bequests, and has always been maintained by public or private charity. It is true its imposing corps of teachers, providing a comprehensive course of study, are not directly paid by endowments to the school, interest arising out of trusts or from annual contributions, but the school property used entirely for school and not for residential purposes arose out of the investment of a charitable fund, which has been managed and nursed, and added to by men who have received no compensation, and sought no personal gain.

For over a century this school flourished modestly, the result of its work scarcely noticed because its funds were not large and its field of labor limited. To increase the capacity of the school, draw public attention to it, and widen its scope of action, its overseers adopted a new business policy, determined to construct a new building, and pay the head master practically in proportion to the numerical increase in the number of pupils. The corporation was fortunate in securing the services of a remarkably able organizer, and after a courageous struggle for a few years against many disadvantages, they succeeded in giving the school the highest repute and securing for those taught free of personal charge an education semi-collegiate in character. To attain this result a considerable number of pupils are charged a fee for tuition. Does this circumstance make the property directly in use for school purposes taxable? In our judgment it does not.

With the endowments already enjoyed, the overseers could have purchased an insignificant building, pursued the conservative course that guided the schools for many years, and with two or three teachers taught the primary branches gratis to the number of pupils that are now so liberally educated. This course of conduct would, beyond question, have exempted the specific property under consideration from taxation.

Now, has anything been done to destroy the charitable characteristics of this excellent school? Has not its public work been widened, and is it not governed by a wiser judgment than heretofore? Is its service to humanity not increasing? Does the corporation of its overseers derive any benefit from the tuition fees?

It is true that the charitable funds of the school are somewhat increased through a small surplus which comes from pay scholars, but the sum is insignificant in comparison with the actual amount appropriated by the officers from the trust funds for the education of what are termed "free pupils," and it does not destroy or limit the charity because this sum is used in the enlargement of the charitable work and is of no pecuniary advantage to any one.

The fees received from the stockholders of the Philadelphia library more than pay those employed in its service, but the circumstance that there is a balance annually invested for the use of the library, and the purchase of new publications, does not make the library less an institution relieved from taxation.

Nor does the form of contract which has been made with the head master in any way affect the charitable purpose of the institution. With this private contract made for the advantage of the institution, unproductive to any of the trustees, not limiting the public benefits of the institution, the city has nothing to do; no more than it would have with the salary of the pastor of a church or the terms upon which a professor of the University of Pennsylvania delivered lectures to the students. An express or implied contract generally exists in all charitable institutions between the governing body and those who render services to the institution. The contract which was made between the overseers of the William Penn Charter School and its head master is but an agreed mode of payment for the work he performs, and which, at the end of sixteen years, has given him no more than adequate compensation, while it has resulted fortunately for the school, increasing its usefulness and securing, probably better results than if there had been only a fixed sum paid to him. It is but an increasing scale of compensation, dependent upon what he achieves. Is a church less a charitable organization because it pays its pastor the first year of his pastorate $1,000 and the tenth year $10,000, assuming in advance his ability to build up the congregation and basing the estimate of what he should receive from the expectation of the increased number of communicants?

The contract made with the head master, being valid, and in no way against public policy, or affecting the charitable aim of the overseers in their management of the school, does not impair or reduce its charitable or public features.

The circumstance that the mere income from the fees of students is much larger than the income which arises from the charitable donations which have been given at various times for the support and maintenance of the school, does not affect the character of the foundation or the object of the institution, for the overseers are uncompensated, and give their time and services, working out directly the charitable aims of the founder.

Nor does the fact that the charitable investment is not a large one change the charitable character of the school. The gift of the widow's mite was as deep an act of charity as the princely endowment of Girard. The meaning of the act of assembly is not to be measured by the amount of the benefaction, but the motive and purpose attached to it, and by the management of the fund arising from it.

As the test of a charity is not the sum involved, so the test is not whether at a particular time there are ten or one hundred beneficiaries. The College of La Fayette with a dozen matriculants taught free of tuition fees is as much a charity as if a thousand thronged its class rooms, taught without compensation. So with the William Penn Charter School. It has not a large body of free students attending it, but it is striving to increase the number. Its facilities for the education of those unable to pay for tuition is increasing. In a few years the corporation will be free of debt, and its entire income can then be applied, not partially to the maintenance of its buildings, but entirely to the education of free pupils.

Nor does the small increase that occasionally comes to its funds from the fees of scholars, paid by the head master, beyond the cost of their tuition, make it an institution conducting business for profit.

If its trustees devoted the income from the property possessed by them to the maintenance exclusively of the school building, where should be annually taught a few students by a single teacher paid for his services from the trust fund, no one would question the charitable nature of the work being performed. When the scope of the school is enlarged, and its facilities are extended to many who pay for tuition, the sole purpose of giving such tuition for fees being to increase its facilities to those unable to give compensation for tuition, the charitable nature of the school is unaffected.

The whole result of the business management of the William Penn Charter School has been the creation by the methods adopted of a splendid equipment for educational work, and the acquisition of that equipment for the direct use of every free scholar in the school.

It is an institution instinct with public spirit, which Sir James MacIntosh says is the highest defensive principle in a state. That is the force governing its overseers. With the charitable capital it has it is achieving much. Its aim to accomplish more in the direction of public good is evident, and if the wisdom and vigor now displayed in its management continue, the result is not uncertain.

It is unnecessary to make a comparison of the numerous decisions which have been rendered in Pennsylvania interpretive of Act of May 14, 1874, relating to educational institutions exempt from taxation. All that we have herein observed is, we think, in accord with the rules which have been laid down by our supreme court in the following cases which will be briefly examined.

In Donohugh v. Library Co. of Philadelphia, 86 Pa. 807, the library company of Philadelphia was assessed for the purposes of taxation. It appeared that the property of the library company consisted of its buildings and books acquired by gift and bequest, that the corporation was composed of members, and was maintained by their annual contributions, from the income derived from such property as had been given to it, and from fees paid for the use of books by persons not members. No dividends have ever been paid, but the entire income has been dedicated to the expenses and the purchase of books. The court held that such an institution is a purely public charity within the meaning of the constitution, that it was not administered for private gain, that it was not confined to privileged individuals, but was open to the indefinite public. The supreme court in that case substantially adopts the opinion, written in the lower court by Mitchell, J., and it may be well to quote the language that he uses, as illustrative of some of the elements which enter into a charity in a case where it is partly sustained by fees received from its beneficiaries. He says: "The library is a trust, and while it is the property of the corporation, and therefore in a certain sense of the corporate stockholders, yet it is not their property in any full, legal or commercial sense. They cannot sell it and divide the proceeds among themselves as individuals—that would be a violation of the trust, which a court of equity would be bound at once to restrain. Being then a trust, its purpose and scope must be looked for in the grant. It is not a question of how the revenue is derived, but to what purpose and with what intent is it devoted. The purpose of this trust is clearly set forth in the charter; it is 'to erect a library for the advancement of knowledge and literature in the city of Philadelphia,' and we fail to discover in it any taint of private profit."

In Philadelphia v. Women's Christian Assn., 125 Pa. 572, it appeared that the Women's Christian Association was chartered by an act of assembly approved May 9, 1871; that its object is the temporal, moral, and religious welfare of women; that it is located in Philadelphia, where it has a boarding department, a home for young women, an employment bureau, a restaurant, a lecture room, and a free library; that the house and lot cost $70,000, a part of which was the proceeds of a sale of the property in which the association was formerly located, which was purchased by money previously given by the public and friends, and that there is a mortgage on the premises of $36,000; that there is no stock in the association, and none of the corporate officers receive any salary or compensation; that food and lodging are furnished to women who are dependent on themselves for support, and who do not receive more than $6 a week wages; that they pay the association a certain amount of board per week, and if unable to pay, and if there is any vacancy, are taken free of expense, but are required to present themselves at the employment bureau in order to obtain employment. In 1885 the expenses were $2,641.95 in excess of the receipts. The defendant association was assessed for the purposes of taxation by the city of Philadelphia. Paxson, Ch. J., in the opinion of the court, says: "The object of the association is to improve the temporal, moral, and religious welfare of young females who are obliged to earn their own support, and that as a means to this end, it furnishes them with food and lodging, not as paupers, but for a compensation which, while it does not compensate, aids in defraying the expenses, and thus preserves the self-respect of the recipients, while to others who are unable to pay, temporary shelter is furnished free, and aid extended to them in the way of procuring employment. All this and much more is done by a band of devoted women who labor unselfishly, in season and out of season, giving their time and labor freely, and supplying the annual deficit in the treasury by contributions from themselves and their friends. There is no element of gain in the object or operations of this association. It is a public charity, and I regard it as a short-sighted policy in the city of Philadelphia to seek to burden such an institution with taxation."

After reviewing several decisions in this state in which various institutions had been held not to be public charities, he distinguishes them by saying: "Nor was its charitable character, in either of the cases, so stamped upon the institution itself, upon its organic law, that the mode of administering it might not have been changed at any time." And continuing: "In the case in hand the stamp of charity is indelibly fixed upon the association. It appears in its charter, and is developed at every stage of the proceedings. Does the mere fact that it charges a small sum to a portion of those who feed at its table and enjoy the shelter of its roof, destroy its character as a purely public charity? . . . This whole subject was carefully considered in Donohugh's App., 86 Pa. 306. This was the case of the Philadelphia library, an institution maintained by the annual contributions of members, from the income derived from such property as has been given to it, and from fees paid for the use of the books. The test in that case was the object of the corporation. That was found to be the general public good, and not private gain."

The liberal disposition of the court in determining the law is further revealed in Northampton County v. Lafayette College, 128 Pa. 132, where it was held that buildings owned by an incorporated college located on the college grounds and occupied as residences by persons employed in carrying on the proper work of the institution—such as instructors, the secretary of the president, or the gardener having charge of the property—are embraced in the exemption from taxation granted to the college under the Act of May 14, 1874.

In that case it appeared that $18,000 per annum was paid by students for their expenses and tuition, and helped to sustain the institution, but that there was a considerable number of free pupils; that no person could be refused admission to its faculty or classes, or from participation in any of its privileges and advantages on account of religious belief.

In Episcopal Academy v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. 572, the facts of the case were almost analogous to those found in the present instance. In that case the school was incorporated by the Act of March 9, 1787, which act provided that "it is right and proper to afford all due encouragement to the education of youth and to the establishment of useful seminaries of learning within this state," and that there shall be established an academy for the education of youth in useful branches of learning. The school was thereupon subsequently opened, and land appropriated by the state to the trustees for the uses of the school. Its "fundamental laws" provided that there should be a selection of trustees and head master, and, further, "that a convenient number of youths should be taught gratis as soon as the funds shall appear to afford it. In the meantime it shall be kept in view as the object of the institution that all gifts or other bequests for this special purpose shall be kept in a fund to be applied to no other purpose whatever. In 1840 the trustees secured a lot at Locust and Juniper streets, and a large school was subsequently established. The academy is maintained from the income and property given to and purchased by it, and from fees and tuition. No rent is charged. All receipts and income, after defraying the expenses, are applied to increasing the number of free scholars, which has ranged from sixteen to twenty. The premises have never been used for any purpose yielding any income or pecuniary profit to any one. The court in this case seemed to advance distinctly a step beyond any previously taken by them in previous decisions. Mr. Justice Williams says: "Whatever is gratuitously done or given in relief of the public burdens, or for the advancement of the public good, is a public charity. In every such case as the public is the beneficiary the charity is a public charity. . . . The property given to the school is so used that, by its use for the purposes contemplated by the givers, the charity is made to support itself. It is not a business organization, conducted for profit, but a charity, conducted with a view to furnish education at its actual cost to a great number of youth who otherwise might be required to pay more for it or forego it altogether. Such was the situation in Philadelphia v. Women's Christian Assn., 125 Pa. 573. In that case it was said that the character of the association as a charity was not destroyed if to some extent it received a revenue from the recipients of its bounty. We are now disposed to go further, and say that an institution that is in its nature and purposes a purely public charity does not lose its character as such under the tax laws if it receives a revenue from the recipients of its bounty sufficient to keep it in operation. It must not go beyond self-support. When a charity embarks in business for profit it is liable to taxation like any other business establishment; but so long as the trustees of the school manage it as a charity, giving the benefit of what might otherwise be profit to the reduction of tuition fees or the increase of the number of free scholars in furtherance of the 'education of youth,' the corpus of the trust, the schoolhouse, is entitled to exemption."

This decision seems conclusive as applicable to the case under consideration. Were it not for the application of the trust funds to the maintenance of the William Penn Charter School it is doubtful if it could exist, and in order to maintain it, and admit the free pupils that therein received instruction, it has been necessary to expend of these trust funds during the last sixteen years an aggregate sum of over $76,000.

The process of the development of the law to the conclusions finally reached has been natural and inevitable, and a test has been laid down in the last-cited case so clearly expressed as to constitute a valuable rule to apply in the future to determine what educational institutions are exempt from taxation.

It may now be said that educational institutions of a distinctly non-sectarian character, conducted solely for the benefit of the public without any element of private gain, relieving the state from taxation and extending knowledge to some who otherwise would not be able to obtain it, are institutions of a purely charitable nature, and exempt from taxation.

An institution of learning like the William Penn Charter School should be encouraged. It is an honor to the state, an example of local philanthropy, and tends to reduce taxation, not to increase it. There a number of meritorious youth are annually taught without compensation. The trust funds of the institution are applied to a beneficent purpose, and the internal organization is maintained by the gratuitous labor of its trustees. No word of adverse criticism can be uttered against its administration by sectarian or layman. Conceived by a large and generous mind,—the founder of our commonwealth,—its aims and its services to the community are entitled to continued municipal recognition and protection. Heretofore relieved of taxation, the exemption should remain as to that portion of its property actually occupied for educational purposes.

I therefore find, under the facts and the law, that the William Penn Charter School, as to the property belonging to it, situate on the west side of Twelfth street, at the distance of 106 feet south of Market street, containing in front 58 feet and extending in depth 182 feet, with the buildings thereon, is exempt from taxation, and so award.

Messrs. Charles F. Warwick, City Solicitor, and E. Spencer Miller, and Isaac H. Shields, Assistant City Solicitors, for appellant:

Corporate profit excludes the application of the Act of May 14, 1874, as effectually as does individual realization of profit.

It is not proper to exclude the cost of the real estate and plant in estimating whether an income was produced.

Philadelphia v. Pennsylvania Hospital for the Insane, 154 Pa. 9.

But that is not and cannot be the test.

A charity is no less a charity because it makes a charge to the recipients of its bounty.

Donohugh's App. 86 Pa. 306; Northampton County v. Lafayette College, 128 Pa. 147; Philadelphia v. Women's Christian Asso. 125 Pa. 572; Episcopal Academy v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. 565.

The Act of May 14, 1874, provided that "all hospitals, universities, colleges, seminaries, academies, associations, and institutions of learning, benevolence, or charity, with the grounds thereto annexed and necessary for the occupancy and enjoyment of the same, founded, endowed, and maintained by public charity, . . . be and the same are hereby exempted from all and every county, city, borough, bounty, road, school, and poor tax."

This Act is constitutional.

Donohugh's App. 86 Pa. 306; Burd Orphan Asylum v. School Dist. of Upper Darby, 90 Pa. 21.

1. This institution was founded as a charity.

2. This institution has been endowed as a charity.

3. This institution is maintained as a charity.

The test of "maintenance by charity" is not the source of the income of the institution nor the proportion which the income from charitable sources bears in its expenditures to the payments received by it from its beneficiaries.

Donohugh's App. supra; Miller's App. 10 W. N. C. 168; Northampton County v. Lafayette College, 128 Pa. 147; Philadelphia v. Women's Christian Asso. 125 Pa. 572.

Nor can the purpose for which the funds of the institution are expended at any particular time be the test.

Philadelphia v. Women's Christian Asso. and Miller's App. supra; Thiel College v. Mercer County, 101 Pa. 580.

The fact that the number of those who can at any time enjoy the benefit of the charity is limited, is immaterial.

Burd Orphan Asylum v. School Dist. of Upper Darby, supra.

The true test to determine whether an institution "founded and endowed" by charity continues to be "maintained" by it, is whether the governing body of the institution still derives its power from the original charitable foundation and endowment, and is carrying on the institution in pursuance of the original scheme.

Where it does not clearly appear from the charter that the institution is, by its organic law, a charity, its history and practice may be inquired into for the purpose of determining its character, and, in that event, the source of its income becomes, like any other piece of evidence, a matter for consideration.

Hunter's App. 22 W. N. C. 861; Philadelphia v. Women's Christian Asso. 125 Pa. 572; Episcopal Academy v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. 565.

When, however, the institution is, by its organic law, a charity, and when it continues to be carried on by the instrumentality devised by the original donors for the purpose, and by authority of the original charter and without any purpose of private gain, it is impossible to say that it is not maintained by charity.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Philadelphia sought to enforce a lien for registered taxes against lots 8 and 10, on west side of Twelfth street, south of Market, having thereon erected two three-story brick buildings, used for school purposes. The property is owned by the defendant, a very ancient corporation, dating its original grants back to William Penn. These grants, of 1701, 1708, and 1711 defined the object of them to be the establishment and maintenance of a public school, wherein the children of the rich might be educated at reasonable rates, and the poor gratuitously; the school to be under the care and management of a board of overseers. The school was kept up from the date of its foundation until the year 1874, when it had run down to very few pupils. The corporation at this time having an income from investments, these, to a considerable amount, were put into the present property, and additional money borrowed on mortgage. The present lots and buildings represent a total cost of $75,721.12. In 1874 the overseers made a contract with Richard M. Jones, as head master, which stipulated the corporation would furnish the buildings, furniture, school apparatus, fuel, and repairs, while it should receive one eighth of the gross receipts for tuition, including in this estimate the tuition fees of such poor children as were educated gratuitously at the expense of the corporation; the head master to receive seven eighths of all the receipts, and pay thereout the salaries of all subordinate teachers; the teachers selected to be subject to the approval of the overseers. It was further guaranteed, the head master's compensation should not be less than $2,000; if, in any year, there was a deficiency, it should be made up from the funds of the corporation. The overseers receive no compensation for their time or services. Bequests and legacies, since the school was established, have been made to it, from which it derived an annual average income of about $3,800. Under the management of head master Jones, the school has enjoyed almost phenomenal prosperity. Soon after he took charge, in 1876, the number of pupils was fifty-two. Of these, forty-one were paying students, and eleven free. Six years afterwards they numbered 185, of whom twenty were free. In 1892 the number reached 359, of whom sixteen were free. The amount received from pay scholars this year is not given, probably because at the date of the hearing the accounts for that year had not been summarized; but in the year previous (1891), when the whole number was 300, of whom fifteen were free, the receipts from pay scholars, for tuition alone, were $48,606.85. In addition to this there was a moderate profit on books and stationery furnished; also, on refectory charges and diploma fees. Master Jones' portion of the receipts for this year was, net, $12,633.55, and the balance in favor of the overseers was $3,406.24. There having been an increase of forty-three pay scholars and one free scholar the following year, the share of the head master must have been considerably greater.

There is no doubt the institution, in its foundation, was, so far as pupils were taught free, a charity school, and although its operations prior to 1874 and 1875 are not shown, probably, up to that time, it was carried on as originally founded. But at that date, the undisputed testimony is, it was incapable of survival on its ancient foundation and methods of management. It had but seventeen free pupils to be educated from a fund worth probably more than $60,000. Obviously, in a large city like Philadelphia, neither the benevolent intentions of the founder, nor the desires of those who had charge of the school, were being accomplished. The results were in no way commensurate with the scope of the project, nor even with the means provided for carrying it out. This, evidently, was the alternative which then presented itself to the overseers: The school must be put on a paying basis, or must stop. Although this conclusion is not distinctly stated in these words by any witness, a fair consideration of the testimony of head master Jones, overseers Thomas Wister Brown, James Whitall, and clerk Edward Bettle shows that it was practically the one at which they arrived, and doubtless, too, a correct one. They then, instead of persisting in the old way, which at best gave a sickly existence to a small school, wisely resolved to adopt a new plan, which would make it self-supporting, greatly increase the number of pupils, and thereby enlarge its usefulness. A new location for the school was adopted; larger and more commodious buildings erected. A contract was made, as the event showed, with a most capable head master. His energy and efficiency were stimulated by a provision whereby his money receipts, in a large degree, depended on the success of the school. In other words, the school was to be made to pay, and it did pay. But, by the new method, was there any promotion of the charity element, which was one of the two objects of the founder? When master Jones, in 1874, first took charge, there were seventeen boys in the school. There are now 360. But the number of free scholars was, in some years, less than the original seventeen. The highest number in any one year was twenty-six; the last and most prosperous year, only sixteen. As enjoined by the charter, children were to be "admitted, taught, and instructed, the rich at reasonable rates, and the poor to be maintained and schooled for nothing." The rates paid by those able to pay, or the "rich," in 1876, the second year, amounted to $5,410.17. Fifteen years afterwards, in 1891, the same class of patrons paid $54,890.98. As a result of this progress, we look to see the corresponding benefit to the poor, who were to be taught for nothing, and we find, in the first-mentioned year, eleven pupils of this class were taught in the last-named year, fifteen, an increase of but four. The income has increased about 1,000 per cent; the free scholars, not 30 per cent. Success has not been in the line of the charity, but in the building up of a live, efficient school for those able to pay.

It seems to us, this school is a business enterprise. That the benefit from its success is largely gathered from those whom the founder termed the "rich," and by the head master, Mr. Jones, instead of by the corporation, is significant of its character. He receives seven eighths of the income; the corporation, one eighth,—the latter furnishing the building, fuel, and lights. For tuition of the free scholars it pays, at fixed rates, out of its income raised from the foundation, endowments, and legacies. In substance, the corporation leases its property to master Jones for one eighth of the gross receipts from all the pupils for tuition. If the corporation contracted with a private school for the tuition of ten or fifteen pupils annually, and paid this out of the income from the charity funds, or from the rents of real estate in which the funds were invested, such private school would not, as an institution of purely public charity, be exempt from taxation. When lots are purchased and buildings erected, and these, practically, let as an educational venture, for a rental equal to one eighth of the gross receipts, to an individual, the corporation paying to him, from the charity fund, tuition fees for the instruction of the free pupils, certainly the property is not a purely public charity. The school thus established and carried on has not the elements of a public charity. It is a purely educational enterprise under the control of, and carried on by, an individual in direct competition with other private schools which last are rigorously taxed. The head master does not want pupils who do not pay their rates. He admits none who do not. The small number who do not themselves pay are paid for by the corporation.

We have no word of dissent from the entirely commendable sentiment of the learned referee, approved by the court below, when he says: "It may now be said that educational institutions of a distinctly non-sectarian character, conducted solely for the benefit of the public, without any element of private gain, relieving the state from taxation, and extending knowledge to some who would otherwise not be able to obtain it, are institutions of a purely charitable nature, and exempt from taxation." The trouble in the application of this sentiment to the case in hand is that it does not fit the facts as found by the referee. This institution is not conducted solely for the benefit of the public, any more than is the street passenger railway conducted for the benefit of the public. Those of the public who can pay can ride. Here, those of the public who can pay tuition fees are benefited by an education, just as they might be benefited in many other excellent private schools in Philadelphia, where exemption from taxation is not thought of. Nor is this institution without an element of private gain. We doubt if there be anywhere else in the land, in a school of like grade, an educator in receipt of a salary equal to the $1,000 per month received in 1891 by master Jones as his share of the profits in this enterprise; for this last is clearly what it is, notwithstanding this share is denominated "salary" in the argument. By no stretch of construction can it be so denominated in the instrument, which reads thus: "The corporation to provide the building, furniture, school apparatus, fuel, and repairs, and to receive one eighth the gross receipts, including in the estimate of receipts the tuition fees of such poor children as may be schooled at the expense of the corporation; the head master to receive the remaining seven eighths, and pay thereout the salaries of all his subordinates, and all expenses pertaining to conducting the school, other than are hereinafter mentioned as chargeable to the corporation. The assistant teachers to be selected by him, and appointed, subject to the approval of the overseers; and that he be guaranteed that his net income from the school shall not fall below $2,000 in any school year; the deficiency, if any, to be made up from the educational funds of the corporation." The head master is to have all the profits on seven eighths of the gross receipts, whether $5,000 or $50,000, with a guaranty that these profits shall in no case fall below $2,000. This is a business project, wherein the returns from capital and professional acquirements depend on good fortune and good management, just as in other business ventures.

Nor does the school relieve the state from taxation. Under authority from the state, the municipality of Philadelphia, by taxation, provides for the education of every child within its limits, and this burden is in no appreciable degree lightened by the establishment of private schools. The charity had its foundation when no such complete and beneficent system of education as that created by the commonwealth had an existence, or was dreamed of by William Penn. If such a system had been in operation in the small town on the Delaware in 1708, or if at that time he had had reason to anticipate such an one would be adopted in the future, it is probable his benevolence would have taken some other direction. At this day, when the city raises, by taxation, and expends, sufficient money to educate every child, rich and poor, the private school in no sensible degree relieves the public burden. If it be exempted from taxation, the public burden is increased by imposition of the exempted tax upon others who share not in the gain from the private enterprise. It may be properly said, of the managers and head master of this school, when its methods had fallen behind the times, and, in its struggle alongside the public school, its life had almost ended, they, by wisdom and energy, infused into it a new life; have made it highly prosperous, and not only prosperous, but highly beneficial to all who are able to pay for its privileges; but this does not make it purely charitable. The 848 pay scholars of 1892, who paid nearly $50,000 for their tuition, would hardly take that view. We certainly do not.

None of the cases cited by the referee reach the facts of this case. The rule applied in Miller's App., 10 W. N. C. 168; Thiel College v. Mercer County, 101 Pa. 580, and Hunter's App. (Pa.) 22 W. N. C. 861,—is the one applicable here. In this last case it is said: "The academy is maintained from the income derived from such property as has been given to or purchased by it, and from fees for tuition, which are at a much lower rate than institutions of a like grade. . . . It was incumbent on appellees to show that the institution under their care is at least substantially maintained by public or private charity. This has not been done. On the contrary, it may be fairly inferred that its chief source of maintenance is and has been tuition fees. If so, it cannot, in the constitutional sense, be regarded as an institution of purely public charity."

The judgment is reversed, and judgment is now entered for the city of Philadelphia and against defendants, on the facts found by the referee.

Annie O'CONNOR, Admr., etc., of John O'Connor,

v.
John CLARK, Appt.

(170 Pa. 313.)

The owner of a wagon, who permits the name and occupation of another person who is in possession of it to be painted thereon for the purpose of inducing the public to believe that it belongs to and is used by the latter in his business, cannot assert ownership against an innocent purchaser from the person who had it and whose name was on it.

(October 7, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Philadelphia County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of a certain horse and wagon. Reversed.

John O'Connor was engaged in the business of keeping wagons for hire; one of his employes named George Tracy was given one of the wagons to use in doing a cartage business and upon it were placed the words, George Tracy, Piano Mover. Tracy sold the horse and wagon to defendant after defendant had required him to identify himself as the George Tracy whose name was on the vehicle.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. John H. Fow, for appellant:

There are circumstances in this case which take it out of the general rule and estop the representative of the decedent from contesting the right of a bona fide purchaser from Tracy.

It comes under that exception referred to in Lecky v. M'Dermott, 8 Serg. & R. 500, where it is said: "M'Dermott, who delivered the goods in question to the wagoner, was guilty of no imprudence, nor held out any false colors by which the world might be deceived."

While it is the rule that this principle does not apply in the case of a bailor (Miller Piano Co. v. Parker, 155 Pa. 208), yet it does apply when the bailor, master, consignor, or owner has, by his own imprudence, or holding out in false colors, aided in deceiving the bona fide purchaser.

Miller v. Browaraky, supra; Lecky v. M'Dermott, 8 Serg. & R. 500; Rapp v. Palmer, 3 Watts, 180.

Mr. J. Edward Carpenter, for appellee:

The defendant purchased the horse, wagon, and harness from a drunken man at a price so low as to have been ample notice to a purchaser that he was not dealing with the owner.

Tracy was the mere agent of the plaintiff, no property passed by delivery to him, and unless the possession was fraudulent and intended for colorable purposes it was not liable to sale by him.

Sterrett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If there is nothing more in this case than the facts recited by the learned trial judge in the excerpt from his charge quoted in the first specification of error, the instructions therein given to the jury to find for the plaintiff if they believed the testimony would be substantially correct. The only facts of which this instruction is predicated are, (1) that the wagon in question was the property of John O'Connor, the original plaintiff; and (2) that Tracy, without his permission, took it, and sold it, or attempted to sell it, to the defendant as his own. But these are not the only facts of which there was evidence before the jury. On defendant's behalf, it is contended that the testimony tended to prove, and the jury, if they had been permitted, would have been warranted in finding, that defendant purchased the property in question from Tracy in the honest belief that he was in fact the owner thereof; that the name and occupation of Tracy—viz., "George Tracy, Piano Mover"—were on the wagon when he offered it for sale, and that fact was referred to as indicating his ownership of the property, etc.; that, Tracy being a stranger, defendant was specially careful to inquire and inform himself that the person who was in possession of and offering to sell the wagon was the George Tracy whose name and occupation were painted thereon; that Tracy's name and occupation were put upon the wagon with the knowledge of O'Connor, the original plaintiff, and himself, and by direction of the former, for the purpose of creating the impression and inducing the public to believe that the property belonged to Tracy, and was being used by him in his business as a piano mover, in which he had theretofore been engaged. Without attempting to summarize the testimony relied on by the defendant, it is sufficient to say that it tends to prove substantially the state of facts above outlined, and especially that the original plaintiff, for his own gain and benefit, was a party to the arrangement whereby Tracy's name was put on the wagon for the purpose of misleading the public into the belief that the property was his, and that defendant, acting with due caution and in good faith, was thus misled as to the ownership of the property, and purchased the same from Tracy.

While the soundness of the general rule of law that a vendee of personal property takes only such title or interest as his vendor has and is authorized to transfer cannot for a moment be doubted, it is not without its recognized exceptions. One of these is where the owner has so acted with reference to his property as to invest another with such evidence of ownership, or apparent authority to deal with and dispose of it, as is calculated to mislead, and does mislead, a good-faith purchaser for value. In such cases the principle of estoppel applies, and declares that the apparent title or authority, for the existence of which the actual owner was responsible, shall be regarded as the real title or authority, at least so far as persons acting on the apparent title or authority, and parting with value, are concerned. Strictly speaking, this is merely a special application of the broad equitable rule that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer loss by reason of the fraud or deceit of another, the loss should fall upon him by whose act or omission the wrongdoer has been enabled to commit the fraud. Assuming, in this case, that a jury, under the evidence, should find—as we think they would be warranted in doing—that such marks of ownership were placed on the property by direction of O'Connor, the real owner, as were not only calculated to deceive, but actually intended to deceive, the public, and that by reason thereof, and without any fraud or negligence on his part, the defendant was misled into the belief that Tracy was the real owner, and he accordingly bought and paid him for the property, can there be any doubt, as between the real owner and the innocent purchaser, that the loss should fall upon the former by whose act Tracy was enabled to thus fraudulently sell and receive the price of the property? We think not. In Barnard v. Campbell, 53 N. Y. 456, 53 N. Y. 73, 17 Am. Rep. 208,—a well-considered case, involving substantially the same principle,—it was held that to create an estoppel by which an owner is prevented from asserting title to and is deprived of his property by the act of a third person without his assent, two things must concur: "(1) The owner must have clothed the person assuming to dispose of the property with the apparent title to or authority to dispose of it. (2) The person alleging the estoppel must have acted and parted with value upon the faith of such apparent ownership or authority, so that he will be the loser if the appearances to which he trusted are not real."

Without further consideration of the questions involved, we think the testimony to which reference has been made tended to prove facts which if found by the jury would have brought the case within the principle of estoppel above stated, and that the learned judge, by the instructions above complained of, virtually withdrew the effect of that testimony from the consideration of the jury. In defendant's second point he was requested to charge: "If the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate allowed Tracy to put his name on the wagon, and made no effort to efface it, and thereby allowed the defendant to be misled, their verdict must be for the defendant." This was refused, with the remark that he had already instructed them that their verdict ought to be for the plaintiff in the event of their believing the testimony.

It follows from what has been said that the first and third specifications should be sustained. The second specification is dismissed. As presented, defendant was not entitled to an affirmance of the point therein recited.

Judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT,

DENVER CITY R. CO.

City of DENVER.

(.....Colo.....)

1. A city whose charter provides therefor may collect a license imposed by it on street-cars by enforcing a penalty for failure to pay for the license.

2. Taxes imposed as a privilege on a street-car company are not within Const., art. 10, § 3, requiring "all taxes" to be uniform on the same class of subjects.

NOTE.—On the question of the effect of the constitutional requirement of uniformity in taxation as applied to licenses, see also State v. Moore (N. C.) 22 L. R. A. 472.

(July 1, 1895.)

CROSS writs of error to the Court of Appeals to review a judgment modifying a judgment of the District Court for Arapahoe County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enjoin the enforcement of the collection of a license tax which had been imposed upon plaintiff's cars. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wolcott & Vaile and Henry F. May, for plaintiff:

A license is issued under the police power, but the exaction of a license fee with a view to revenue would be the exercise of the power of taxation, and the charter must plainly show the intent to confer that power, or the municipal corporation cannot assume it.

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 244, *201; New York v. Second Ave. R. Co. 83 N. Y. 261; State v. Hoboken, 41 N. J. L. 71.

Where doubt exists as to the construction of a charter, that doubt should be resolved against the corporation claiming the power, and this rule applies to municipal corporations.

Plaintiff company exists and operates its cars under a territorial charter granted to it before the constitution of the state of Colorado was adopted.

This charter was a contract, and the obligation thereof cannot be impaired by any subsequent legislation, whether by ordinance, statute, or even the adoption of the constitution.

Having full authority to construct and operate its street horse-car lines, it needed neither permission nor the grant of any privilege from the city of Denver, because that right had been granted to it by the legislature.

New York v. Second Ave. R. Co. and State v. Hoboken, supra.

The power to license necessarily implies the power to prohibit, and the city of Denver clearly has no right to prohibit.

A tax cannot be collected by calling it a license and enforcing a penalty for the failure to pay for the license.

Messrs. F. A. Williams, City Atty., Greeley W. Whitford, and Allen B. Seaman, for defendant:

All rights are held subject to the police power.

Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 82, 24 L. ed. 991; Southwark R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 47 Pa. 821.

If the grant of power to a municipality is simply to "license and regulate," the license fee exacted under such a grant of power could be no more than an amount sufficient to reimburse the city, and if the sum exacted goes beyond that, and manifestly so, then it is an attempt to raise revenue by means of licenses and is referable to the power of taxation.

Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. p. 598.

It is impossible to estimate the cost to the city of Denver in regulating the street-cars of the plaintiff in error, and a court of equity cannot and will not inquire into the manner of exercising this discretion granted to the city council, unless it is plainly and manifestly abused.

Braun v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 196; Howland v. Chicago, 108 Ill. 501.

Goddard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 3d day of October, 1889, the Denver City Railway Company instituted this action to restrain the city of Denver and its officers from prosecuting cases against it and its employes for operating its horse-cars in violation of a certain ordinance of the city, adopted in 1886 and amended in 1888, which provides, inter alia, as follows:

"SECTION 1. It shall be unlawful for any person or persons to hire out, keep or use for hire, or cause to be kept or used for hire, for the carrying or conveying of persons, or run on established lines within the city limits of the city of Denver, any hackney coach, cab, omnibus, express wagon, herdic coach, street-car, vehicle or vehicles, carriage or carriages of any description or name whatsoever, without a license first had and obtained so to do."

"SECTION 14. There shall be charged and paid to the city treasurer for the use of the city of Denver, on issuing the said licenses, by the parties to whom they may be granted, the following sums: . . . Second. For all omnibuses and accommodation coaches, herdic coaches, and street-cars running upon established lines and at stated periods, from place to place within the city, shall be charged for license, each, the sum of $10 per annum."

By section 14 as amended in 1888 the license fee for each car was increased from $10 to $25 per annum. The company averred its willingness to pay a fee of $10, as it had theretofore done, but refused to pay the sum of $25, on the ground that the latter is unreasonable, and in excess of the amount necessary to pay the expenses of police regulation, and is in fact a tax upon its property, and hence unlawful and void. The evidence introduced upon the trial of the cause is not preserved by a bill of exceptions, but the court below made the following findings: "(1) That the license for police regulation does not, under the testimony offered, justify a greater license than $17.50 per car, as heretofore found, but that the wording of the city charter gives the city the right to tax, as well as to license, for police regulation, and that the charter of the plaintiff company, approved January 10, 1867, in no way exempts it from paying such tax. (2) That the city council having the power to assess said tax at the sum of $25 per car, and having elected to do so, that the same is legal. (3) That the temporary injunction heretofore issued in this cause should be dissolved, at the cost of the plaintiff." To the judgment dissolving the temporary injunction and dismissing the action, the company and the city prosecuted writs of error from the court of appeals. That court, in an elaborate opinion, reported in 2 Colo. App. 84, reversed the court below upon its finding that the city was empowered to tax, as well as to license for police regulation, but affirmed its judgment of dismissal upon the ground that the record was devoid of any showing that the sum of $25 was an unreasonable charge for police regulation. Both parties, being dissatisfied with this judgment, bring the case here for review.

The company insists that the finding of the court below that the testimony offered did not justify a charge of $25 for police regulation is conclusive as to its right to maintain the action, under the doctrine announced by the court of appeals,—that the city is not authorized to assess a license tax. The city, on the contrary, contends that the court of appeals erred in holding that the ordinance could not be upheld as a legitimate exercise of its power to tax the business of running street-railway cars.

In the view we take of these respective contentions, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the validity of the ordinance as a police regulation, or to determine whether, upon the record, the finding of the court below is conclusive upon the fact that $25 exceeds the necessary and legitimate expense of issuing the license and providing police supervision. And in this regard, if the court of appeals was correct in holding that the finding of the court below was not an authoritative finding of fact, based upon the evidence, but the result of personal observation only, and hence not conclusive upon this review, we fully concur in the conclusions reached by the learned writer of that opinion,—that "this court cannot interpose its opinion, and guess at a cost of administration, nor take the judgment of the court below, as against the judgment of the city council," and, without sufficient data or evidence, pronounce the ordinance unreasonable as a police regulation.

But upon the more important, and, as we regard it, the decisive, question in the case,—“whether the city, under its charter, has the power to tax, as well as to license and regulate, the business of the railway company,—we are unable to concur with either the reasoning or the conclusion of the court of appeals. That taxation is clearly a legislative prerogative, and may be conferred upon a municipality, by that branch of the government, in such measure and for such purpose as it may deem expedient, so long as it observes the limitations and restraints of the organic law, is not questioned or denied. Nor do we understand that the language of the charter of 1885, which, in express terms, confers upon the city of Denver power, “exclusively, to license, regulate, and tax any or all lawful occupations,” etc., is held to be insufficient to authorize the city to impose the tax in question, if such grant of power is not inhibited by our state constitution. But it is asserted that the charter provision, in so far as it attempts to confer the power to tax, is in conflict with section 3, article 10, which provides: “All taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and shall be levied and collected under general laws, which shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, real and personal.” In this we think the court of appeals is in error. It seems to be almost universally accepted that this and like constitutional provisions refer to the levy of ad valorem taxes upon property, and do not apply to taxation imposed on privileges and occupations. Sedgw. Stat. &

Const. L. 2d ed. 504-507, referring to similar provisions contained in the constitutions of various states, says: "In construing these provisions it has been held, in many of the states, that the words 'equal and uniform' apply only to a direct tax on property; and that the clause in regard to uniformity of taxation does not limit the power of the legislature as to the objects of taxation, but is only intended to prevent an arbitrary taxation of property, according to kind or quality, without regard to value. Specific taxes have therefore been sustained as a valid exercise of the legislative power." Burroughs on Taxation, § 54, referring to the same subject, says: "These provisions, as a general rule, are held to apply to property alone, and not to include taxation on privileges or occupations." Among the numerous decisions to the same effect, see Newton v. Atchison, 31 Kan. 151, 47 Am. Rep. 486; Ex parte Robinson, 12 Nev. 268, 28 Am. Rep. 794; Walcott v. People, 17 Mich. 68; 1 Desty, Taxn. p. 191, § 36; San José v. San José & S. O. R. Co., 53 Cal. 478; Ex parte Mirande, 78 Cal. 385; Sawyer v. Alton, 4 Ill. 129; Marmet v. State, 45 Ohio St. 63; Com. v. Moore, 25 Gratt. 951; American Union Exp. Co. v. St. Joseph, 66 Mo. 675, 27 Am. Rep. 882; St. Louis v. Green, 7 Mo. App. 468; Davis v. Macon, 64 Ga. 128, 37 Am. Rep. 60. In the latter case the court had under consideration an ordinance enacted by the city of Macon providing that, among others, retail butchers should pay a license of $50 per annum, and that further imposed a tax of $25 upon each wagon used in their business. The contention there was that the ordinance was violative of the constitutional requirement that all taxes shall be uniform, and upon this point Justice Bleckley, speaking for the court, says: "It is insisted further that by the tax upon the wagon, the ad valorem principle of the constitution is violated. This objection proceeds upon the theory that the wagon is mere property, and subject only to state and county taxes, . . . which taxes have been duly assessed and paid. The complainants contend that having paid all taxes on the value of the wagon as property with which they are chargeable, they cannot be required to pay an additional specific tax to the city upon the same property. But, as already stated, the tax now in question is not a property tax, but a business tax; the wagon is treated as an instrument used in carrying on the business of the complainants within the city, and it has been ruled, and no doubt rightly ruled, that the number and kind of vehicles may be regarded in measuring a tax of this description. . . . That the complainants are in no default to the state and county in respect to taxes upon the value of the wagon as property, is no protection to them against the business tax now demanded." We quote thus fully because of the similarity of that case in principle with the one at bar, and because the language of the learned justice is pertinent to the contention of counsel for the company in this case. In the case of St. Louis v. Green, supra, the court had under consideration the validity of an ordinance imposing a tax upon wagons used in the streets of St. Louis for purposes of traffic and for private purposes. The validity of the ordinance was attacked upon the ground that it was in derogation of a like provision of the constitution of Missouri; and, in an elaborate argument upholding the validity of the ordinance, Judge Bakewell, who delivered the opinion of the court, used this language: "The constitutional provision that all property subject to taxation in the state shall be taxed according to its value is undoubtedly binding upon the legislative body when it exercises the taxing power; but this provision is not violated when, as in the case at bar, the tax is not a tax precisely upon the object itself, but rather upon the exercise of the civil right of using that object. . . . And though imposed for revenue, and not for police purposes at all, it is a tax of the nature of a license, because it is a permission to do that which, after the passage of the ordinance, it became unlawful to do without having obtained the permission." The pertinency of this decision to the question we have under consideration is found in the fact that the tax therein upheld was imposed upon vehicles subject also to taxation as property, and in the further fact that the grant of power in the charter of the city of St. Louis was identical with that in the charter of the city of Denver, to wit, "to license, regulate, and tax," etc. This case, on appeal to the supreme court, was affirmed in all particulars, except the holding of the court of appeals to the effect that the ordinance was invalid in so far as it authorized the conviction for a misdemeanor, and punishment by fine. The case of Palmer v. Way, 6 Colo. 106, is relied on by the learned writer of the opinion of the court of appeals as announcing a different doctrine; and the case of Wilson v. Chilcott, 12 Colo. 600, accepting the doctrine therein laid down as stare decisis, is cited therewith in support of the conclusion reached in that opinion. But since its rendition those cases have been expressly overruled by this court in the case of Denver v. Knowles, 17 Colo. 204, 17 L. R. A. 135, as being "against the strong current of authority." And the rule announced in the latter case, in so far as it has any application to the question before us, is in conformity with the views herein expressed. It is clear from the foregoing that the imposition of a tax upon occupations is not governed by the rule of uniformity prescribed in article 10, section 3, of the State Constitution, and neither expressly nor by implication is the legislature inhibited thereby from conferring upon the city the power to exact such a tax. And our conclusion is that the legislature having, in express terms, conferred upon the city the power to tax, as well as to license and regulate, the enactment of the ordinance under consideration was a legitimate exercise of that power, and the charge for license therein provided may be enforced as a valid tax.

It is further contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that, if the tax be valid, the ordinance cannot be enforced in the manner provided; that it must be collected as other taxes, and not by enforcing a penalty for failure to pay for the license. We cannot give our assent to this proposition. Section 21, article 2, of the city charter provides: "The city council shall have power to make all ordinances which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers specified in this act, . . . and to enforce the same by appropriate fines, imprisonment, or other penalties." In St. Louis v. Sternberg, 69 Mo. 289, Norton, J., speaking to this point, said: "Such ordinances have been uniformly upheld when brought to the attention of this court." In support of the power of municipal corporations to recover fines and penalties against persons not complying with similar ordinances, he cites, Cincinnati v. Buckingham, 10 Ohio, 257; Shelton v. Mobile, 80 Ala. 540, 68 Am.

Dec. 148; Vandine, Petitioner, 6 Pick. 187, 17 Am. Dec. 351; Chilvers v. People, 11 Mich. 48,—and adds: "This is not a proceeding on the part of the city to collect the amount of license required by the ordinance, but it is instituted to recover a fine for breach of it committed by defendant, in practicing law without such license; and, although he may be subjected to the payment of the fine, he would not thereby be entitled to the license."

We are therefore of the opinion that the trial court was correct in holding that the city had the right to exact the sum claimed as a license tax, under the terms of its charter, and upon this ground its judgment should be sustained; and the judgment of the Court of Appeals affirming the dismissal of the action is affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

John PETERSON et al., Appts.,

v.

William RUSSELL, Resp't

(.....Minn.....)

*1. When one not a party to a negotiable note, after it has been delivered to and while it is in the hands of the payee, indorses it in blank upon a valid consideration, for the purpose of assuming the liability of guarantor, such act authorizes the payee to write over the signature the contract of guaranty in full; and, that being done, it is a sufficient note or memorandum in writing to take the case out of the statute of frauds.

2. Nicholas & S. Co. v. Dedrick, to the effect that the extension of the time of payment of a past-due note is a sufficient consideration to support a promise to pay it, followed.

(October 15, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from an order of the District Court for Marshall County denying a new trial after verdict for defendant in an action brought to enforce the guaranty of a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Brown & Carr, for appellants:

Defendant signed his name in blank on the back of the note (then past due) for the purpose and with the intention of guaranteeing the payment of the same, in consideration of the time of payment being extended to a future date; having placed his name there for that purpose, it authorized plaintiffs to write over it in full the guaranty, or whatever other contract was entered into, and this was a sufficient note or memorandum to take the case out of the statute of frauds, and as soon as the Oral evidence is not admissible to vary the terms of a written agreement, but indorsements are a peculiar class of contracts, and that rule does not extend to contracts which are raised from implication by operation of law, such as indorsements in blank.

A regular indorsement is an indorsement to which the law attaches a certain and distinct liability.

Leavering v. Washington, supra; Peckham v. Gilman, 7 Minn. 446.

An irregular indorsement is where a name appears on the back of a note in such a position that it is a matter of uncertainty and ambiguity as to what sort of a liability the party who thus placed his name there intended to assume.

In this class of indorsements parol evidence is admissible to explain and bring to light the actual contract that was entered into.

Mr. A. C. Wilkinson, for respondent:

Under our statute of frauds, the contract is one by which the defendant assumes to pay the debt of another, and must be in writing together with the consideration therefor, plainly expressed, or the same is void and no action can be maintained thereon.

In Nelson v. Dubois, 13 Johns. 175, it was held that such a writing might be made at any time before the trial, but this case was directly overruled in Hall v. Newcomb, 3 Hill, 233, 7 Hill, 416, 42 Am. Dec. 82.

Campbell v. Butler, 14 Johns. 349, was also overruled in Hall v. Newcomb, supra.

The practice, then, of writing contracts, even where the indorsement of a name was made upon the note at the time or near about the time of its inception has been discountenanced by the courts.

Start, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to charge the defendant as guarantor of the payment of a negotiable promissory note. Upon the trial the plaintiffs offered evidence, and then rested, tending to establish the following state of facts: That on May 4, 1892, Thomas Connors made and delivered to the plaintiffs his note whereby he promised to pay to them or order on November 1, 1892, $145. After the maturity of the note, and on March 31, 1893, the defendant agreed with the payees of the note, the plaintiffs, in consideration of their extending the time of its payment to December 15, 1893, to guarantee the payment of the note, and in execution of his agreement he signed his name on the back of the note in blank, and it was returned to the plaintiffs' agent, and they, by such agent, signed a memorandum on the back of the note in these words: "In consideration of Mr. William Russell indorsing this note, payment of the same is hereby extended until Dec. 15th, 1893." On January 29, 1894, the defendant refusing to pay the balance then due on the note, the plaintiffs, by their attorney, overwrote the defendant's signature with the formal contract of guaranty, in these words: "March 31st, 1893. In consideration of the time of the payment of the within note being extended until Dec. 15th, 1893, I hereby guarantee payment of this note,"—and brought this action on such guaranty. Whether the defendant's agreement was to guarantee the note or to indorse it, in the strict sense of the term, is an open question upon plaintiffs' own evidence, but it was sufficient to warrant a finding by the jury that the contract was to guarantee the payment. The trial court dismissed the action, when the plaintiffs rested, exception by them, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial this appeal was taken.

1. What was the legal liability assumed by the defendant by signing his name in blank upon the back of this note, pursuant to his oral agreement to guarantee its payment? This is practically the only question in this case. It is perfectly manifest that by this irregular indorsement he intended to become responsible to the payees for its payment, in some capacity, as maker, indorser, or guarantor. What liability one who is not a party to a negotiable instrument otherwise than by his indorsement of it, and who is in no manner connected with the title to it or its transfer, assumes by signing his name in blank upon the back thereof, is a question upon which there is much confusion and weighty conflict in the adjudged cases. They cannot be harmonized, and we shall not attempt any analysis of them. In some states, notably in Massachusetts, the question has been put at rest by a statute to the effect that in all such cases, whether his name is placed upon the paper before its delivery to the payee or afterwards, the party shall be charged only as an indorser. This is a certain, practical, and desirable rule; and, if it had been adopted by the courts when the question first arose, it would have saved litigation and some lying. But we cannot now adopt the rule without disregarding well-settled principles and resorting to judicial legislation. The position of the name of such a party upon the paper is in itself one of ambiguity. It is an irregular indorsement, and does not, without parol evidence as to when the indorsement was made and its purpose, indicate the relation of the indorser to the paper or the parties to it. He is not strictly an indorser, for the paper is not negotiated or title made through his indorsement; hence there is a pretty general agreement of the authorities that parol evidence is admissible, as between the original parties, to show the relation of such party to the paper, and to fix his liability as maker, indorser, or guarantor, according to the intention of the parties. Rey v. Simpson, 1 Minn. 380 (Gil. 282), 63 U. S. 22 How. 341, 16 L. ed. 260; Korn v. Von Phul, 7 Minn. 430 (Gil. 841), 82 Am. Dec. 105; Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 90, 24 L. ed. 841; Coulter v. Richmond, 59 N. Y. 479; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 270; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 710, 711. In case of regular indorsements—that is, where the paper is first indorsed by the payee—the law attaches a definite liability to the act, and parol evidence is not admissible to vary it. Knoblauch v. Foglesong, 38 Minn. 352; Harwell v. St. Paul Trust Co. 45 Minn. 495. This rule, however, does not apply to an irregular indorsement, except that this court has held that where it is once shown by parol evidence that the name of an apparent stranger to the paper was signed upon the back of it before its delivery to the payee, to induce its acceptance, he will be held as an original maker, and such evidence is not competent to show that he intended to charge himself as indorser only. Peckham v. Gilman, 7 Minn. 446 (Gil. 355); Robinson v. Bartlett, 11 Minn. 410 (Gil. 802). We have also held that where such an indorsement is made for a valuable consideration, after the delivery of the paper to the payee, but while it is in his hands and before its maturity, and the payee subsequently indorses it to a bona fide holder, the party making the irregular indorsement will, in favor of such holder, be held as an indorser. Buck v. Hutchins, 45 Minn. 270. Except as limited in these cases, the general rule that parol evidence is admissible to ascertain the intention of the parties to an irregular indorsement is in force in this state; and such evidence was properly received in this case to show the actual relation the defendant agreed to and did assume with reference to the note in question.

This leaves only the question of the statute of frauds to be considered. The defendant's contract of guaranty was a collateral one to answer for the debt of another, and must, to enable the plaintiffs to enforce it, be evidenced by a note or memorandum in writing expressing the consideration. The signature of the defendant alone on the back of the note is not sufficient. Moor v. Folsom, 14 Minn. 840 (Gil. 260), 100 Am. Dec. 227. Assuming the facts which the evidence tends to establish, we have a case where the defendant, for a valid consideration, agreed to guarantee the payment of a note then past due, and still in the hands of the payees. His contract excludes the idea that he intended to be held only as an indorser, and, in execution of his contract, he writes his name upon the back of the note, and leaves it with the payees, who overwrite his signature with the actual contract he has made, which satisfies in form the statute of frauds. The question, then, in its last analysis, is one of agency only. The actual contract is proved for the purpose of showing the authority to overwrite the signature. Were the payees authorized to thus overwrite the signature? The question is an open one in this state, although the case of Moor v. Folsom seems to indicate that an affirmative answer should be given to the question, but the opinion expressly disclaims any purpose to so decide. It was a matter of indifference who wrote out the formal contract of guaranty after the minds of the parties had met, the contract made, and the defendant had signed his name on the back of the note. The writing was only the evidence of what the parties had done. The defendant's signature to it was the material thing. He could sign his name in blank, and authorize the payees or any one else to write his contract over his signature. It was not necessary that the authority to do so should be in writing or expressly given, if clearly indicated by his acts.

In the light of the law and commercial usage, there can be but one reasonable inference to be drawn from the defendant's act in delivering his blank indorsement to the payees in execution of his contract of guaranty. Such act was authority to them to write over his signature anything that was consistent with his undertaking to guarantee the paper.

We are of the opinion upon principle and authority, and so decide, that where one not a party to a negotiable note, after it has been delivered to and while it is in the hands of the payee, indorses it in blank, upon a valid consideration, for the purpose of assuming the liability of a guarantor, such act authorizes the payee to write over the signature the contract of guaranty in full, and, that being done, it is a sufficient note or memorandum in writing to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Beckwith v. Angell, 6 Conn. 315; Ulen v. Kittredge, 7 Mass. 233; Tenney v. Prince, 4 Pick. 385, 16 Am. Dec. 347; Webster v. Cobb, 17 Ill. 459; Chaddock v. Vanness, 85 N. J. L. 517; Harding v. Waters, 6 Lea, 324; 1 Brandt, Suretyship, § 176, and notes; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 270. Such was the rule in the state of New York at one time, and it is still the law of that state that, where the paper is not negotiable, the holder may overwrite the indorser's name with a contract of guaranty or that of a maker, according to the intention of the parties. Richards v. Warring, 1 Keyes, 576; Cromwell v. Hewitt, 40 N. Y. 491, 100 Am. Dec. 527.

2. It is urged by defendant that there was no valid consideration for his contract. The consideration was the extension of the time of payment of a past-due note. This was a sufficient consideration to support the guaranty. Nichols & S. Co. v. Dedrick (Minn.) 68 N. W. Rep. 1110.

3. The defendant also claims that he was discharged by the delay of the plaintiffs in enforcing collection against the maker of the note,—citing Crane v. Wheeler, 48 Minn. 207. The case is not in point, for the guaranty in that case was the collection of the note; here the payment of the note was guaranteed, and mere neglect of the holder to pursue the maker does not discharge the guarantor. Hungerford v. O'Brien, 37 Minn. 306.

It follows that the plaintiffs made a prima facie case, and were entitled to have their case submitted to the jury.

Order reversed, and a new trial granted in full.

Canty, J.:

I concur in the result arrived at in the foregoing opinion, but not in the reasons given for arriving at that result. In my opinion, the doctrine is wholly unsound which holds that one party to a contract within the statute of frauds may constitute the other party his agent to reduce the contract to writing, and thereby take it out of the statute of frauds. The party may authorize his agent to write out the contract or to sign the contract, or both, and the agent's authority need not be in writing, but the agent so authorized must be some one else than the opposite party to the contract. "One rule, however, has been settled, both under the 4th and 17th sections, that neither party can be the other's agent to bind him by signing the memorandum. And it makes no difference that the pretended agent has not himself any beneficial interest in the contract, but stands in a fiduciary relation to third persons, so long as he is, in a legal point of view, the real party to, and the proper one to sue upon the contract." Browne, Stat. Fr. 4th ed. § 867. Any other rule would permit the most palpable evasion of the statute of frauds. But the majority opinion in this case, following the authority of such cases as Ulen v. Kittredge, 7 Mass. 233, and Moor v. Folsom, 14 Minn. 340 (Gil. 260), 100 Am. Dec. 237, is in direct violation of this rule. The case of Hodgkins v. Bond, 1 N. H. 284, long ago repudiated the doctrine of Ulen v. Kittredge, and it seems to me for good reasons.

I am of the opinion that the plaintiffs are not prevented by the statute of frauds from maintaining this action on the contract implied by the blank indorsement, without writing anything over it, and that the alleged guaranty written by plaintiffs over that indorsement does not in any manner change the real character of the contract which the law so implies from the blank indorsement and all the extrinsic facts appearing from the evidence received on the trial, and that, therefore, this guaranty so written over the defendant's signature is immaterial, and does not defeat a recovery in this action; that the real contract is the same as the one pleaded; and that there is no variance between the pleading and proof. It is true that defendant did not indorse the note at the time it was made, and before it was delivered, or as a part of the original transaction in which the note was made and delivered, but on the face of the instrument, unexplained, he appeared to have done so; that is, after defendant had so indorsed the note in blank, and before plaintiffs' agent had so written the guaranty over the signature, it appeared to be the signature of a joint maker, who signed his name on the back of the note before it was delivered. Such a blank indorsement of an irregular indorser, appearing on the back of a promissory note unexplained, is presumed to have been made at the time the note was made, and before delivery, so as to constitute the signer a joint maker. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 718. In People's Bank v. Howes (Minn.) 61 N. W. Rep. 457, we held that, where a party signs his name on the back of a negotiable instrument, "the law says that the parties intended to bind themselves by the relations thus apparently assumed;" and 29 L. R. A.

this principle runs all through the law merchant. The indorsement does not on its face appear to be within the statute of frauds, as it appears to be one of the signatures to an instrument which under the law merchant imports consideration. If such an instrument does not on its face appear to be within the statute of frauds, it cannot by parol evidence be brought within that statute. While there are few adjudications directly on the point, it has long been the prevailing opinion that the statute of frauds was not intended to restrict the law merchant. See 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 567. In the case of Nichols & S. Co. v. Dedrick (Minn.) 63 N. W. Rep. 1110, this court took that position. To hold otherwise would be to repeal much of the law merchant so far as it applies to persons signing and indorsing negotiable instruments, who are in fact mere sureties. Instruments under seal also import a consideration, and it has always been held that this rule of law has not been repealed or affected by the statute of frauds. 1 Brandt, Suretyship, 2d ed. § 82. To hold otherwise would be to destroy the liability of every surety on almost every bond, as such bonds seldom express or recite the consideration for the promise of the surety. The books often speak of original and collateral sureties and guarantors, but, as observed by Kent (3 Com. 123), "there is no such word in the statute of frauds as 'original' and 'collateral.'" If the agreement is to answer for a debt or default which is wholly that of another, it is within the statute, the only difference being that the original consideration will support the surety's promise made as a part of the original transaction, while it takes a new consideration to support his subsequent promise.

If, instead of signing his name on the back of this note, the defendant had signed his name on the face of it, under that of Connors, the principal debtor, he would, on the face of the instrument, appear to be an original joint maker of the note. Could he, in that case, avoid his liability by showing that he was not in fact an original maker of the note, but that he in fact signed it several months after it came due? Certainly not. This proof would go to show that he was a mere guarantor, and not an original joint maker, and that the original consideration for the note was not the consideration for his promise; but, if there was in fact a new consideration for his promise, he would still be liable. This evidence would not bring his promise within the statute of frauds. The same rule would apply if he had made, signed, and delivered to the order of plaintiffs his own promissory note, several months after it appeared on its face to be due, of the same date as the original note, and as collateral security for the same debt. He could not avoid his liability on this note by showing that he was in fact a mere guarantor of the antecedent debt of Connors, if there were in fact a new consideration for his undertaking. The statute of frauds would cut no figure in the case. Now, it seems to me that, as far as the statute of frauds is concerned, the case at bar stands on the same footing as it would if defendant had taken either one of these two methods to secure plaintiffs, instead of the method he has taken. If he had signed his name at the foot of the original note under that of Connors, or had made his own note of the same date and terms as the original note, instead of signing his name on the back of that original note, he would in either case appear to be an original maker, and so he does in the case at bar. He can no more avail himself of the statute of frauds in the present case than he could if he had taken either of the other two methods to secure plaintiffs. This rule would not apply in the case of Moor v. Folsom, 14 Minn. 340 (Gil. 260), 100 Am. Dec. 227, as in that case the indorser wrote over his signature the date of his signing, so that it affirmatively appeared by the instrument itself that he was not an original maker. I know of no principle on which the indorser in that case should have been held liable, as it also affirmatively appeared by the instrument itself that he was an irregular indorser, through whom the note had never passed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

R. M. PATTILLO, Plff. in Err.,

W. I. ALEXANDER.

(.....Ga.....)

*1. In a suit upon a contract made and to be executed in the state of Tennessee, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, this court will presume that the rules of the common law prevail there.

2. According to the rules of the common law, the indorser of a promissory note is entitled to have the same duly presented for payment, and on a failure or refusal to pay he is entitled to notice; and a failure of the holder to present for payment, or to give notice of non-payment, discharges the indorser from liability.

3. Where, upon a promissory note executed and payable in the state of Tennessee to a named payee, or order, and containing no stipulation for the payment of attorney's fees, suit was brought by a holder against the payee, who had indorsed upon the note the following undertaking, signed by him: "I guarantee attorney's fees up to 10 per cent if this note has to be collected by law, on (and?) its prompt payment,"—there being no other indorsement of the paper by the payee;—Held, that by the terms of this agreement, it having been made for the purpose and in the course of negotiation, the payee became and was an indorser thereof, and liable as such, with a superadded liability for such reasonable sums, not exceeding 10 per cent, as might be expended for attorney's fees by the holder in the collection of the note. Held, further, that in order to bind the payee for the payment of the note, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove presentment and notice of nonpayment. Held, further, that, in order to charge the payee with the payment of attorney's fees, it must appear that in the effort to recover from the maker the sums due on the note the holder had incurred a liability or had expended for attorney's fees the amount sought to be recovered from the payee, not exceeding 10 per cent of the debt due.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Bartow County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce an alleged guaranty of the collection of a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. W. Atkin for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. J. B. Conyers and Graham T. Holtzclaw for defendant in error.

Atkinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Except as controlling those matters which are so essentially local in their nature as to be at all times the subject of special statutory regulation, and which, by reason of this peculiar characteristic, are embraced within the term "local idiosyncrasies" of the law, the rules of the common law have been adopted in most of the states of the Union; and the property rights of the citizens of such states have been adjusted with reference to, and the laws governing the same administered in accordance with, its doctrines. This is the reason of the rule that, as to such matters concerning which there is no such recognized variance between the laws of another state and that law which is the common source of all our jurisprudence as will afford to the courts of different states a basis for judicial cognizance of such difference, the courts of one state will presume, in the construction of contracts executed and to be performed in another, that the rules of the common law prevail there, and will determine the rights of litigants accordingly. This is a salutary rule, and one which has been adopted in this state (see Woodruff v. Saul, 70 Ga. 271), and is one of such general acceptance as to be recognized by the courts of last resort in most of the states of the Union. 1 Whart. Ev. §§ 814 et seq.; Rape v. Heaton, 9 Wis. 328, 76 Am. Dec. 269; Sherill v. Hopkins, 1 Cow. 108; Monroe v. Douglass, 5 N. Y. 447; Brimhall v. Van Campen, 8 Minn. 18 (Gil. 1), 82 Am. Dec. 118; Newton v. Cocks, 10 Ark. 169; Seaborn v. Henry, 30 Ark. 469; Martin v. Hazard Powder Co. 2 Colo. 596; Johnson v. Chambers, 12 Ind. 102; McAnally v. O'Neal, 56 Ala. 299.

2. The contract of the indorser is not that he will at all events pay a bill which he has by the act of his indorsement transferred to another, but his agreement, by the common law, is to pay upon demand by the holder upon the drawer, and notice of nonpayment or of dishonor to him. The rule which requires notice to the indorser of nonpayment, as a prerequisite to his liability, is based upon the implied undertaking of the indorsee that he will use due diligence in the prosecution of his demand against the maker; that he will present the paper for payment immediately upon its maturity, and will not, by his negligence, expose the indorser to a hazard of loss, against which he, in case of notice of dishonor, might be able otherwise to protect himself. And, if he fail to perform this duty to give timely notice of nonpayment, the law presumes injury to the indorser, and discharges him. A formal protest for nonpayment, though now, in this and many other states, required by statute, in certain cases, was not necessary by the law merchant, save only as to foreign bills of exchange; and as the present case involves only the application of the rules of the law merchant to the contract now under consideration, formal protest for nonpayment was not necessary here in order to bind the indorser. Protest was deemed necessary only as a certain and simple means of proving presentment of the paper, and the fact that the same was dishonored, and the rule requiring it was applicable only to foreign bills of exchange; and as we have seen, except where required by statute, this formality is not requisite in order to bind an indorser. Notice to him of nonpayment, however, is nevertheless indispensable, as that is one of the conditions upon which he becomes liable upon his contract of indorsement. The time within which such notice was to be given was not fixed by any unvarying rule, under the common law. It was only requisite that demand be made immediately upon maturity of the paper, and that notice of nonpayment should be given within a reasonable time; and a reasonable time would depend to a great extent upon the means of transportation, and the facilities existing at the point where the paper was presented for payment for the transmission of that class of intelligence. In most of the states of the Union, by adjudged cases, where no statute prescribes the time within which notice shall be given, the term "reasonable time" has been defined with such certainty and precision as to afford almost a fixed rule upon that subject. This case being referable to common-law principles for its solution, as to whether or not this indorser received notice at all, and, if so, whether he received it within a reasonable time, taking into consideration the means of communication between the places where the paper was presented for payment and the residence of the indorser, would, if at all doubtful, present questions of fact for a jury, it being borne in mind that notice itself was indispensable to his liability. Chitty, Bills, *448; Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 970, 971, 1085 et seq. But where the matter of fact, in the very nature of things, is not doubtful, the court may adjudge, as a matter of law, that in the particular case the notice is not given within such a time as legally to impose a liability upon the indorser. Of course, no rule can be framed by which it can be stated, as a matter of law, within what time, generally, a notice of nonpayment must be given in order to bind an indorser, for that would depend upon the particular facts of each case; but where the facts are undisputed, and the time allowed to elapse is manifestly unreasonable, it may be pronounced with perfect confidence that in a certain case the notice was not timely given. The question then becomes one of law, and not of fact, and the court may and should pronounce thereon without submitting it to a jury. Whitaker v. Morrison, 1 Fla. 29, 44 Am. Dec. 627; Van Hoesen v. Van Alstyne, 8 Wend. 75; Sice v. Cunningham, 1 Cow. 897; [Tindal v. Brown], 1 T. R. 167; Furman v. Haskin, 2 Cal. 366. In the present case, according to the evidence in the record, some four months elapsed after the note became due before it was presented for payment, and half a month more elapsed before notice of nonpayment was given. Surely, in this day of fast mails, instant communication by telegraph, and other equally effective means for transmitting intelligence, it can be with certainty said that a delay of four and one-half months in giving notice of nonpayment upon a demand which should have been made, both maker and indorser living in populous cities, between which there is daily communication by telegraph and by mail, with a distance of not more than 100 miles intervening, is unreasonable, as a matter of law. The trial judge should have so directed the jury, and if they, though not so instructed, found to the contrary, the verdict was wrong.

8. The note sued upon in this case was executed in the state of Tennessee, and was made payable to the order of the present defendant, at the city of Chattanooga, in said state. Upon it the defendant made the following indorsement: "I guarantee attorney's fees up to 10 per cent if this note has to be collected by law, on (and?) its prompt payment. [Signed] R. M. Patillo." Afterwards, suit was brought by the plaintiff, as the holder, upon this note, against the payee alone, upon this indorsement, as a contract of guaranty; and the defendant answered that, if liable at all, his liability was that of an indorser, and not as a guarantor merely, and, the holder having failed to demand payment promptly at maturity and give him notice of dishonor, he was therefore discharged. The court ruled the contract of the payee not to be one of indorsement, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff. In order to determine the liability of the payee to the holder,—he being the only person against whom this action is brought,—it is necessary to inquire what is his true relation to this paper, according to the understanding and intention of the parties at the time. The note passed into the hands of the plaintiff, who was the immediate indorsee. In arriving at the intention of the parties, it is competent, necessary, and proper to inquire somewhat into the history of the transaction out of which this indorsement of this paper grew. The original maker had delivered the paper to the payee, and by the payee it had been negotiated, or was in process of negotiation, to the present holder. It was necessary, in order to invest the holder of this paper with such a title thereto as would enable him to demand its payment of the maker, that there should be an assignment of the payee's interest to the holder. This might have been accomplished by an ordinary assignment, without liability over upon account of the paper to the holder at all, or it might have been accomplished by an indorsement by the payee, either in blank, or to this holder. A simple indorsement by the payee of his name upon the paper would have served the double purpose, both of transferring the title to the holder, and of charging the payee with the obligation to pay in the event the maker upon presentation declined to honor it. Such an indorsement would have served to have fixed absolutely the liability of the indorser for the amount of the note. In the contemplated contract and plan of negotiation there was another element of risk, not provided for in the note, and against which the purchaser desired to protect himself; and there was therefore in contemplation of the parties a necessity for some guaranty beyond the point of mere redemption of the note in the event it was dishonored. The purchaser did not desire to incur the expense of a collection by law, and the note itself containing no stipulation for the payment of attorney's fees, in order to protect the holder against possible expense on that account, it was necessary in some way to charge the indorser with the superadded obligation to pay attorney's fees; and hence the form of indorsement employed by them. Negotiation and transfer of title were as much the object designed to be accomplished by the parties to this transaction as was the guaranty of ultimate redemption by the maker. To accomplish the fact of negotiation, and to effectuate this primary purpose, it was necessary to treat this entry upon the back of this note as an indorsement; otherwise, there was nothing which gave to the holder the right to demand payment of the maker. If, independently of this indorsement, there had been another simple indorsement by the payee upon the back of this paper, this simple indorsement would have had the effect to transfer the title to the paper, and, in addition, would have bound the payee to the same obligation under which he is now held, save only as to the attorney's fees; and such a condition of affairs might have afforded some ground for treating the indorsement now under consideration as a contract of guaranty only. Treating this indorsement as a guaranty only for the prompt payment of the note at its maturity, it would impose no greater obligation upon the payee than would a simple contract of indorsement; for the effect of a simple contract of indorsement is to transfer the title to the paper, and give, in addition, an implied guaranty of the solvency of the maker. The form of words employed in making this contract is not specially important, except in so far as it serves to throw light upon the nature of the undertaking upon the part of the payee who signed it. It is the purpose designed to be accomplished, and which is legally accomplished by the fact of indorsement, which must at last determine the nature and character of the contract. The effect of indorsement upon a promissory note in the form employed by the parties to this transaction, made by one not a party to the paper, might be an entirely different thing than when employed by the payee, who designs to guarantee, not only the solvency of the maker, but likewise to transfer the title. In the former case,—that is, in the case of a stranger to the paper,—such a contract would import nothing more than a contract of guaranty, for the reason that he would have no title which he could transfer, and therefore the only object which he could legally accomplish by making such indorsement would be to guarantee the solvency of the maker. But in the case of the payee, who in the delivery of the paper may have a dual purpose to accomplish, and in a case where, in the course of the negotiation of the paper, and as a part of the transaction which resulted in a complete change of ownership, that interpretation is the more natural one which gives to this entry such force as an indorsement as will serve, not only to transfer by that act the title, but at the same time guarantee the solvency of the maker, with an enlarged and extended liability, resulting from the special guaranty of attorney's fees. Such a construction gives effect to every word contained in the special indorsement, and at the same time gives full expression to the intention of the parties, as manifested by the whole history of this transaction. This guaranty of attorney's fees was, as we have seen, necessary, or deemed such by the holder, as the ordinary contract of indorsement—the note itself not stipulating for the payment of attorney's fees—would not bind the payee, in the event of default, to the payment of expenses of collection, whereas, aside from this guaranty, the mere indorsement would otherwise fully bind the payee. Whatever seeming ambiguity may be involved in the terms "on" or "and" its prompt payment is instantly dispelled upon a careful analysis of the words employed in this special indorsement. The contract of guaranty imposed in this indorsement, by its very terms, whether read "on" or read "and" its prompt payment, committed the payee only to the payment of attorney's fees; the guaranty being to pay attorney's fees up to 10 per cent if the note had to be collected by law, and its prompt payment. In the mere act of transferring the title, treating this as an indorsement, the payee had already guaranteed the prompt payment of the note at its maturity; and therefore there was nothing upon which the words "on its prompt payment" or "and its prompt payment," could operate, save only upon the payment of attorney's fees. It could not have been designed to guarantee attorney's fees up to 10 per cent "if this note has to be collected by law, on its prompt payment," because, if the note were promptly paid according to its tenor, it could not be collected by law; and therefore the words "on [if the doubtful word be so read] its prompt payment" cannot be construed to apply to the prompt payment of the note, for such a construction would impute to the parties a purpose to provide against a contingency which by no possibility could arise. Therefore, to give effect to the guaranty at all, the word must be read "and;" and the effect of this construction is to guarantee the prompt payment of the 10 per cent attorney's fees in the event the note had to be collected by law.

The question then arises, Does the word "and," as employed, operate to extend the contract of guaranty to the note, or is it confined in its operation to the attorney's fees only? The use of the words "and its prompt payment," instead of "on its prompt payment," could not be applied to the note, because such a guaranty would be wholly superfluous; for if, in the act of negotiation, the payee, aside from the special contract with respect to the prompt payment of the note, binds himself to the prompt payment of the note, it were idle to say that the words "and its prompt payment" were used with reference to the note itself, for by the act of indorsement, which involves, not only the physical act of signing his name, but delivery for the purpose of negotiation, being already bound to the payment of the note, and not bound to the prompt payment of attorney's fees, the words "and its prompt payment" must of necessity refer to the payment of attorney's fees, and not to the note. The evident object of this guaranty was to embody in the indorsement a feature of liability which would not inhere in the simple contract of indorsement itself; but the fact that the independent guaranty of attorney's fees accompanies the indorsement of the paper does not in any sense militate against the fact of indorsement. The contract of indorsement is not consummated by the mere signing of one's name upon the back of the paper. This is one of the constituent elements of a contract of indorsement, but, in addition to this, there must be a delivery of the paper. The contract consists partly of the written indorsement, partly of the delivery of the bill to the indorsee, and may also consist partly of a mutual understanding with which the delivery was made by the indorser and received by the indorsee. Byles, Bills, 154. Let us test the effect of this paper by another illustration: It will be admitted that title in a chose in action is necessary to authorize the holder to maintain an action thereon against another. Suppose, instead of this being an action against the indorser of this paper to bind him as a guarantor or indorser upon this contract of indorsement, the action had been by the holder (suing in his own name) against the maker of this paper. Suppose the maker had objected to its introduction in evidence upon the ground that it was made payable to a named payee, and had not been by him indorsed so as to vest title in the holder. It would have been competent to establish the contract of indorsement, and the consequent assignment of the title of this paper to the holder, by showing the actual signing of the indorsement now under consideration, and by showing, in addition thereto, that this contract was made in the course of the negotiation of this paper, and that in pursuance of its negotiation, under this indorsement, the paper was actually delivered by the payee to the present holder. The fact of delivery would have to be proven by extrinsic testimony. It might be presumed from the possession of the holder, but the purpose for which the delivery was made could likewise be established by parol evidence. There could be little doubt, under such circumstances, that, for the purpose of a transfer of title, this indorsement would have been held to be an indorsement by the payee. Upham v. Prince, 12 Mass. 14; Blakely v. Grant, 6 Mass. 386; Myrick v. Haasey, 37 Me. 9, 46 Am. Dec. 533. As another illustration, let us suppose that, instead of having sued the payee upon this paper as upon a promissory note, the plaintiff had sued him specifically as an indorser thereon, but in the same action with the maker, and in the county of the latter's residence, if within this state; and let us suppose that the payee had filed a plea to the jurisdiction, setting up that he was not an indorser upon the paper. It would have been competent for the holder of the paper to have established his liability as an indorser, and the consequent jurisdiction of the court, by showing that the payee, being the owner of this paper, made this indorsement in the course of its negotiation for the purpose of passing the title, and, in pursuance of this contract, delivered the same to the holder. Proof of the purpose for which he signed it, and that the delivery was made in order to effectuate the purpose to transfer the title, would bind him as an indorser. The plaintiff in the present case brings this action upon this promissory note and this alleged contract of guaranty, without undertaking to state distinctly how or wherein the payee would be liable to him upon the paper. There is no possible theory upon which, upon the paper itself, the defendant could be liable to the plaintiff except upon the theory that this alleged guaranty by the payee was really operative as a contract of indorsement. If the promissory note in question had been delivered in pledge, merely as collateral security to a main obligation, and had been by the payee indorsed in the form here under discussion, there would have been great force in the assumption that this was a mere guaranty by the payee of the solvency of the maker of this note; for, if not intending to negotiate it at all, but merely to deliver it in pledge, this guaranty had been made, it would not have had the effect to pass the title, but merely to guarantee the solvency of the maker of the note, and if, as ancillary to a suit for the recovery of the main debt, this action had been brought against this payee as a guarantor, this entry could not be treated as an indorsement of the paper, because the delivery in pledge is entirely consistent with the form of indorsement here employed, and, upon proof that by the act of delivery it was not assigned to negotiate the paper, the idea of a design to enter into the technical contract of indorsement would be rebutted. Thus, at last, we see that the intention of the party, as manifested in the act of delivery, is the real key to the solution of whatever legal difficulties may surround the construction of this contract.

This discussion has proceeded, of course, upon the idea that this controversy is at first hand,—it is between the original parties to this transaction. The nature of the indorsement may be explained, as between these parties, by showing the purpose of the delivery. If the controversy had arisen upon a paper which was by its own terms negotiable, or which by subsequent indorsement in blank by the payee had been thus rendered negotiable, and upon such a paper this special indorsement had been entered by a holder other than the payee, and the issue had been thus between such an indorser, or an original payee of a paper negotiable by delivery only, and an innocent third party, different rules would prevail. To negotiation of a paper not by its own terms negotiable, indorsement or assignment is absolutely essential, and a contract of guaranty merely of the solvency of the maker could not amount either to an assignment or indorsement. The payee or a subsequent indorsee alone can enter into the technical contract of indorsement, because they in succession alone have power to transfer or assign the paper; but any person may guarantee the solvency of the maker, and be liable as a guarantor. In Geiser Mfg. Co. v. Jones, 90 Ga. 307, Chief Justice Bleckley uses this significant language, in dealing with a case in which the following indorsement was made upon the note sued upon by a person other than a party to the contract: "For a consideration not herein named, we guarantee the payment of this claim" to the Geiser Manufacturing Company. In discussing this the chief justice says: "Had the Geiser Manufacturing Company, the payee of these notes, signed a contract upon them with a third person, in the terms of that placed thereon by Jones & Toll [who were the third persons making the indorsement], and had afterwards negotiated them to a third person, the Geiser Company could, under our law, be sued and made answerable as indorsers." He cites, as authority for this proposition, Vaneant v. Arnold, 81 Ga. 210. In the latter case it was held by this court that, notwithstanding a superadded obligation in some respects similar to the one under consideration in this case, a contract of indorsement was nevertheless complete. It has been questioned somewhat whether the view here presented as to the character of the contract made by this indorsement is not in conflict with the view taken by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Central Trust Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 68, 25 L. ed. 876. It will be seen upon examination of that case that the indorsement signed by the payee was intended as a simple guaranty of the solvency of the maker. It was not the form of indorsement usually employed in the transfer of negotiable paper in strictly commercial transactions, and this guaranty by the payee itself indicates that the trust company discounted it, not upon the faith of the credit of the original maker, but upon the faith of the guaranty alone. The form of the contract of guaranty, accompanied by a delivery thereunder, would of itself serve to charge the trust company with notice of any defenses the maker might have had, and thus take it out of the rule which protects innocent purchasers without notice against pre-existing defenses. In order for a transfer or assignment to confer upon an indorsee the benefit of this rule it must be accomplished according to the law merchant; that is, by indorsement. No transfer by any other method accomplishes this result, and the decision now under review is only authority for the proposition that the form of indorsement then under consideration, when employed in the transfer of paper, was not such an indorsement, according to the strict technical significance of that term, as would cut off the defenses of the maker. In that case the question was not whether the trust company was such an indorsee as to acquire a title to the chose in action, but whether, under the form of indorsement employed, it was such an indorsee as to cut off equitable defenses of the maker. So the question in this case is not whether the contract under consideration is such an indorsement, in its strict technical sense, as cuts off defenses of the maker, but whether the payee is such an indorser as entitles him to notice. He may be the latter, and not the former. We think he falls within the latter class. The mere guaranty of a paper does not involve the idea of negotiation nor negotiation necessarily the idea of guaranty, unless the contract of assignment be of such a character as to operate as a guaranty of the solvency of the maker; and the mere fact that the contract of the indorser may contain a stipulation for a guaranty which extends his obligation beyond that of a mere indorser does not affect his legal relation to the paper. Partidge v. Davis, 20 Vt. 499; Deck v. Works, 18 Hun, 266. A contract in the following form indorsed upon a promissory note: "We guarantee payment of this note, waive demand and notice of nonpayment,"—was held to be an indorsement with an enlarged liability. Robinson v. Lair, 31 Iowa, 9. A guaranty indorsed on a note by the payee thereof may operate as well as an indorsement as a guaranty, and may make the party signing liable as an indorser. Green v. Burrows, 47 Mich. 70; Heard v. Dubuque County Bank, 8 Neb. 10, 80 Am. Rep. 811. As between the original parties, in considering the effect of contracts of guaranty, the court will look to all the surrounding circumstances, and will not be necessarily controlled by the use of the word "guaranty," according to its technical acceptance. We think that the principle that a guaranty indorsed on a note by a third person would amount to a contract of guaranty only, while a similar guaranty indorsed on a note by the payee thereof in the course of and for the purpose of negotiation constitutes an indorsement, is sustained by the principle decided in the Geiser Case, supra, and likewise in Tuttle v. Bartholomew, 13 Met. 452. In the case of Prosser v. Luqueser, 4 Hill, 420, 40 Am. Dec. 288, Chancellor Walworth, in the New York court of errors, having under review an indorsement upon a promissory note in the following words: "For value received, I guarantee the payment of the within note, and waive notice of nonpayment,"—held that such guaranty amounted to an indorsement, and that, under a statute authorizing indorsers and makers to be sued in the same action, the action was properly brought against the guarantor as an indorser. In defining the nature of this contract he uses this language: "But a general guaranty like this, upon a note payable to bearer, is in law a general indorsement of the note, with a waiver of the condition precedent of a notice of nonpayment by the drawers. It is true that in the present case the note was not payable to bearer, but there is a stronger reason why the indorsement in the present case should be construed to be a regular contract of indorsement, in a strict commercial sense, inasmuch as, the paper not being negotiable by delivery alone, an indorsement must have been made by the payee in order to transfer the title. In Buck v. Davenport Sav. Bank, 29 Neb. 407, the following words were written upon the back of a negotiable note, and signed by the payee: "Demand, notice, and protest waived, and payment guaranteed." This was held to constitute a valid contract of indorsement by the payee, with an enlarged liability. In other words, this decision simply means that without the guaranty of payment, and waiver of notice and protest, the liability would have been simply that of an indorser in blank,—that is, a liability dependent on demand and notice,—and the waiver of notice of nonpayment served simply to extend the liability of the indorser, by making him liable upon the nonpayment of the paper. To the same effect is Heard v. Dubuque County Bank, 8 Neb. 10, 30 Am. Rep. 811. In the case of Jaffray v. Krauss, 79 Hun, 449, it was held that where a married woman was the payee in a promissory note, and made and signed thereon the following indorsement: "I hereby charge my separate estate with the payment of this note,"—this constituted an indorsement, only, in the strict commercial sense, and, though the effect of the indorsement was likewise to charge her separate estate with the ultimate redemption of the paper, it was nevertheless an indorsement, and that she was entitled to notice of nonpayment, as an indorser, in order to bind her and her separate estate to the payment of the paper. It was insisted in that case that, inasmuch as the indorsement was made to give an additional credit to the transferee of the paper, she became and was thereby only a surety to the maker, and was not, therefore, entitled to notice as an indorser. It will be observed that she was the payee in this paper. The legal title to the promise of the maker was in her. The indorsement was entered for the purpose of negotiating the paper, and that fact gave her her character as indorser. If, on the contrary, she had not been the payee, and the memoranda had been placed there simply for the purpose of strengthening the credit of the maker, her position then would have been that of a guarantor, simply, and she would not have been entitled to notice. The court says: "It is to be observed that the notes were payable to her order, and indorsed by her, as far as the transfer of the notes was concerned, in blank, and she simply made the special provision in order to charge her separate estate. It was clearly intended to be an indorsement by this married woman, and there was no intention upon her part of assuming any other liabilities than any payee, by indorsing a promissory note, usually intends. The payee of a note, who indorses the same for the purpose of giving credit to the maker, does not thereby become a simple surety, although such indorser knows that the indorsement is asked for for the purpose of giving credit to the maker upon the purchase of goods, and that the note will be used for such purpose. That is the whole transaction as alleged in the complaint, and such allegations in no way alter the rights of the defendant, or change the character of her contract." So, in the present case, the note sued upon was made payable to the order of the defendant, and was indorsed by him, as far as the mere transfer of the note was concerned, in blank, and he simply made a special provision in order to charge himself with liability for attorney's fees upon the happening of the contingency therein provided for. This latter undertaking in no way affected his character as an indorser. So far as that element of liability is concerned, it remained unchanged and wholly unaffected by his additional undertaking. Inasmuch, then, as this contract of indorsement was made for the purpose of passing title to this promissory note to the present holder, and was made in the course of its negotiation, the payee's true relation to the paper was that of an indorser; and, in order to bind him to its ultimate redemption, it was necessary for the plaintiff to have shown notice to him of its nonpayment. The refusal of the court to charge to the effect that he was entitled to notice, as an indorser, of nonpayment, was error, and a new trial upon that ground should have been awarded.

In addition to principal and interest, the jury found for the plaintiff a certain amount of attorney's fees. Treating this as a contract of guaranty, and giving to the plaintiff the most favorable view that could be taken of it, this finding was wholly unsupported by the evidence. The contract of this indorser was conditioned to pay attorney's fees, not exceeding 10 per cent, which might be incurred by the holder in the collection of the amount due on the note by law. The record was wholly silent as to any expense incurred, or as to the value of the service of any attorney; and therefore it was absolutely necessary, before the plaintiff could recover upon that account, that he should prove, either that he had incurred a certain amount of expense, and that it was reasonable, and within the limit of 10 per cent, or that the service of an attorney for that purpose, within that limit, was reasonably worth the sum sought to be recovered. There was no proof, nor offer to prove either, and the finding of the jury for attorney's fees was therefore wholly unsupported by the evidence.

We do not deem it necessary or material to inquire further into the commission of any errors alleged as resulting from rulings by the court upon the trial, inasmuch as the main question determined in this case, to the effect that this defendant was an indorser, and entitled to notice, practically disposes of the litigation in his favor.

Judgment reversed.

Re Estate of J. C. RICKER, Deceased.

APPEAL OF William A. CHESSMAN, Executor.

I. Origin, growth, and general statement of the doctrine.

The doctrine of the liability of executors, trustees, etc., for compound interest, is of modern growth. It is based upon the use of the trust fund by the executor or other trustee for his own benefit, and under the earlier English practice he was not held chargeable with interest therefor.

Thus, in Child v. Gibson, 2 Atk. 603 (1743), the court refused to charge an executor with interest upon trust funds used by him, saying that "there never was a case in this court where a master was directed to charge interest upon an executor who makes use of assets come to his hands in the way of his trade."

This case is cited as an example of a long line of cases decided at about the same time and previous thereto. All of them, however, have been overruled by more modern decisions, some of which will be found in this note, but many of which have been omitted as not involving the element of compound interest. And the liability of the executor or other trustees for compound interest in a proper case is well settled in both England and America, all or nearly all of the more modern cases conceding the liability, but turning upon the question as to whether the facts of each particular case bring it within the rule.

There are, however, a few exceptions.

Thus, in Atty-Gen. v. Solly, 2 Sim. 518 (1823) (set forth infra, under heading, IV. c, Use and admixture of trust fund), denying annual rests in a case in which no fraud appeared, the court said that Raphael v. Boehm, 11 Ves. Jr. 92 (1806) (set forth infra, under heading, IV. i, Nonperformance of trusts for accumulation), which is the leading English case upholding the doctrine of liability, was an excepted case, and that it could never understand upon what principle Lord Eldon confirmed the master's report therein.

And in Re McCall's Estate, 1 Ashm. 357 (1830), the previous authorities were reviewed and Schieffelin v. Stewart, 1 Johns. Ch. 620, 7 Am. Dec. 507 (1815), which is a leading American case upholding the same rule, was disapproved and said to find no support in the then present state of the English law, and Raphael v. Boehm, supra, was said to be unsupported by either the previous or subsequent authorities, and the opinion was expressed that the current of authority was strongly against the allowance of compound interest.

And in Dieterich v. Heft, 5 Pa. 37 (1847), it was said that the leading English case of Raphael v. Boehm, supra, has been much questioned in later chancery decisions, and the principle strongly condemned.

And in Re Lawrence, 2 Connoly, 53 (1889), the court refused an allowance of compound interest against a testamentary trustee on a payment which he was ordered to make by a decree, and allowed simple interest, but failed to state the facts upon which the ruling was based.

But in Re Harland's Accounts, 5 Rawle, 323 (1835), the view expressed in Re McCall's Estate, supra, that compound interest can be awarded under no circumstances, at least against an administrator, was disapproved.

Though in Norris's App., 71 Pa. 106 (1872), the court criticized and commented upon the rule laid down in Re Harland's Accounts, supra, that compound interest may be charged in case of gross delinquency, saying that no instance was known in which any man had ever yet paid compound interest by the judgment of a court of the state, and that it is to be noted that they have had a number of such cases before them.

And in Myers v. Myers, 2 McCord, Eq. 214, 13 Am. Dec. 648 (1827), the allowance of compound in-him by the executor of a claim due the estate was improper.

4. The rate of compound interest paid by an executor on funds retained in his hands, which is more than banks would pay for a part of the time, and which has made double the income that could have been obtained by investing the money as directed by the will, will not be increased to the maximum rates at which there is evidence that money could have been loaned, with no allowance for expenses, delays, and failures,—especially where the executor has disbursed more than $50,000 during a long term of years, and his accounts for the whole estate have been found correct in every item, and there is no delinquency or suspicion of fraud on his part.

5. The question of the rate at which executors' commissions should be computed cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

(May 15, 1898.)

APPEAL by the executor from a decree of the District Court for Lewis and Clarke County charging him with certain amounts which it was claimed he should account for as executor of J. C. Ricker, deceased. Reversed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Massena, Bullard and D. S. Wade, for appellant:

The failure to invest in government securities was not malversation or breach of trust. The court had the inherent authority and power to make the order concerning the investment of these funds when it became necessary so to do for the protection or preservation of the funds and the interests of the legatees, or if it became impossible or impracticable to carry out the provisions of the will concerning investments.

Croswell, Exrs. & Admrs. § 439; Schouler, terest against trustees was discussed, and the right to make it affirmed, though in that case it was not interest on interest, but interest on profits, that was allowed.

The doctrine now obtaining in England is generally stated in Penny v. Avison, 3 Jur. N. S. 62 (1856), to be, that more than the usual and established rate of 4 per cent may be charged upon balances due from a trustee, first, when in the opinion of the court the trustee ought to have received a higher rate; second, when he actually had received more; third, when he is presumed to have received more; and fourth, when he is estopped to say that he did not receive more.

And in Jones v. Foxall, 15 Beav. 388, 21 L. J. Ch. 725 (1852), it was said that in some of the cases the court has charged the trustee with annual rests because the trust under which he acted in distinct terms required him to accumulate the fund at compound interest. In other cases the principle seems to have been that the court visits the executor or trustee with an account in the nature of a penalty for his misconduct, where he has, not merely committed a breach of trust, but has himself endeavored to derive, or has actually obtained, some pecuniary advantage from the use of the money of which he has thus obtained possession.

So the American rule, which seems to have been adopted from the more modern English one, is stated generally in Diffenderfer v. Winder, 3 Gill & J. 341 (1831), and Winder v. Diffenderfer, 2 Bland, Ch. 166 (1829), to be that compound interest may be charged when a trustee or holder of money has been directed and undertakes to invest the sum placed in his hands in a way to make it productive, and fails or refuses to do so, and when a trustee has received rents and profits which he should have applied so as to be productive, or toward the maintenance of devisees, but, failing or refusing to do so, retains and uses the money as his own, in a manner to derive profits from it, and he fails to show clearly what these profits were.

And in Wright v. Wright, 2 McCord, Eq. 185 (1827), it was said that compound interest is allowed against executors and other trustees only when the will creating the trust directs the fund to be laid out in a particular way as an accumulating fund, or when he unnecessarily calls in money which is out at interest and accumulating, or employs it in trade, or in some other manner, and refuses or neglects to account.

So in Perkins v. Hollister, 59 Vt. 348 (1887), and in Barney v. Saunders, 57 U. S. 16 How. 535, 14 L. ed. 1047 (1853), it was said that when a trust to invest has been grossly or wilfully neglected, or when the funds have been used by the trustees in their own business, or profits made of which they gave no account, interest is compounded as a punishment or as a measure of damages for undisclosed profits.

II. Principle of the allowance.

Some of the cases, principally those of an earlier date, place the allowance of compound interest against executors, trustees, etc., upon the ground that it is a punishment or penalty for gross neglect, mismanagement, or misconduct in the execution of the trust.

Thus, in Jones v. Foxall, 15 Beav. 388, 21 L. J. Ch. 725 (1852), it was said, in giving a general summary of the doctrine, that the principle seems to have been that the executor or trustee is visited with an account in the nature of a penalty for his misconduct.

And in Saltmarsh v. Barrett, 31 Beav. 340, 8 Jur. N. S. 787, 31 L. J. Ch. 783, 10 Week. Rep. 640, 5 L. T. N. S. 87 (1892), it was said that a charge of 5 per cent with annual rests imposed upon an executor for retaining funds of the estate and investing them in trade, was imposed as a punishment for his conduct.

So in Bryant v. Craig, 12 Ala. 354 (1847), it was said that the charge of compound interest seems to be adopted as a punishment when, from the gross mismanagement of the trustee, it is difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain what the income of the estate would otherwise have been.

And in Thorn v. Garner, 42 Hun. 507 (1866), in which the court refused to charge compound interest for a mere neglect to invest, it was said that it was allowed in cases of gross delinquency, or as a penalty for negligence or wrongdoing, or for some clear violation of trust.

So in Barney v. Saunders, 57 U. S. 16 How. 535, 14 L. ed. 1047 (1853), and Perkins v. Hollister, 59 Vt. 348 (1887), the court placed charges of compound interest in the alternative, as a punishment or as a measure of damages for undisclosed profits, and in place of them.

The overwhelming weight of authority, however, holds the rule that compound interest, or interest computed with periodical rests, is not charged against executors, trustees, etc., for the purpose of punishing them for any intentional wrongdoing, but rather to carry into effect the principle enforced by courts of equity that the trustee shall not be permitted to make any profit from the unauthorized use of the trust fund and to reach the profits thereby realized.

This was the rule laid down and adopted in Miller v. Lux's Estate, 100 Cal. 609 (1893), and substantially the same rule was adopted in Wheeler v. Bolton, 98

Exrs. & Adms. § 835; Twaddell's App. 5 Pa. 17; Lansing v. Lansing, 45 Barb. 182.

Where the trustee has performed, without authority, an act which at the time it was done was obviously for the benefit of all concerned, and which upon proper application would have been ordered, his act will be ratified and held of the same validity as if previously ordered.

Gray v. Lynch, 8 Gill, 405.

The trustee takes upon himself the burden of proving entire bona fides and that there was reasonable ground to believe that the fund would be benefited; and if this can be shown, the courts will sustain his action.

Washington v. Emery, 4 Jones, Eq. 82; Cornioise v. Bourguin, 2 Ga. Dec. 15.

But suppose there had been a breach of trust in not following the will as to investments, what are the consequences? The executor only becomes personally liable for losses, if the investment he made did not equal the investments directed by the will.

See Schouler, Exrs. & Adms. § 329, and note.

In such a case the standard or measure of loss would be what would have been made or realized by the estate or legatees if the directions of the will had been followed. The court will inquire and ascertain the amount due if the will had been followed.

Eq. 498 (1873); Utica Ins. Co. v. Lynch, 11 Paige, 524 (1845); Schieffelin v. Stewart, 1 Johns. Ch. 630, 7 Am. Dec. 507 (1815); Hazard v. Durant, 14 R. I. 25 (1832); Turney v. Williams, 7 Yerg. 173 (1834); Reed v. Timmins, 53 Tex. 84 (1879); Burdick v. Garrick, 14 R. 5 Ch. App. 233, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 839, 18 Week. Rep. 397 (1870); Ex parte Strutt, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 439 (1788).

And in McKnight v. Walsh, Turney v. Williams, Reed v. Timmins, and Burdick v. Garrick, supra, the allowance is said to be made on the principle, either that he has made, or has put himself in such a position as to be presumed to have made, profits to that extent.

And in Hazard v. Durant, supra, because he has either actually or presumably made it or ought to have made it.

So in Cruce v. Cruce, supra, it was said to be charged for the purpose of attaining the actual or presumed gains, and to make certain that nothing of profit or advantage remains to the trustee except perhaps his commissions or compensation.

In Cruce v. Cruce, supra, the court cited several cases holding that a special case must be made out to justify the exaction of compound interest, such as wilful violation of duty, or gross delinquency, and distinguished them saying that it was thought that in most of them the special circumstances were such as disclosed the actual gains to have been equivalent to such compensation, or the conduct of the trustee in withholding or destroying evidence of his gains had left the court at liberty to presume they were fairly represented by such computation.

And in Cannon v. Apperson, 14 Lea, 553 (1885), it was said that an executor or other trustee who has used the trust fund for his own benefit, and thereby made more than simple interest, will be charged with the whole profit, either by charging him with compound interest, or in such other manner as will best carry out the principle of giving the beneficiary all the profits.

And in Utica Ins. Co. v. Lynch, supra, the same rule was applied to a receiver who employed the moneys of the receivership in trade, making more than simple interest.

So in Perrin v. Lepper, supra, it was held that compound interest is awarded by a court of equity only for the purpose of furnishing adequate means of redress when the law fails to do so.

And in Schieffelin v. Stewart, supra, the allowance was said to be made in order to reach profits made when they are not otherwise ascertained.

And in Utica Ins. Co. v. Lynch, supra, it was said that compound interest and computing it with periodical rests merely constitutes a convenient method of charging a trustee with the amount of profits supposed to have been made by him from the use of trust moneys, when the actual amount made beyond simple interest cannot be ascertained.

And in Evertson v. Tappen, 5 Johns. Ch. 497 (1821), holding that compound interest will not be allowed in favor of a trustee, it was said that this mode of computation is sometimes resorted to in order to meet the profits which the trustee may have made out of the trust property and will not disclose.

So in Miller v. Lux's Estate, supra, it was said that where the conventional rate of interest exceeds the statutory rate, the executor should be charged with legal interest compounded annually in order to fully reach the profit realized by him from the use of the trust fund, the rule being intended to secure fidelity in the management of trust estates.

And in Cruce v. Cruce, 81 Mo. 676 (1884), it was said that the order for the accounting of a trustee should be framed with reference to approximating his gains from the use of the trust fund, notwithstanding his failure to disclose his profits, when they are known to the court by means of other evidence, unless they should be less than a prudent management of the fund should have produced.

As trustees are charged with compound interest upon the ground of the presumed gain to them from the use of the trust fund, however, they will not thus be charged when the circumstances forbid the presumption of gain on their part and it appears that they invested the trust fund in good faith, though in violation of the trust, and though the cestui que trust could not be indemnified by a less allowance than compound interest. Ringgold v. Ringgold, 1 Harr. & G. 11, 18 Am. Dec. 260 (1826).

And in Ex parte Strutt, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 439 (1788), an assignee in bankruptcy was held not to be chargeable with interest on moneys retained in his hands at a greater rate than 4 per cent, unless a special case is made for that purpose, as that he had made a greater profit from the money.

And the same rule was applied in charging interest against executors on balances in their hands, in Tebbs v. Carpenter, 1 Madd. 290 (1816).

And in Re Hilliard, 1 Ves. Jr. 90 (1790), it was held that interest at 4 per cent should be allowed against assignees of a bankrupt who have received funds and failed to make a dividend, and if it is established that more was made the rate should be increased.

So in Cannon v. Apperson, 14 Lea, 553 (1885), it was said that simple interest only will be charged against compound interest at the rates fixed in this case for a long series of years will be realized when it is remembered that in loaning money for a long number of years, with the utmost vigilance and care, there are always losses, and always times of depression and stagnation when money cannot be loaned at all.

King v. Talbot, 40 N. Y. 95.

Compound interest will not be charged or allowed as a penalty or to punish the executor or trustee. It is only resorted to as a means to compel the trustee to refund the interest he has actually received or that he is presumed actually to have received.

By what theory or principle is the executor required to pay interest from the very day of his appointment, when he is compelled to hold the funds of the estate in his possession for the an executor or trustee who has used the trust fund, where it is evident that the profit made by him could not have exceeded that amount.

And in Dillman v. Hastings, 144 U. S. 136, 36 L. ed. 578 (1891), it was held that the administrators of a deceased agent who had invested money for his principal should not be held to account for a greater rate of interest than the legal rate on the money invested, in the absence of a special agreement, where it does not appear that they received interest at a higher rate.

See also Gilman v. Gilman, 2 Lans. 1 (1870), set forth infra, IV. 1, under heading, "Nonperformance of trusts for accumulation." And see generally, infra, IV., heading, Grounds for allowance, and its subdivisions.

III. Option to take interest or profits.

It has been intimated that when an executor or other trustee has made profits from the use of the trust fund, such profits should be awarded to the beneficiary instead of interest, at least where the amount can be ascertained, and that interest should only be given when it would be impracticable to ascertain the profits.

Thus, in Montgomerie v. Wauchope, 4 Dow, P. C. 109 (1816), in which an allowance of interest was made against a trustee, curator, and tutor appointed cashier of the trust by his cotrustees, who retained large balances in his hands without investing, a reversal was had and the case was sent back for review so that it might be ascertained if it were the law of Scotland that the allowance should have been of the profit made from the use of the trust fund as contradistinguished from interest, and if so to give opportunity to present that claim to the court.

Montgomerie v. Wauchope, supra, distinguishes Raphael v. Boehm, 11 Ves. Jr. 92 (1806), on the ground that in that case the executors as trustees were bound by the very words of the trust instrument to accumulate the trust fund by laying out the interest from time to time to form capital.

So in Clark's Estate, 53 Cal. 355 (1879), it was held that an executor, who was a farmer who used the trust fund in connection with his own for a number of years in conducting his farming operations, was chargeable with legal interest computed with annual rests, when from the nature of the transaction it would be difficult, if not impracticable, to ascertain what profit was realized from the trust fund.

And in Perrin v. Lepper, 72 Mich. 456 (1883), it was held that where a surviving partner, who is also executor of the deceased partner, converts the entire assets of the firm and most of the individual assets of decedent to his own use, and files a false inventory, and covers up his fraud by false entries and the suppression of books, papers, and documents, and makes large profits which cannot be ascertained because of his manipulation of the books, and persistently evades and resists judicial investigation and claims that nothing is due, and his administrator, after his death without accounting, resists for years all attempts to get at the true state of the firm's books,—the estate will be charged in equity with the amount of capital furnished by the deceased partner, if it can be ascertained with a reasonable degree of certainty, and with such interest in lieu of profits, computed in such manner and at such a rate, as will, in view of all the facts and circumstances, repay what has been lost; and the profits earned may be allowed though greater than compound interest. But in making the allowance the court will take into consideration the consequences of its decree and see to it that an oppressive or unjust result is not reached.

The rule would seem to be well settled, however, that the beneficiary may, in such case, elect, at his option, either to take interest or profits.

Thus in Dooker v. Somea, 2 Myl. & K. 655, 3 L. J. Ch. N. S. 200 (1844), it was held that where a trustee mixes trust funds with his own moneys, and employs both in trade, the cestui que trust may, if he prefers, insist upon having a proportionate share of the profits instead of interest upon the amount of the trust fund so employed, the power of the court not being confined to giving interest at different rates and with or without rests.

And where an administrator invests in securities not approved by the probate court, he may be charged with such amounts of interest or principal as he has actually collected, and with simple interest for the time during which interest was not collected, or, at the option of the heir, with the principal sum invested with interest upon annual balances computed as provided for in the statute with relation to general accounting. Sanderson v. Sanderson, 17 Fla. 320 (1880).

So where a guardian uses the money of his ward in trade, the ward, upon attaining his majority, is entitled to take the profits of the trade, or the principal money with compound interest. Dictum in Gully v. Dunlap, 24 Miss. 410 (1852).

And where executors and trustees have violated their trust by selling out stock and lending the proceeds to their friends upon personal security, charging themselves with the dividends as before, the beneficiaries have an option to have the stock replaced, or their money produced by the sales with interest at 5 per cent or more if more had been purpose of paying the debts until a year from that date?

If a trustee retains balances in his hands which he ought to have invested, or delays for an unreasonable time to invest, or if he mingles the money with his own, or uses it in his private business, he will be liable to pay simple interest at the rate established by law as the legal rate in the absence of special agreements.

And property purchased by a guardian with money of his ward without an order of the probate court for that purpose cannot be taken on execution as that of the guardian, previous to the exercise by the ward of his right to elect to take the property or the purchase price with compound interest. Gully v. Dunlap, supra. See also King v. Talbot, 40 N. Y. 76 (1869), 50 Barb. 453 (1867), and Sanderson v. Sanderson, 17 Fla. 320 (1880), set forth infra, IV. f., under heading, Improper investment.

It has been held, however, that the choice of the beneficiary extends only to an election between simple interest and profits.

Thus, in Ex parte Strutt, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 439 (1788), it was held that when the assignee of a bankrupt who has retained the moneys of the estate in his hands is sought to be charged with interest thereon, either 4 per cent must be taken, or an inquiry must be had as to what profit he made of the money, and the result of that inquiry abided by.

And in Norris's App., 71 Pa. 106 (1872), it was held that an executor cannot be charged compound interest upon moneys of the estate in his hands, under Pennsylvania Act of March 29, 1832, section 17, providing that the amount of interest to be paid in all cases by executors, administrators, and guardians shall be determined by the orphan's court under all the circumstances of the case, but shall not in any case exceed the legal rate of interest for the time being, but he may be held for more than compound interest by a surcharge of profits, where he has used the money of the estate.

But it is to be observed that, in the latter case at least, the ruling was the result of the statutory enactment.

Cestui que trust have not the option, however, to charge their trustees, who were directed by the testator to invest the trust fund in parliamentary stocks, or funds, or on real estate securities, but failed to make either investment, with the moneys which would have been produced if the moneys had been invested in the funds, but are only entitled to have the trust fund replaced with interest at 4 per cent. Robinson v. Robinson, 1 DeG. M. & G. 247, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 111, 16 Jur. 255 (1851).

And an administrator, who is charged with interest on annual balances, cannot be charged with interest on the interest he has made and returned. The distributees must elect between the two methods of accounting, and are precluded by a choice of the ordinary one. Massey v. Massey, 2 Hill, Eq. 492 (1836).

IV. Grounds for allowance.

a. Generally.

The question as to what constitutes a sufficient ground for the imposition of a charge of compound interest against an executor or other trustee has given rise to such a number of apparently conflicting, and sometimes almost irreconcilable, decisions, many of which were made without stating their grounds or noticing conflicting ones, as to render it difficult to bring the subject within anything like general rules, or to locate any defined boundaries within which the liability is to be confined.

Indeed it has been frequently stated that there is no general rule as to liability to pay interest on trust funds, and that each case must depend upon its own peculiar circumstances. Granberry v. Granberry, 1 Wash. (Va.) 246, 1 Am. Dec. 555 (1793); Morgan v. Morgan, 4 Dem. 353 (1886); Jones v. Foxall, 15 Beav. 888, 21 L. J. Ch. 725 (1852); Clark v. Anderson, 10 Bush, 99 (1873); Perkins v. Hollister, 59 Vt. 343 (1887).

A large discretion seems to have been exercised by the court with regard to the facts and circumstances attending each particular case, and it is to this discretion that the obscurity in discovering the principle is to be attributed. Dictum in Jones v. Foxall, supra.

Though the discretion of a court of equity to allow or not to allow interest against executors is a legal one governed and controlled by fixed principles of law. Jones v. Ward, 10 Yerr. 180 (1836).

For a discussion of these questions, see the following subdivisions.

It is thought, however, that the fact that the liability is based upon the existence of several elements explains much of the apparent inconsistency, many of the cases turning upon the question of the existence of one or more of the elements, and the existence or non-existence of the others being conceded, they are passed unnoticed.

When a statute is enacted on the subject, it becomes, of course, a mere matter of statutory construction.

Thus, interest will be compounded against a trustee after January 1, 1864, under Georgia Act of January 1, 1848, fixing the rate of interest to be charged against guardians, executors, and administrators already appointed and qualified, on trust funds in their hands at the rate of 7 per cent without compounding for the first six years, and thereafter at the rate of 6 per cent compounded annually, where the trustee had been previously appointed, though it was a case for simple interest only under the previous rule. Cartledge v. Cutliff, 21 Ga. 1 (1857).

And a guardian qualifying in 1880, in Georgia, is not affected by the temporary legislation on the subject of compound interest which took place pending the war, as the first six years of his term

The executor should not be charged with interest for the year upon the funds that had not expired when that legislation ceased to operate. McCullough v. Johnson, 61 Ga. 554 (1878).

The rule for computing interest against trustees under that act, who were such at the time of its passage, is 7 per cent per annum for the first six years after January 1, 1848, without compounding, and afterwards 6 per cent per annum compounded annually. Royston v. Royston, 29 Ga. 82 (1856).

Other statutes are referred to in different divisions of this subject.

b. Misconduct or gross delinquency generally.

The rule seems to be well settled that, except, perhaps, under particular statutory provisions, and in case of trusts for accumulation, executors, trustees, etc., will only be charged with compound interest when they have been guilty of some positive misconduct or wilful violation or omission of duty. Wheeler v. Bolton, 32 Cal. 159 (1891); Powell v. Powell, 10 Ala. 900 (1846); Ackerman v. Emott, 4 Barb. 628 (1849); Garniss v. Gardiner, 1 Edw. Ch. 128 (1832); Bennett v. Cook, 5 Thomp. & C. 138, 2 Hun, 580 (1874); Freeman v. Freeman, 4 Redf. 211 (1880); Uglov's Estate, 2 Redf. 312 (1876); Thorn v. Garner, 42 Hun, 507 (1896); Tucker v. McDermott, 3 Redf. 312 (1876); Re Guardianship of Thurston, 37 Wis. 104 (1883).

Or gross delinquency or such gross negligence as to be evidence of a corrupt intention. Smith v. Kennard, 38 Ala. 606 (1863); Fall v. Simmons, 6 Ga. 265 (1849); Ackerman v. Emott, supra; Clarkson v. DePeyster, Hopk. Ch. 424 (1825); Freeman v. Freeman, Uglov's Estate, Thorn v. Garner, and Tucker v. McDermott, supra.

And that, where the omission of the trustee is due to simple negligence without any actual intent to cheat or defraud, simple interest alone is allowed. Adams v. Lambert, 80 Cal. 426 (1890); Bryant v. Craig, 12 Ala. 354 (1847); Smith v. Kennard, 38 Ala. 606 (1863); Wilmerding v. McKesson, 103 N. Y. 829 (1890); Butler v. Jarvis, 61 Hun, 248 (1890); Garniss v. Gardiner and Bennett v. Cook, supra; Dieterich v. Heft, 5 Pa. 87 (1847).

But that if the omission or violation is wilful compound interest is allowed. Adams v. Lambert, 80 Cal. 426 (1890); Hughes v. People, 111 Ill. 457 (1885); King v. Talbot, 40 N. Y. 76 (1890); Butler v. Jarvis, 61 Hun, 248 (1890).

And where he is guilty of fraud or of such gross neglect in the execution of his trust as to be evidence of a corrupt intention, he may be charged with compound interest. Bryant v. Craig and Smith v. Kennard, supra; Childress v. Childress, 49 Ala. 287 (1878); Calhoun v. Calhoun, 41 Ala. 369 (1867); Crump v. Gerock, 40 Miss. 765 (1886); Torbet v. McReynolds, 4 Humph. 215 (1843).

The line of distinction is drawn on the difference between mere negligence and malfeasance. Bryant v. Craig, supra; Lukens's App. 7 Watts & S. 48 (1844); Williams v. Powell, 15 Beav. 461, 16 Jur. 398 (1852).

Thus in Jones v. Ward, 10 Yerg. 160 (1836), it was said that the acts of malfeasance, which will render an executor or administrator liable for interest, are such acts of negligent or wrong administration as will disappoint the claimants in the assets.

And in King v. Talbot, 40 N. Y. 76 (1890), it was said that when the failure of a trustee in his duty is wilful or characterized by bad faith, the highest rate of interest should be imposed. But when good faith and honest mistake concur, the rate of interest rests in a discretion that permits the consideration of all the circumstances which go to show that substantial justice can be done to the cestui que trust by allowing a less rate.

So in Alvis v. Oglesby, 37 Tenn. 172 (1888), it was said that nothing but very culpable conduct will justify the compounding of interest against an administrator.

And in Cavendish v. Fleming, 3 Munf. 196 (1812), it was held that an executor is chargeable with interest on his actual receipts only, except as to debts lost by his negligence or improper conduct.

So in Re Harland's Accounts, 5 Rawle, 323 (1835), guardians were held to be chargeable with interest actually made on sums invested only, when the estate has been managed with fidelity, and there is no evidence of admixture or use or of unnecessary delay in settlement.

And in Latham v. Wilcox, 99 N. C. 367 (1888), it was held that a guardian will be charged with simple interest only on the price of property sold by him as such, where it does not appear that he ever collected the proceeds of sale.

And in Crump v. Gerock, 40 Miss. 675 (1886), it was held that a guardian or other trustee is chargeable with compound interest only in extreme cases, as where he has been guilty of some fraud.

Nor is a guardian chargeable with compound interest who is negligent in some particulars, but who acts in good faith in all respects and is wholly free from fraud. Clarkson v. DePeyster, Hopk. Ch. 424 (1825).

Or for an encroachment upon the estate of a ward for the payment for her board when the estate is small and she is able to earn her own living. Starling v. Balkum, 47 Ala. 314 (1872).

So simple interest only should be allowed against a trustee on the balance of his account when the trust fund was lost without his fault. Livingston v. Wells, 8 S. C. N. S. 347 (1876).

he was required to pay out during the year.

Boynton v. Dyer, 18 Pick. 1.

The proper mode of taking the account of trustees is to treat all the income of the trust received during the current year as unproductive; and to charge against the income of the current year all the disbursements, including the compensation or commissions of the trustee for the same year, and to strike a balance, upon which as a general rule interest is to be allowed, but in such a way as not to compound it.

The private property of an executor or trustee cannot be taken away from him by vague suspicions or conjectures. Land cannot be impressed with a trust, upon lame, unwarranted, or inconclusive presumptions.

And a trustee will not be charged with compound interest on funds appropriated by a defaulting cotrustee, though liable therefor, when the cotrustee, who had been a former attorney for the decedent and confided in by him, and of good standing and reputed wealth, had represented to him that he had properly invested such funds. Bates v. Underhill, 3 Redf. 378 (1878).

And an executor will not be held liable for compound interest on funds of the estate coming to the hands of his co-executor, which are misapplied by the latter, where there was no wrongful intention on his part. Wilmerding v. McKesson, 108 N. Y. 329 (1886).

Nor for interest with annual rests, where there was no act of wilful mismanagement or culpable neglect proved against him, and every charge was allowed against him upon his own return, for a mere failure to obey a direction to pay interest annually for maintenance of the beneficiary. Wright v. Wright, 2 McCord, Eq. 185 (1827).

So the sureties in the bond of an executor who has not settled his accounts and procured his discharge as such are only liable for the residue of the personal estate, after payment of debts and legacies, received by the executor and not disposed of according to the terms of the will, with simple interest thereon, when no wilful breach of duty on the part of the executor is shown. White v. Ditson, 140 Mass. 351, 54 Am. Rep. 473 (1886).

And an administrator having knowledge of the facts, who fails to bring suit for the recovery of a slave belonging to the estate until the right of action is barred by the statute of limitations, is responsible for the value of the slave with interest, but is not chargeable with compound interest when there is an entire absence of fraud and of mala fides. Torbet v. McReynolds, 4 Humph. 215 (1843).

And one who was appointed executor and testamentary guardian in a will directing that testator's property be kept together for the benefit of the family, who within two years from the time he became executor paid an extravagant debt incurred by one of the minor legatees at school to save him from disgrace, is chargeable with the amount with interest from the time it was paid, but the payment is one as executor and not as guardian, and simple interest only can be allowed. Jones v. Ward, 10 Yerg. 160 (1836).

Nor should interest be compounded against an administrator for paying a debt of the estate barred by the statute of limitations. Alvis v. Oglesby, 87 Tenn. 172 (1888).

And simple interest only should be allowed against an administrator who interposes an unsuccessful claim to the ownership of a half interest in the property of the intestate where he had at no time claimed any part of the earnings as his own. Wright v. Wright, 4 Redf. 381 (1879).

And a trustee who has failed to keep accounts, and failed to settle with the heirs, and withheld from them a true statement of the affairs of the estate because of over caution, will not be charged with compound interest, where there was no breach of trust, and he shows the state of the trusteeship in his answer so far as within his knowledge. Armstrong v. Campbell, 3 Yerg. 201, 24 Am. Dec. 555 (1832).

So in Kattelman v. Guthrie's Estate, 43 Ill. App. 188 (1891), it was said that interest should be compounded only in case of a wilful withholding of the funds.

And in Myers v. Myers, 1 Bail. Eq. 23 (1890), it was held that compound interest should not be charged against an executor for the rent of lands and the hire of slaves belonging to the estate, where it is not made to appear that he ill-treated the slaves.

So in Re Harland's Account, 5 Rawle, 223 (1835), the rule was laid down that compound interest may be charged in case of corruption; and English v. Harvey, 2 Rawle, 805 (1830), and Say v. Barnes, 4 Serg. & R. 116, 8 Am. Dec. 679 (1818), set forth infra, IV., under heading, Neglect to invest, were distinguished as being cases of mere negligence.

And in Hughes' App., 53 Pa. 500 (1866), it was said that in cases of very gross delinquency a guardian will be charged with compound interest, but the court merely confirmed the report of an auditor charging a guardian with simple interest upon moneys of the guardianship received and used by him.

But this rule was disapproved in Norris's App., 71 Pa. 106 (1872). See supra, I., heading, Origin, growth, and general statement of the doctrine.

The rule in Kentucky, however, is said, in Page v. Holman, 83 Ky. 578 (1885), to be that a trustee may be charged compound interest, even in the absence of fraud or intended misconduct.

And the rule in South Carolina is that only simple interest can be charged against a trustee, unless it appears that he has dealt improperly with the interest-bearing fund, with the qualification that payments are to be deemed to have been made out of the interest, thus saving the principal and making the interest productive. Livingston v. Wells, 8 S. C. N. S. 847 (1876).

Where the trust fund constitutes a part only of the purchase money of an estate, the court usually gives a lien on the land only for the amount of the trust fund invested and interest; but where the entire land is the fruit of the trust fund, the cestui que trust has an election to take the land or the trust fund and interest.

2 Perry, Tr. § 843; Hedrick v. Tuckwiller, 20 W. Va. 489.

Executors are entitled to commissions as executors, and also as trustees, when, their duties as executors having ended, they take the estate as trustees, and afterwards act solely in that capacity.

Baker v. Johnston, 89 N. J. Eq. 493; Pitney v. Doerson, 43 N. J. Eq. 361; Blake v. Blake, 80 Hun, 469.

A trustee will not be removed for every violation of duty.

Lathrop v. Smalley, 28 N. J. Eq. 192.

Executors and administrators have full authority to compromise claims, and are not liable for any damage resulting to the estate, except for an injudicious use of the power. If they act with fidelity and prudence, their imposition of a charge of compound interest in a proper case. And some of the cases have acted upon that rule without qualification, and without referring to the amount of profits made from its use.

Thus the doctrine of many of the English cases was that an executor, or other trustee who used the trust fund for his own benefit, was chargeable with interest thereon at 5 per cent, the ordinary and usual rate being 4 per cent. Pietz v. Stace, 4 Ves. Jr. 620 (1799); Heathcote v. Hulme, 1 Jac. & W. 123 (1819); Burden v. Burden, set forth in 1 Jac. & W. 134 (1819).

And in Westover v. Chapman, 1 Colly. Ch. Cas 177 (1844), trustees were held chargeable with interest at 5 per cent on balances of the trust fund mixed by them with their own moneys, though the will creating the trust authorized them to invest in good private securities.

And that trustees, who kept the trust fund and dealt with it as their own, and by agreement among themselves represented that it had been invested in stock, and accounted for it as such, were held chargeable with interest thereon at 5 per cent upon the same principle as if they had sold out the stock and used the money, was held in Bate v. Scales, 12 Ves. Jr. 408 (1806).

And an executor who, being a trader, after paying pecuniary legacies in due time, retained for many years balances belonging to the residuary estate, mixing them with his own money, was held chargeable with interest thereon at 5 per cent, though it could not be ascertained without a decree of the court who were entitled to the fund, in Sutton v. Sharp, 1 Russ. Ch. 146 (1826).

So an assignee in bankruptcy, who deposited the moneys arising from the assigned property upon his own account and used them as his own property, was held chargeable with interest thereon at 5 per cent and subject to removal, in Ex parte Townshend, 15 Ves. Jr. 470 (1809).

And one who paid money into a bank in which he was a partner was held chargeable with interest at 5 per cent, to be computed on annual balances, where he had been making a profit of about 5 per cent for about three years, and gave no satisfactory reason for keeping it, in Ex parte Baker, 15 Ves. Jr. 246 (1811).

And where executors, who, by signing joint checks, enable each other to receive money belonging to the estate of their testatrix, when they are both largely indebted thereto and become bankrupt, the sums so received are payable under their respective commissions and they are chargeable with 5 per cent interest to be added to the principal sums found to be provable against their estates. Bick v. Motly, 2 Myl. & K. 312, 4 L. J. Ch. N. S. 63 (1835).

See also as to scale of rates charged in England, infra, VII d, heading, Rate per cent and length of rests.

So, many of the American cases have seemingly adopted the same rule, except that in America compound interest is allowed instead of interest in excess of the usual rate, holding without qualification that executors and other trustees who convert the trust fund to their own use and employ it in their business or trade are chargeable with compound interest.

This was the rule laid down in Re Dyott's Estate, 2 Watts & S. 567 (1841); and it was also adopted in Final Settlement in Black's Estate, Tucker, 147 (1869); Montjoy v. Lashbrook, 3 B. Mon. 261 (1843); Rowan v. Kirkpatrick, 14 Ill. 1 (1852); Miller v. Lux's Estate, 100 Cal. 609 (1896); Re Davis's Estate, 62 Mo. 450 (1876).

So in Page v. Holman, 82 Ky. 573 (1885), and Clark v. Anderson, 10 Bush, 99 (1873), it was held that a trustee who, instead of using the trust moneys for the advantage of the beneficiary, employs them in trade or speculation for his own benefit, will be considered as having loaned the money to himself, and will be held chargeable with interest thereon computed with periodical rests.

And in Re Hodges' Estate, 66 Vt. 70 (1894), and McCloskey v. Gleason, 56 Vt. 264, 48 Am. Rep. 770 (1888), it was held that a trustee or an administrator who mingles the entire trust fund with his own is chargeable with the highest legal rate of interest on the entire fund with annual rests.

So a trustee who sells the trust property receiving large sums of money therefrom, and refuses to pay them over to the party entitled thereto, making divers excuses at different times and all of the time using such moneys, realizing large profits therefrom, is chargeable with compound interest upon the moneys in his hands. Hurd v. Goodrich, 59 Ill. 457 (1871).

And in Hapgood v. Jennison, 3 Vt. 294 (1829), an executor who purchased lands of the estate which were wild and unproductive, at tax sales, many tracts of which remained unsold by him for some time, and upon which he was frequently obliged to pay taxes, and to some of which the title and future sale for cash was uncertain, was charged with 6 per cent only, but the court said that had it been a mortgaged estate instead of wild lands, and the money had gone into speculation, the court would not have hesitated to cast compound interest, making annual rests during the whole period.

And in Georgia, previous to Act of January 1, 1848, the rate of interest was 8 per cent, and simple compromises are sustained, and they are protected.

interest was allowed as a rule, but where there was fraud or gross negligence upon the part of the guardian compound interest was allowed, the compounding to be done at the end of each six years. Royston v. Royston, 29 Ga. 52 (1859).

See also, as to purchase by trustee at his own sale, Orden v. Larrabee, 57 Ill. 398 (1870), set forth infra, IV., d. under heading, Failure or refusal to account.

So, one having the trust funds in his hands, as a loan, at the time of the creation of the trust, which was so invested with his own means in lands, stock, business, etc., that the trust moneys could not be traced to ascertain the form of investment or the amount of profits made, was charged with interest upon interest thereon with annual rests, where, in violation of the testator's directions, he failed to invest the fund but continued it in his business. In McKnight v. Walsh, 24 N. J. Eq. 496 (1873), and 28 N. J. Eq. 136 (1872).

And an administrator who purchases property of a person indebted to the decedent, and in making payment therefor receipts for a sum of money as received by him as administrator, without setting such sum apart from his individual funds as money of the estate, is chargeable with interest thereon at the legal rate, with annual rests. Merrifield v. Longmire, 68 Cal. 180 (1884).

So an executor who deposits the funds of the estate in his individual account, and not only mingles them with his own but uses them for his own business purposes, is chargeable with compound interest thereon, though he so deposited them upon advice of counsel because of the difficulty of making secure investments. Berwick v. Halsey, 4 Redf. 18 (1878).

And an executor in a will who, previous to testator's death, was his partner, is properly chargeable upon final settlement, with compound interest upon the value of the testator's share, where he continues the partnership business without separating the testator's interest in the firm property and assets, employing them in the business. Hannabs v. Hannabs, 68 N. Y. 610 (1877).

And the procurement by a surviving partner of a conveyance of the partnership interest belonging to the decedent's estate from the decedent's administratrix, who was also a trustee for the decedent's children, by means of misrepresentation and fraudulent dealing and the continuance of the partnership business, will be regarded as a continued use of the partnership assets never accounted for, which will furnish a basis for an allowance of compound interest upon the surviving partner's wrongful refusal to account. Heath v. Waters, 40 Mich. 457 (1879).

So executors will be charged with legal interest 29 I. R. A.

computed with annual rests upon a loan made by them to a firm of which one of them is a member, except where payments on account exceeded the interest due at the time of payment, in which case rests must also be made at the time of such payments. Re Butler's Estate, 1 Connolly, 58 (1888).

And executors, one of whom is testator's widow, who, after the termination of an order giving her a monthly allowance out of the estate, continue such allowance until another order is made decreasing the amount allowed her, are chargeable with legal interest computed with annual rests on the difference between the latter allowance and the sums paid her, though there was no actual bad faith or intentional wrongdoing on their part. Miller v. Lux's Estate, 100 Cal. 609 (1893).

And in Sweet v. Sweet, Speers, Eq. 309 (1843), which was a proceeding for the removal of a guardian upon the ground that he had appropriated the funds of his ward to his own use, it was said that as he was bound to account for the interest of his ward's funds by the same rule as a borrower, with the advantage that interest is constantly accumulating without loss of time in reinvesting when paid in by the borrower, it might have been the best use that could be made of them.

On the other hand, many of the cases have adopted the rule that executors, trustees, etc., will only be charged with more than the ordinary rate of interest when they have, either really or presumptively, made more, and that interest will be compounded only when they have made more than simple interest.

Thus, in Atty-Gen. v. Alford, 4 De G. M. & G. 848 (1855), reversing 2 Smale & G. 438 (1854), 1 Jur. N. S. 381 (1855), it was held that an executor and trustee, who for several years neglected to invest trust funds, retaining them in his own hands, is not chargeable with interest at 5 per cent or upon the principle of annual rests, when there are no circumstances to lead to the conclusion that he has made any profit by his misconduct.

And in Burdick v. Garrick, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 223, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 369, 18 Week. Rep. 357 (1870), an agent standing in a fiduciary relation, who mixed trust moneys in his hands with those of his firm (solicitors) in their ordinary bank account, was held to be properly chargeable with interest thereon at the ordinary rate, but that it should not be compounded in the absence of evidence that he had made interest or profit by the use thereof, as a solicitor's business is not one in which compound interest can be made on the money embarked.

So, in Atty-Gen. v. Solly, 2 Sim. 518 (1823), a trustee of a charity estate, in which there was no direction to accumulate, and no fraud, who had used

Messrs. B. P. Carpenter and Alex. C. Botkin, for respondent:

The contention that when land is partly paid for from the trust fund and partly from the individual money of the trustee, the beneficiaries cannot impress a trust upon the property, but only a lien for the moneys of the estate used in the purchase, cannot be supported when the amount of the trust fund so employed is an aliquot part of the entire purchase price.

If only part of the purchase money be paid by the third party, there will be a resulting trust in his favor pro tanto; and the doctrine applies to a joint purchase.

A tutor, curator, or trustee shall not make a profit of the trust money and then retain the profit.

Brown v. Ricketts, 4 Johns. Ch. 808, 8 Am. Dec. 587.

When there is simply a failure to invest he must account for what is commonly called statutory interest, meaning the rate provided by law in the absence of express contract; when there is any circumstance of malversation, or where he has mingled the money of the estate with his own and cannot or will not account for the profits that belong to the cestui que trust the trustee must account for the highest current rate of interest with at least annual rests.

Perry, Tr. § 471, and note; Barney v.

the balance of the rents in carrying on his trade, was charged with interest at 5 per cent, but annual rests were refused.

And see also Ex parte Strutt, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 439 (1778); Tebbs v. Carpenter, 1 Madd. 290 (1816); Re Billiard, 1 Ves. Jr. 90 (1790), set forth supra, II., under heading, Principle of the allowance, holding the same rule.

So, in Re Ward's Estate, 73 Mich. 220 (1889), it was held that interest will not be compounded against a guardian upon moneys of his ward retained in his hands when the testimony does not satisfy the court that he received a net income therefrom that would amount to more than simple interest.

Nor will an administrator, who mingles the funds of the estate with his own, be charged with compound interest, where he was not engaged in a business in which the annual accumulations of interest could be used to advantage, and were so small as not to be susceptible of ready investment. Frey v. Demarest, 17 N. J. Eq. 71 (1864).

And a guardian was held not to be chargeable with compound interest at the rate of 12 per cent for delinquency in failing for a number of years to make his exhibits, during which he was getting the benefit of the trust fund, where he was engaged, not in trade, but in farming, and there was nothing from which it could be inferred that he realized anything more than ordinary interest or profit from its use. Reed v. Timmins, 52 Tex. 84 (1879).

And a trustee who invests a small trust fund with his own money on loan at 4 per cent, charging himself with the amount received, is not chargeable with a greater rate of interest, where that is the common rate of investment and all that could safely be had in the neighborhood. Graver's App. 50 Pa. 189 (1865).

And the allowance of simple interest only against an executor who sold wild lands of the testator and bought them in himself, and the heirs elected to consider him as a purchaser, is proper when the lands were unsalable and no profits had accrued to him from them, and frequent taxes had been paid by him on them, and the title to some of them was doubtful. Jennison v. Hapgood, 10 Pick. 77 (1830).

So in McKim v. Blake, 139 Mass. 598 (1885), it was held that interest should be computed, in an action against a surety on the bond of a trustee who had wrongfully sold securities belonging to the trust estate and converted the proceeds to his own use, on the amount converted from the day it is found to be due up to the day of issuing the execution without rests, the allowance of compound interest being contrary to the general rule in Massachusetts.

executors who had invested and applied the personal estate in their hands to their individual purposes were held to be chargeable with such interest as the investment earned and all profits realized on the sale or exchange of the securities, as well as for legal interest upon such funds as were applied to their individual benefit.

And in Cannon v. Apperson, 14 Lea, 553 (1885), in which an executor loaned the assets of the estate to a firm of which he was a member, which used them in its business, but did not appear to have made more than simple interest thereon, and some of the time there appeared to have been loss rather than profit, he was charged simple interest thereon where he had made yearly settlement correct except as to the matter of interest, and excused his failure to charge himself with the assets on the ground that it was to save the estate from taxation.

So in Re Commonwealth F. Ins. Co., 32 Hun, 78 (1884), holding that the amounts drawn by a receiver from time to time upon his individual checks might be shown when he had deposited the funds of the receivership in his private account in order that he might be charged with interest upon any of the trust fund so used, it was said that if the court can see that by mingling the trust funds with their own trustees have derived any benefit from their use, they are chargeable with interest, either simple or compound, as the facts developed may require.

See also, on this subject, supra, II., heading, Principle of the allowance.

The onus is in the trustee, however, to show that trust money has been kept apart and not used by him. Robert's App. 92 Pa. 407 (1890).

And an executor who mingles the funds of the estate with those of a firm of which he is a member will be presumed to have employed them in the business of the firm, and will be charged with legal interest with annual rests, though there is no evidence of any intended or actual fraud. Re Stott's Estate, 52 Cal. 408 (1877).

And where he has ample funds in hand but fails to pay legacies and divide the residue among the residuary legatees when the time for distribution arrives, and retains the money in his own hands without excuse, he is guilty of a breach of trust for which he is chargeable with 5 per cent interest on the money so retained; and if he pays the money in to his bankers and mixes it with his own, he will be deemed to have had the same benefit as if he had embarked it in trade, and will be charged with annual rests on the balance in his hands. Williams v. Powell, 16 Jur. 393 (1849).

The counsel for appellant constantly argue that the testimony of Chessman should be regarded as conclusive when not positively contradicted. In answer to this position it is sufficient to say that it is well established that a court or jury is not bound to give any weight or credit to the testimony of an interested witness whether a party to the action or not or whether contradicted or not.

Where an executor mingles the funds of an estate with his own and thereafter enters into investments or embarks in speculations, it will be presumed that the trust funds were used in such investments and speculations. This presumption is confirmed where his explanations of what he has done with the trust moneys are vague, evasive, and unsatisfactory; where he is shown to have been a borrower at the time such investments were made, and by other circumstances such as are here in proof.

Troup v. Rice, 55 Miss. 298; Orowder v. Shackelford, 35 Miss. 324; Fox v. Wilcocks, 1 Binn. 194, 2 Am. Dec. 433; Lupton v. White, 15 Ves. Jr. 441; Nixon v. Nixon, 8 Dana, 5; Weir v. Weir, 3 B. Mon. 645, 39 Am. Dec. 487.

The burden of proof is on the trustee to show and mixed them with his own and paid them to his banker, to show that he has derived no benefit from the balance in his banker's hands, in order to relieve himself from a charge of interest thereon with annual rests. Ibid.

In compounding interest against a trustee on a trust fund used by him for his own benefit he will be deemed to have received interest and reloaned it as often as a prudent business man would have done with his own estate under like circumstances. Clark v. Anderson, 10 Bush, 99 (1873).

And when a trustee has misappropriated the funds of the trust, or neglected to properly invest them, the cestui que trust will be presumed to have lost at least lawful interest, and if the fund has been so used by the trustee that the accumulations in his hands exceed that amount the cestui que trust may recover whatever has been so received. Perrin v. Lepper, 72 Mich. 456 (1886).

And the settlement by an executor of several accounts with the commissioners, in each of which he claims a balance due in his favor, where at the time of each of such settlements he was actually largely indebted to the estate, furnishes conclusive evidence that he employed the sums actually due to the estate for his own use. Turney v. Williams, 7 Yerg. 173 (1834).

Where no fraud has been committed, however, the burden of proof that a guardian has received a higher than the legal rate of interest on money of his ward in his hands rests with those who represent the ward's interests and assert the fact, and they must identify the instances in which such interest has been received. Moyer v. Fletcher, 56 Mich. 503 (1885).

And in Atty-Gen. v. Alford, 4 DeG. M. & G. 843, 1 Jur. N. S. 361 (1855), it was held that misconduct on the part of an executor or trustee will not, as a general rule, warrant the presumption of the receipt of profits by him.

See also cases as to presumption and burden of proof set forth infra, IV., d, under heading, Failure or refusal to account.

It seems probable that much of the apparent conflict between the foregoing classes of cases is to be explained upon the theory that the cases in which compound interest was charged without any apparent reference to the profits made were ones in which the presumption that more than simple interest was made would apply, but nothing seems to have been said about the presumption in the cases themselves.

Thus Ex parte Strutt, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 439 (1783), explains Treves v. Townshend, 1 Bro. Ch. 385, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 50 (1784), the court saying that in that case it was admitted that the assignee had mixed the money with his own, and the court thought that, as he had used it in his business, it was impossible but that he had made a profit on it to the amount of 5 per cent.

Interest is not chargeable with interest upon an account taken against an executor or administrator, however, unless he is shown to have used the funds or to have been guilty on wilful neglect. Powell v. Powell, 10 Ala. 900 (1846).

An executor not required by the will to make the fund productive is only chargeable with compound interest by reason of the use of the funds. Cannon v. Apperson, 14 Lea, 553 (1885).

Thus, an administrator will be charged with simple, and not with compound, interest upon a balance remaining uninvested and unaccounted for, and therefore presumed to have continued in his hands, where no evidence is produced to show that he used it for his own purposes, though it is admitted that he mixed it with his own moneys. Re McCall's Estate, 1 Ashm. 357 (1830).

And an executor will only be charged with simple interest, though he mingled and loaned the funds of the estate with his own, where he did so in good faith and without fault or want of prudence, disclosing all the profits and claiming no deduction for losses or services, and such interest exceeds what he actually received on the funds, and they had not been used in business trade or speculation. Perkins v. Hollister, 59 Vt. 343 (1897).

So where a testatrix appoints her three bankers, who were partners and were indebted to her, to be her executors, and one of them dies before her assets are collected or her will probated, appointing the other two partners his executors, who continue in trade without paying the indebtedness to her, and ultimately die, the estate of the partner first dying is only chargeable with simple interest at 4 per cent on the principal sum unpaid, there being no breach of trust on his part. Penny v. Avison, 8 Jur. N. S. 62 (1856).

And in Ker v. Snead, 11 Law Rep. 217 (1873), it was held that a trustee will not be charged with compound interest, except in case of provisions for accumulation, though he has mingled the trust fund with his own.

And the mere fact that a trustee was a common stockholder in an incorporated bank would not, of itself, charge him with interest for making a deposit as trustee in that bank, if the bank be of good credit and such an ordinarily prudent man might select as a depository in his own business. But it might be otherwise if he were the sole stockholder or much the largest stockholder. Dictum in Cannon v. Apperson, 14 Lea, 553 (1885).

So a guardian will be charged legal interest only upon funds of his ward in his keeping, where he was unaccustomed to business and had innocently con-the amount of his own funds invested in such speculations, or otherwise the cestui que trust will take the whole.

1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 468; Perry, Tr. § 128; Austin v. A. & W. Sprague Mfg. Co. 14 R. I. 471; Russell v. Jackson, 10 Hare, 204; McLarren v. Brewer, 51 Me. 402; Seaman v. Cook, 14 Ill. 501.

The cardinal object of equity is to see that the trustee never profits by malversation of the trust funds. To insure this, the beneficiaries are permitted to make their election as to whether they will take the actual profits or interest in lieu thereof.

1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 465; Docker v. Somes, 2 Myl. & K. 655; Weir v. Weir, supra; Norris's App. 71 Pa. 106; Myers v. Myers, 2 McCord, Eq. 214, 16 Am. Dec. 658; Cruce v. Cruce, 81 Mo. 681; Oliver v. Platt, 44 U. S. 8 How. 401, 11 L. ed. 652.

fused the ward's funds with his own and kept no accounts, though the evidence tended to show that in some unidentified instances he had received 10 per cent interest on money loaned by him. Moyer v. Fletcher, 56 Mich. 508 (1885).

And one who collects the funds of his ward in confederate notes of the "old issue," and pays them out in satisfaction of his individual debts, and shortly afterwards receives confederate notes of the "new issue" in payment of debts due him, designing to replace with them the notes of the estate used by him, is not guilty of such misconduct as will render him liable for compound interest. Brand v. Abbott, 42 Ala. 499 (1868).

And a guardian who hires the slaves of his ward under authority of the probate court by which the amount of the annual hire was fixed, carrying the sums so ascertained regularly year after year into his account and charging them to himself as a part of the income of the ward, the balances being regularly transferred from each account to the next, is not chargeable with compound interest on such sums so charged against him. Crump v. Gerock, 40 Miss. 765 (1865).

See also infra, IV., d. heading, Failure or refusal to account, in all the cases in which the element of the use of the trust fund is involved.

d. Failure or refusal to account.

Failure or refusal to account appears to be an essential element of the right to charge compound interest upon a trust fund, perhaps the pivotal element, as, if the use and profits were accounted for the trustee would be chargeable therewith as profits, and not as interest.

Thus compound interest is not allowed unless the trustee refuses or is unable to render an account of the use or profit actually made of the trust fund. Jennison v. Hapgood, 10 Pick. 77 (1830).

So, in Garniss v. Gardiner, 1 Edw. Ch. 126 (1862), it was said that as a general rule, executors, administrators, and trustees are liable to pay simple interest when they unnecessarily retain the moneys in their hands, hold them an unreasonable time, mix them with their own private funds, use them in the way of trade, or derive any personal advantage from them. It is only in special cases and under peculiar circumstances, which must be proved, that interest is to be compounded against them. But where they convert the trust money to their own use, and employ it in trade or business, making profits of which they refuse to give an account, they may be charged with compound interest.

And the rule would seem to be practically universal that the concurrence of a use of the fund with a failure or refusal to account for the profits is a sufficient ground for the charge.

Our statute permits the compromise of claims by executors or administrators "with the approbation of the probate court or judge."

There is no pretense that such approbation was secured in this case, and in its absence it devolved upon the executor to show that there had been no remissness on his part, and that the compromise was for the best interests of the estate.

Schulte v. Pulver, 11 Wend. 876; Lowson v. Copeland, 2 Bro. Ch. 156; Powell v. Evans, 5 Ves. Jr. 844; Caffrey v. Darby, 6 Ves. Jr. 487; Woerner, Law of Administration, § 824, and authorities cited in note 4.

Petition for rehearing.

The court was in error in assuming that the sum of $5,000 withdrawn by the executor from the funds of the estate, and invested in the property purchased from Child & Young, was

Thus the burden of accounting for actual gains and profits rests upon the trustee, and if he fails or refuses to furnish evidence of them the rule should be adopted which most nearly approximates his actual gains and leaves no advantage or benefit to him by reason of his silence or refusal. Cruce v. Cruce, 81 Mo. 676 (1884); Asay v. Allen, 124 Ill. 391 (1888).

And a use of the moneys of an estate by an executor or administrator, which will render him chargeable with compound interest thereon, may be presumed from a neglect or refusal to account. Re Camp, 6 Mo. App. 568 (1879); Camp v. Camp, 74 Mo. 122 (1881); Kenan v. Hall, 8 Ga. 417 (1850).

And where it is impossible or impracticable to trace out and apportion the profits accruing to a trustee from the use of trust funds in connection with his own, the court will fix upon a rate of interest to charge the trustee as the supposed measure or representative of the profits. Bond v. Lockwood, 33 Ill. 218 (1864).

So if a trustee fails or refuses to account, and suppresses or destroys the evidence, so that the amount of his profits cannot be ascertained, he may be charged with the trust fund and such accumulations thereon as the best management would be likely to secure, such gains being presumed from his failure to report. Perrin v. Lepper, 72 Mich. 455 (1888).

And when he has profited, or there is reason to believe that he has profited, by the use of the trust fund, and fails to make a frank disclosure or conceals the amount made, he is chargeable with compound interest. Crump v. Gerock, 40 Miss. 765 (1866); Torbet v. McReynolds, 4 Humph. 215 (1843) dictum.

And when he acts in utter disregard of his trust, and treats the trust moneys as his own, and neither keeps nor renders any account thereof, he may be charged with interest computed with periodical rests. Adams v. Lambard, 80 Cal. 426 (1889).

And when he evades an accounting without repudiating the trust, and afterwards sells the trust property to an innocent purchaser, he will be charged with compound interest from the date of the sale, and is not entitled to any interest on his account. Ibid.

So when a trustee refuses to account for the profits arising from his use of the trust fund, or where he so mingles it and the profits therefrom with his own money and profits that he cannot separate and account for the profits that belong to the cestui que trust, the latter may have legal interest computed with annual rests; and this rule is especially applicable in cases involving a wilful breach of duty. State v. Howarth, 48 Conn. 207 (1890).

And a trustee who improperly purchases at his own sale under decrees of foreclosure, and after-interest or earnings of the trust fund. It was in fact principal; and previous to its withdrawal for the investment mentioned had been on deposit in the name of Wm. A. Chessman, executor.

The court was in error in assuming that the judgment of the court below would give to the heirs both the interest in the property purchased with the funds of the estate, and the purchase price or interest on the purchase price. The $5,000 invested in this property and interest thereon from the date of the purchase, were excluded from the computation of the amount with which the account of the executor was ordered to be surcharged.

The court below found as a fact "that on the 20th day of May, 1898, the said William A. Chessman purchased of Levi H. Child and others an undivided one half of lot 8 of the Chessman & Davis Placer Claim, and an undivided one half of lot E of the Gatchell & Child placer claim, in the county of Lewis and Clarke aforesaid, and paid therefor as purchase price of the same the sum of $10,000, and took the deed for the same in his own name; that $5,000 of the purchase price so paid for the same was money belonging to the said estate."

Upon such a state of facts the law is that the cestuis que trust may elect whether they will take the property or the amount so invested with interest. But they have had no opportunity to exercise their election, except in this proceeding; and if the decision of this court shall obtain, not only the petitioner, but all of the heirs, will be barred forever of the right to make such election.

4 Kent, Com. 11th ed. p. 834; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1049; Schouler, Exrs. & Admrs. § 338; Barker v. Barker, 14 Wis. 139; White v. Drew, wards sells the several parcels purchased, some of them at a considerable advance, failing to keep any exact account of the profits of the transaction or refusing to render an account thereof to the beneficiary, is chargeable upon the beneficiary's electing to affirm the sale with interest upon the sums used, computed with annual rests. Ogden v. Larrabee, 57 Ill. 368 (1870).

And one who for several years receives large sums of money from the trust estate, which he continually employs in trade and speculation for his own benefit, resisting all efforts to require him to account, and withholding the discovery sought for, and endeavoring to stifle inquiry as to the use made by him of the money received, making divers inconsistent claims as to the ownership of the trust fund, is chargeable with compound interest estimated upon the balance in his hands at the end of each year. Diffenderfer v. Winder, 3 Gill & J. 341 (1831), affirming same point in Winder v. Diffenderfer, 2 Bland, Ch. 166 (1829).

So where an executor fails to render a satisfactory account of his receipt of interest and its employment, interest should be compounded against him by the adoption of periodical rests. Johnson v. Beauchamp, 5 Dana, 70 (1837).

And one who denies the receipt of the assets, and accounts for neither principal nor interest, and converts all to his own use, may be charged, in favor of an infant legatee, with interest on the funds in his hands, compounded annually as if he had been a guardian. Swindall v. Swindall, 8 Ired. Eq. 286 (1852).

And one whose settlement has been delayed for an unreasonable time will be charged with legal interest with annual rests, on the money in his hands, when the only excuse offered is that his attorney was negligent, and that the attorney had died six or seven years before the trial, and that until about two years before the trial he had supposed that the estate had been settled, although there is no evidence that he derived any profit therefrom. Re Hillard's Estate, 83 Cal. 423 (1890).

And in Re Sanderson, 74 Cal. 199 (1887), where there had been great delay in an accounting by an executor, the appellate court held that it could not say that the court below was not justified in charging him with legal interest with annual rests.

So, an executor who uses the funds of the estate as his own, and claims them as such, and conceals from the legatees the fact that he had any in his hands, dealing in the meantime extensively in land warrants making large profits, is chargeable with compound interest. Turney v. Williams, 7 Yerg. 173 (1834).

And compound interest with annual rests will be allowed against an executor where he renders no account of the use made of the money in his hands, and claims it as his own, and denies his indebtedness to the estate, and repels the imputation of fraud or gross negligence in an unsatisfactory manner, and has been in the habit of demanding and receiving compound interest. Jennison v. Hapgood, 10 Pick. 77 (1830).

So, an executor and trustee under a will, who keeps no account of the trust fund, but uses the securities transferred to him in his own business, changing them from time to time, and realizing profits therefrom of which he renders no account, and who surcharges his account with items of expense unsupported by evidence, and some of which were unfounded in fact, is properly chargeable with interest at the legal rate computed with annual rests upon the fund in his hands. Cook v. Lowry, 95 N. Y. 103 (1884).

And one appointed executor, under a will, and guardian of testator's children, who fails to account for the assets coming to his hands, is chargeable with simple interest only for the time he acts as executor, but should be charged with compound interest as guardian from the time when the administration of the estate was or might have been concluded, unless he shows special equitable circumstances discharging him from his accountability. Hodge v. Hawkins, 1 Dev. & B. Eq. 564 (1837).

And an administrator, who converts the moneys of the estate in his hands as such to his own use, or employs them in his business without accounting for profits or disclosing what the profits were, is chargeable with compound interest with annual rests after the lapse of a reasonable time for the settlement of the estate. Schleffelin v. Stewart, 1 Johns. Ch. 630, 7 Am. Dec. 507 (1815).

In DePeyster v. Clarkson, 2 Wend. 77 (1823), it was concluded arguendo that Schleffelin v. Stewart, supra, and the English cases there cited were not supported by authority, but the case was decided upon another ground, and the latter case was said, in Garniss v. Gardiner, 1 Edw. Ch. 128 (1832), not to have been overruled thereby, but to continue to stand as authority.

So an administrator, who did not report the proceeds of a note coming to his hands to the court, as required by statute, but mingled them with his own money and used them in his own affairs and for his own benefit, keeping and rendering no separate account thereof, should be charged with compound, and not with simple, interest. Williams v. Petticrew, 62 Mo. 460 (1876).

And one who takes credit on an accounting for notes due the estate as uncollectible may be charged with interest at the rate of 10 per cent computed 42 Mo. 561; Watson v. Thompson, 12 R. I. 470; Johnson v. Dougherty, 18 N. J. Eq. 409; Butler v. Lawson, 72 Mo. 249; Kyle v. Barnett, 17 Ala. 306; McCully v. McCully, 78 Va. 159; Maloney v. Kelley, 54 Ala. 532; Eckford v. DeKay, 8 Paige, 89.

The court is in error in its statement as follows: "In this case, it appears that in rendering his account at the close of each year, the executor charged the estate with the commission allowed by law on funds of the estate, actually disbursed during the preceding year." On the contrary it is in proof, and uncontradicted and uncontested, that in each of the annual accounts hereinafter mentioned, the executor charged commissions in excess of the commissions allowed by law at the several times mentioned, respectively, and that the sums so charged in excess of the commissions allowed by law have been and now are retained and withheld by him.

The court is in error in its statement that "this transaction"—referring to the withdrawal of $6,500 belonging to the estate from the People's National Bank,—“substituted the executor as debtor to said estate in the sum of $6,500,” etc.

A trustee is not permitted to borrow trust funds, and the transaction mentioned in no way changed the character in which the executor held the sum involved.

The court is in error in its statement that the interest returned in the annual accounts "amounts to 7½ per cent per annum, compounded, upon the funds in hand from year to year, on the average, for the whole period of administration." The testimony of the expert accountant referred to is that the computation with annual rests as for money appropriated to his own use, where the evidence shows that he collected moneys thereon which he failed to report. Camp v. Camp, 74 Mo. 192 (1881), 6 Mo. App. 568 (1879).

And the husband of an administratrix, who carries on a farming business with the assets of an intestate, and who admits that he has made profits, that he has kept no accounts, and blended the transactions of the farm with his other concerns, and cannot state the amount, will be charged with interest at the highest legal rate computed with annual rests. Walker v. Woodward, 1 Russ. Ch. 107 (1826).

So a guardian who converts the money of his wards to his own use, and uses it for a number of years without accounting for it in any way, will be charged with compound interest thereon. Re Eschrich's Estate, 85 Cal. 98 (1890).

And a guardian is chargeable with compound interest on notes received by him as such for funds arising from the estate and not accounted for and on money with which he ought to have charged himself for rent of lands of the estate which he had used. Latham v. Wilcox, 99 N. C. 367 (1888).

And one who has neglected for a long time to account for his ward's money, and has abandoned his trust and left the estate without any apparent cause, whose ward was of age for five years prior to the judgment rendered in a suit upon the guardian's bond, is chargeable, in Missouri, with 10 per cent compound interest up to the date of the ward's coming of age, and after that time with 6 per cent. State v. Richardson, 29 Mo. App. 595 (1888).

And in Stephens v. Van Buren, 1 Paige, 479 (1829), in which executors had retained moneys of the estate belonging to infants in their hands for a number of years refusing without reason to pay it on demand of the guardian of the infants, a reference was made to a master to ascertain the amount due each of the infants, and he was directed to charge them with the interest which they had received or might have received with reasonable diligence, though the guardian did not ask for interest.

So in Johnson v. Hedrick, 88 Ind. 129, 5 Am. Rep. 191 (1870), in which there was a delay of some ten years in the final settlement of administrators, and there was evidence that they used the money of the trust in their own private speculation and refused to account for the result thereof, the court said that the master should have charged them with compound interest making annual rests for that purpose; but as no exception was taken to the report, an allowance of simple interest was affirmed.

So an assignee for the benefit of creditors, who mixes trust funds with his own depositing them in his own name, neglecting and failing to account when called upon to do so, and failing to state the disposition of the fund, will be charged with interest thereon with annual rests. Asay v. Allen, 124 Ill. 391 (1889).

And the cestuis que trust are entitled to an account, and to legal interest with annual rests, when a husband deeds lands to a third person and afterwards takes from the vendee a deed in trust for the benefit of his wife and family, and administers the trust for a number of years, mingling the rents and profits with his own money so that he cannot separate them and account for the profits. Bobb v. Bobb, 89 Mo. 411 (1888).

So in Lukens's App., 7 Watts & S. 48 (1844), it was said that a guardian who trades with the moneys of his ward or uses them for his own purposes in any way, whereby, for aught that appears to the contrary, he has made profit equal to compound interest thereon, of which he refuses to render an account, is chargeable with compound interest.

And in Scudder v. Ames, 89 Mo. 496 (1886), in which the judgment was reversed and the case remanded on other grounds, Sherwood, J., in a separate opinion, laid down the rule that on all claims the amount of which the administrator collects but wilfully conceals and omits to account for in his settlement, he should be charged interest with annual rests, but that he is liable for ordinary interest only on moneys in his hands ready for distribution at the time of filing his annual settlement where he fails to obtain an order of distribution or an order to loan the money.

And in Re Herteman, 78 Cal. 545 (1887), interest was allowed against an administrator on money of the estate drawn by him and mingled with his own funds and omitted from his account, but there was nothing in the case to show whether it was compounded or not.

Without the concurrence of the use of the trust fund, however, there is no such liability.

Thus, a guardian who neglects to file returns is not chargeable with compound interest upon moneys of his ward collected by a commissioner and remaining uncalled for in his hands. Baker v. Laftie, 4 Rich. Eq. 392 (1852); Royston v. Royston, 29 Ga. 83 (1859); Childress v. Childress, 49 Ala. 257 (1878); Calhoun v. Calhoun, 41 Ala. 369 (1868).

Such failure is not of itself sufficient to authorize a finding of fraud. Royston v. Royston, supra.

And the failure to make annual settlements not being evidence of fraud but negligence merely, does not constitute such a mismanagement of the trust as renders him chargeable therewith. Calhoun v. Calhoun, supra.

And the omission of a guardian to give a state-was made for only a part of the time and was approximate at most.

The executor did not keep all of the moneys belonging to the estate in any of the banks designated by the order of the probate court procured by him on the 21st day of July, 1875; he failed to show what he has done, or what he did, with the sums not so deposited, and his explanations respecting the same are vague, evasive, and unsatisfactory; during the times these balances remained in his hands he was from time to time a borrower of money, and he mixed large sums of money belonging to the estate with his private funds, and used the same on his own account.

Petitioner respectfully submits that he may reasonably ask for the application to this state of facts of the fundamental principles of equity jurisprudence, that are found in the following authorities:

ment of profits from the use of his ward's moneys will not be regarded as a suppression of the truth which will render him chargeable with compound interest thereon, where he had not employed them in trade and had had no use of them except as they remained with his own. Clarkson v. De Peyster, 10 Ark. Ch. 434 (1825).

And his mere omission to apply to the court for authority to invest his ward's money, and his failure to make annual settlements, are not evidence of fraud for which the court will allow compound interest against him, but establish negligence only. Bryant v. Craig, 12 Ala. 354 (1847).

So a partner who draws out money from co-partnership funds is not chargeable with compound interest, but with simple interest only, on the sums drawn out, unless it appears that he has traded or speculated with the money, and made a profit on it, and refused on being called on for that purpose to disclose the profits. Stoughton v. Lynch, 2 Johns. Ch. 309 (1816).

And when a guardian, who is the brother of his ward, makes no reports and keeps no accounts of his guardianship, he will not be charged with compound interest on rents received from his ward's estate, where it can be fairly assumed that it was expended for her benefit, but should be imposed when and for such time as such application cannot be assumed. Finnell v. O'Neal, 13 Bush, 176 (1877).

Settlements made by a guardian in county court in accordance with directions in the will creating the guardianship are prima facie evidence in a suit in chancery in which claims against him for compound interest are asserted. Maupin v. Dulany, 5 Dana, 599, 30 Am. Dec. 699 (1837).

See also infra, IV. 1, for other cases of failure to account where the failure was in disregard of a statute.

c. Neglect to invest.

Executors, guardians, and other trustees are usually held liable for simple interest at the ordinary legal rate only, for mere neglect or delay in investing the trust fund so as to render it productive. Gott v. Culp, 45 Mich. 365 (1881); Bryant v. Craig, 12 Ala. 354 (1847); Thorn v. Garner, 43 Hun, 507 (1886); Re Hariand's Account, 5 Rawle, 325 (1836); Dietterich v. Heft, 5 Pa. 87 (1847); Pennypacker's App. 41 Pa. 494 (1862); Crigler v. Alexander, 33 Gratt. 674 (1890); Re Guardianship of Thurston, 57 Wis. 104 (1888); Perkins v. Hollister, 59 Vt. 843 (1887); Barney v. Saunders, 57 U. S. 16 How. 535, 14 L. ed. 1047 (1853); Crackett v. Bethune, 1 Jac. & W. 536 (1820).

Thus the rule that a guardian is chargeable with compound interest received by him does not apply 39 L. R. A.

Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1079; 2 Redf. Wills, 884; Story, Eq. Jur. 1277; 2 Woerner, American Law of Administration, p. 1138; Re Mairs, 4 Redf. 160; Royalce v. Hall, 1 Sandf. Ch. 399; Martin v. Raborn, 43 Ala. 648; Bentley v. Shreve, 2 Md. Ch. 219; Hannah v. Hannah, 68 N. Y. 610; Gunter v. Jones, 9 Cal. 643.

Statutory interest imposes no limit upon the discretion of the court in surcharging the accounts of an executor. Even usurious interest may be exacted, if it was realized; and it is in proof here, that from some of the investments which the executor made while he was using the funds of the estate he realized as high a rate as 216 per cent per annum.

Perry, Tr. § 468; Barney v. Saunders, 57 U. S. 16 How. 543, 14 L. ed. 1051; Re Holbert's Estate, 39 Cal. 597.

Section 245, Probate Practice Act, provides that "every executor and administrator is to interest chargeable against a guardian on funds in hand. Brand v. Abbott, 42 Ala. 499 (1866); Childress v. Childress, 49 Ala. 237 (1878).

And an executor having money in his hands which he might have invested but did not, but upon which he does not appear to have made any profits, should be charged, in accounting, with simple interest thereon, but not with compound interest, where his duty would have been properly performed had he invested it at simple interest. Light's App. 24 Pa. 180 (1854).

And an executor who does not employ the moneys of the estate for his own benefit, but merely withholds them, is chargeable with interest, at the general rate only, something more than mere negligence being necessary to a greater charge. Rooke v. Hart, 11 Ves. Jr. 68 (1806).

And simple interest only will be allowed in computing the damages for breach of a guardian's bond by failure to account to the ward upon his becoming of age, when the guardian has not actually received interest and it does not appear that he could have invested the moneys, especially when the liability to be enforced is that of the sureties. Peelle v. State, 118 Ind. 512 (1888).

Nor will compound interest be charged against the committee of a lunatic upon balances found against him upon the settlement of his account, when the balances were small and the moneys were promptly collected and it does not appear that he used them or derived any profit therefrom. Crigler v. Alexander, 33 Gratt. 674 (1890).

The extent of the liability of trustees for interest on the trust fund for negligence in failing to invest it, however, depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. Morgan v. Morgan, 4 Dem. 368 (1896).

And in several cases interest with rests has been allowed.

Thus, interest may be charged on annual balances on an executor's account where no circumstances appear which will require him to keep moneys in his hands, and it may also be charged on balances in his favor. Darrel v. Eden, 3 Desaus. Eq. 241, 4 Am. Dec. 618 (1811).

So in Bradford v. Bodfish, 39 Iowa, 661 (1874), it was held that it is the duty of a guardian to invest the money of the ward, and if he holds it he is chargeable with interest thereon computed at the legal rate with annual rests.

And in Say v. Barnes, 4 Serg. & R. 112, 8 Am. Dec. 679 (1818), it was held that a guardian who fails to invest the money of his ward so as to render it productive is chargeable with interest thereon, and a reasonable rule is to compute it upon the balances in his hands at the end of every six months whether chargeable in his own account . . . with all of the interest, profit, and income of the estate."

Harwood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding was instituted in the probate department of the district court of Lewis and Clarke county by Martha P. Ricker, petitioner on behalf of Jesse C. Ricker, a minor heir and legatee of Joshua C. Ricker, deceased, to require an account, under the provisions of the Probate Practice Act (sections 254-270), from W. A. Chessman, executor of said estate, touching his administration and disbursement of the property thereof. It appears from the record that Joshua C. Ricker died on the 1st of June, 1875, a resident of Lewis and Clarke county, Mont., leaving a widow, Martha P., and four minor children, and an estate, consisting of money deposited in certain banks, to the amount of about $18,000, which, together with other assets, consisting of certain personal effects, and demands owing the estate, and an undivided partnership interest with M. A. Price in two ranches and certain cattle, etc., altogether amounted to the appraised value of $84,467.55, excluding the homestead. The management and disposition of this estate were directed by the last will and testament of decedent, whereof William A. Chessman was appointed executor. By said will the testator devised to his wife, Martha P., the homestead and household furniture situate in the city of Helena, Mont., valued at $3,235, and directed the executor to pay, out of the funds of said estate, to said widow, for the support of herself and the support and education of said minor children, the sum of it was used or negligently retained by him, unless he shows that the money was really lying dead.

But in English v. Harvey, 3 Hawle, 305 (1890), it was said that in Say v. Barnea, supra, the trustee was charged with the interest he received and interest on it up to the time of paying it over, but not compound interest.

And Dietterich v. Heft, 5 Pa. 87 (1847), explains and distinguishes Say v. Barnea, supra, saying that the rests there spoken of relate only to the amount of money which was received every six months by the guardian, at the end of which period, successively, the gross amount received in the previous six months was ascertained, and the amount was charged with simple interest up to the time of credit, and so of the amount of every succeeding six months, but there were no rests for the accumulation of interest upon the principal and charging compound interest.

So in Fay v. How, 1 Pick. 528 (1823), it was said that guardians will not be charged with compound interest, unless the circumstances are such as to raise a strong presumption of neglect in putting the money of the ward in a productive state.

And a guardian who did not invest the trust moneys so as to make them produce interest, and did not employ them in commerce but mingled them with his own moneys and in that way had their use, should not be charged with compound interest but with simple interest only, where owing to the existence of a state of war investments on bond and mortgage were attended with difficulty and after the termination of the war the growing exigencies of his wards required large advances and expenditures. Clarkson v. De Pyster, Hopk. Ch. 424 (1825).

Nor will compound interest be allowed upon a legacy against executors for failure to invest it, where it does not appear that they supposed themselves chargeable with interest thereon, or that they did not believe in good faith that they had invested for the benefit of the cestui que trust as directed by the surrogate the whole trust fund with the care of which they were charged. Thorn v. Garner, 45 Hun, 507 (1890).

A guardian in Alabama is not, as a general rule, chargeable with compound interest unless he collects it. Tyson v. Sanderson, 45 Ala. 368 (1871); Starling v. Balkum, 47 Ala. 814 (1872).

And in Vance v. Vance, 33 La. Ann. 186 (1880), it was held that a natural tutor who fails to invest his ward's estate, but uses it in his own interest, is liable for the moneys received by him with legal interest, but it should not be compounded, though the law requires a tutor to invest, under authority of the court, all amounts in his hands as often as they amount to $500.

See also, with relation to failure to invest when the duty to do so is imposed by law and failure to make profits which should have been made. infra, IV. j, headings, Neglect or violation of duty imposed by statute, and IV. l, Interest or profits which might have been made.

1. Improper investment.

The improper investment of the trust fund is equivalent to a failure to invest it, and is governed by the same rules with reference to the allowance of interest.

The fund will be treated as remaining in the hands of the trustee, and interest will be charged at the ordinary rate only. Re Emmet's Estate, L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 142, 50 L. J. Ch. 341, 44 L. T. N. S. 172, 29 Week. Rep. 464 (1881).

Thus, a trustee who invests trust funds in the purchase of debts at 10 per cent interest, which is declared by the court to be an improper investment, is chargeable with simple interest at the legal rate only, when the cestui que trust repudiates the investment, as the matter then stands as though no investment had been made. Cogbill v. Boyd, 79 Va. 1 (1884).

And interest should not be compounded against a guardian who in good faith lays out the money of his wards in the purchase of bank stock which, being depreciated, has by the decision of the court fallen upon him and he is required to account to his wards for the money received. Hughes v. Smith, 2 Dana, 258 (1834).

And the committee of a lunatic directed by order of the court to invest the funds of the lunatic in his hands in bonds and mortgages on real estate or in bonds of the United States or of the state or city and county of New York, who invests a part in a mortgage upon a leasehold estate which might be devested by failure of the mortgagor to pay interest, and leaves the rest on deposit in a bank which allowed but a small rate of interest, should not be charged more than simple interest at the legal rate, where no wilful misappropriation or neglect to invest appears. Butler v. Jarvis, 61 Hun 243 (1890).

In Butler v. Jarvis, supra, and King v. Talbot, 49 N. Y. 76 (1890), set forth supra, IV. b, under heading, Misconduct or gross delinquency generally, was distinguished, the court saying that compound interest was added under the peculiar circumstances of that case.

Nor will trustees authorized to sell real estate and invest the proceeds in stock, who exchange the real estate for other real property in violation of the trust, be charged with compound interest on the value thereof when they acted in good faith with no view of reaping any benefit to themselves.

$300 monthly for the period of five years, and thereafter the sum of $250 monthly; providing, however, that as each of said minor children reached the age of majority, and received a share of said estate, respectively, as provided in the will, then such monthly allowance should be diminished to the extent of such child's proportion thereof. The will further directed the executor, at such time, and for such prices, as he deemed for the best interest of the estate, to sell and convert into money all the effects of said estate; and that all such funds not otherwise required to be paid out, as provided by the will, be, as soon as practicable, invested in United States government securities; and that the interest accruing on such securities, save such part thereof as might be necessary to carry out the provisions of the will, be, from time to time, invested in like manner.

It appears from the first annual report by the executor, returned to the probate court at the close of the first year of said administration, that the available funds of said estate then on hand, after paying said monthly allowance for the widow and minor children, other current expenses, and certain debts of the estate and of said partnership estate, was $15,174.26; and thereafter, from year to year, the funds of said estate, with additional receipts from sales of property, collections of debts due the estate, and accumulations by way of interest on the funds on hand, ranged from the sum last stated upward to $19,818.43, which was the largest sum on hand at the close of any fiscal year during the administration, after meeting demands thereon by way of annuities, debts, and expenses of the estate, and of the partnership estate aforesaid, as shown by the annual Ringgold v. Ringgold, 1 Harr. & G. 11, 18 Am. Dec. 265 (1823).

And in Freeman v. Freeman, 4 Redf. 211 (1880), it was held that executors directed to invest a trust fund in bond and mortgage on real estate in the city of New York or its vicinity, who, with consent of the beneficiary, took a mortgage upon a dwelling house in New Jersey which was passed to testator's daughter by his will, which was not recorded in New Jersey, thus constituting a defect of title, are not chargeable with compound interest on the amount invested where they acted in good faith; but the question of the right to invest in another state was not noticed.

So in Ackerman v. Emott, 4 Barb. 636 (1848), in which executors having a general power to invest legacies unrestricted by any express direction, invested in bank stock which was, in whole or in part, the property of one of them, they were held personally liable for the loss caused thereby; but compound interest was disallowed, though the question as to whether the investment in unsafe securities in which a trustee was interested was a sufficient ground for its imposition, was not considered.

In Adair v. Brimmer, 74 N. Y. 539 (1878), however, in which real estate was devised to executors in trust with power to sell and invest the proceeds, and the executors transferred the lands which were undeveloped coal lands for the purpose of organizing a mining corporation to develop and work them, taking pay in stock of the corporation, and after the funds of the company were exhausted, bonds were issued to raise funds to build a railroad on the premises, some of which the executors took, the transaction was held to be unauthorized, and interest was charged against the executors on the amount paid for bonds at the rate of 6 per cent with annual rests.

And in Knott v. Cottee, 16 Beav. 77, 16 Jur. 753 (1852), a trustee directed to accumulate, who made an improper investment but retained no benefit to himself, was charged with 4 per cent with annual rests.

And in Micou v. Lamar, 7 Fed. Rep. 180 (1881), it was held that where wards reject improper investments and demand the equivalent, the guardian should be charged during the continuance of the guardianship with such a rate as a proper and safe investment would have yielded, compounded annually, which may be less than the legal rate.

And legatees under a will directing the executors to apply the income from the legacies given them so far as is necessary to their maintenance and education during their minority, and pay to them the principal and accumulation upon their respectively attaining majority, are not bound to accept railroad and bank stock, upon coming of age, in which the executors had invested the funds, but may call upon them to pay over the whole amount of their legacies with interest computed with annual rests, that not being a proper investment of the trust fund. King v. Talbot, 40 N. Y. 78 (1869), affirming 50 Barb. 458 (1867).

So when a guardian invests in securities not approved by the probate court, he may be charged with such amounts of interest or principal as he has actually collected with simple interest for the term during which interest was not collected, or, at the option of the heir, with the principal sum invested with interest upon annual balances, computed as provided for in the statute with relation to general accounting. Sanderson v. Sanderson, 17 Fla. 820 (1890).

And in Lukens's App., 7 Watts & S. 48 (1844), in which the guardian invested the funds of the ward in bank stock in his own name, which depreciated in price, and was transferred to the ward when she attained her majority at the price for which the guardian purchased it, it was said to be a case in which compound interest might properly be charged, but the case was disposed of by charging the guardian with the difference between the market value of the stock at the time of its purchase and that at the time it was transferred to the ward.

For investments in violation of statute, see infra, IV. J.

g. Unnecessarily calling in investment.

Where executors and trustees have violated their trust by selling out stock, and lend the proceeds to their friends upon personal security, charging themselves with the dividends as before, the beneficiaries have an option to have the stocks replaced or the money produced by the sales with interest at 5 per cent or more if more has been made by it, and the costs occasioned by their misconduct. Poock v. Reddington, 5 Ves. Jr. 704 (1801).

And an executor in trust for infants, who unnecessarily calls in the trust fund which was invested on good security at 5 per cent interest, and keeps large balances in his hands, using them as his own, is chargeable with interest at 5 per cent and the costs of the proceeding for an accounting. Mosley v. Ward, 11 Ves. Jr. 581 (1805).

So an administrator, who, without reason, had sold out stock specifically bequeathed to an infant, retaining the proceeds after an order for payment, was charged with compound interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum with annual rests from the date of the sale to the date of the decree. Walroad v. Walroad, 29 Beav. 586 (1861).

reports returned and approved by the court. When the partnership affairs were closed out, in 1888, and the estate received therefrom $4,350, the funds of the estate reached said sum of $19,818.43, as shown by the eighth annual report, returned that year, and approved by the probate court. The next annual report, returned in 1884, shows a balance of $18,425 on hand. Out of this sum, in addition to other demands, there was paid to the eldest child, March 5, 1885, the sum of $4,584, on her arriving at the age of majority. The annual report for the year 1885, after such payment, shows a balance of $11,980. Thereafter the annual reports show that the funds of said estate declined in amount, from year to year, by disbursement of annuities, current expenses, and the payment of two additional legacies to the second and third of said minor children, respectively, as they arrived at adult age, until 1891, when, as the report for that year shows, the funds of said estate were practically exhausted. The funds of said estate were not invested in government securities, as directed by the testator in the will. The circumstances which are claimed to have justified the court in ordering a departure from the provision of the will in that respect, as disclosed by the record, appear to be as follows: That the investment of the funds in United States government securities at the time in question would have required the payment of about $3,000 premium. That said premium would, of course, have reduced the funds of the estate by that amount; and that, with such reduction of the fund, the annual income from investment of the remainder in government securities would, according to the testimony, have been at the rate of 5 per

h. Neglect in winding up or paying over.

Executors, trustees, etc., are not usually held liable for anything more than simple interest for mere neglect in winding up the trust or paying over to the persons entitled to payment, unless they have received more.

This was held with reference to neglect to pay over by executors and administrators, in Black v. Blakeley, 2 McCord, Eq. 1 (1827).

And in Re McCall's Estate, 1 Ashm. 357 (1830), it was held that an administrator is not chargeable with compound interest upon balances remaining in his hands after the expiration of the first year.

So a trustee is not liable to pay compound interest for a mere failure to pay over trust funds, without any breach or abuse of his trust, when it does not appear that he used them or made any profit from them. Price v. Holman, 135 N. Y. 124 (1892).

And an executor will not be charged therewith for delay in paying over funds of the estate caused by his disputing the claim of the person entitled thereto, where more was claimed than the claimant was entitled to. Ibid.

Or on the value of land of his testator, which he has failed to reduce to possession, where adverse possession thereof was taken by others soon after testator's death, and he has at no time had funds in his hands with which to prosecute a claim for its recovery. Wheeler v. Bolton, 92 Cal. 159 (1891).

And the treasurer of a corporation, who fails to pay over to it moneys which he has collected, is not liable in equity for more than 6 per cent interest thereon, where the bill does not seek to recover the profits he has made though the corporation was thereby compelled to borrow money and to pay a greater rate therefor than 6 per cent. Parker v. Nickerson, 127 Mass. 437 (1864).

So a delay in the payment of legacies from June to September of the same year out of a fund paid by executors to themselves as trustees for that purpose, followed by a delay caused by the pendency of an action then brought, during which the funds were kept invested by making call loans at the usual rates, the pendency of such action preventing permanent loans, is not a sufficient ground for charging the trustees with compound interest. Ames v. Souder, 11 Mo. App. 168 (1881), 83 Mo. 189 (1884).

Ames v. Souder, supra, distinguishes Re Davis's Estate, 62 Mo. 450 (1876), under heading, Use and admixture of trust fund, upon the ground that in that case the executor had in hand a large surplus which he kept for three years after the debts of the estate had been paid, mingling the money with his own and using it for his own benefit, while in the suit at 29 L. R. A.

bar the executors were prevented from making permanent investments by the pendency of the suit and so invested by making call loans at the current rate for such transactions.

And in English v. Harvey, 2 Rawle, 305 (1830), it was held that an executor or guardian is liable for the interest which actually comes to his hands only, and cannot be charged with compound interest for neglect to put it out or pay it over.

So in Nelson v. Hagerstown Bank, 27 Md. 51 (1867), it was held that a trustee for the benefit of creditors, who withholds trust funds from parties to whom they are due because of an alleged lien claimed under a defectively executed instrument afterwards held to constitute evidence of a more general indebtedness of the estate only, is only answerable for the amount of interest received by him.

But he must make the estate good and may be charged with compound interest where other derelictions of duty concur with the failure to close up or pay over.

Thus, an executor who permits debts bearing 5 per cent interest to run on where he has in his hands a fund with which to pay them is chargeable with interest at that rate. Hall v. Hallet, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 134 (1784).

And an administrator who sold property of the estate on credit, receiving notes of solvent persons therefor, some of which were paid and the makers of the others remaining solvent for several years, during which they might have been collected and the estate closed, may be properly charged with compound interest upon the amount uncollected upon a forced settlement made fifteen years afterward. Scott v. Crews, 72 Mo. 251 (1890).

And an assignee for the benefit of creditors is properly charged with compound interest annually on an amount found due by him on the filing of his final report during a delay which was primarily caused by his failure to render a correct account of the affairs of the estate, especially when the delay could have been avoided by his disbursing the money among the creditors as it was his duty to do under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, § 337. Re Murdoch (Mo.) 51 S. W. Rep. 943 (1896).

And in Treves v. Townshend, 1 Bro. Ch. 385, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 50 (1784), it was held that the assignee of a bankrupt who kept money of the assigned estate in his hands for several years making no dividend thereon for the estate, was chargeable therewith with 5 per cent interest.

So an administrator who makes but a partial distribution, retaining a large sum in his own hands on unfounded pretences for nearly forty years, the suit for an accounting having been protracted in a cent interest during the first part of the administration, which rate was reduced to 4 per cent during the latter part of that period; but, considering the sacrifice of premium, the rate of interest derived from said investment would have been, on the whole, about 8½ per cent. That the income thus obtainable, as was plain, would fall far short of sufficient to meet the required annuities and other demands upon the funds of said estate. That from these conditions, apparent at the beginning of the administration, as well as at all times thereafter, it was manifest that to carry out the provisions of the will requiring such funds to be placed in government securities, and only the interest derived therefrom used, as was evidently contemplated by the testator, and at the same time carry out the other provisions of the will as to the maintenance of the family, was impossible, because the amount required for the maintenance of the family alone was $2,400 per year, in monthly installments, for the first five years, and thereafter $3,000 per year, in monthly installments, for four and one-half years, until the eldest child became of age, which would require, during the first nine and one-half years of the administration, the payment of $25,500 for maintenance of the widow and children; and, if this had been the only demand on the funds of said estate, it was manifestly impossible to put the estate funds, available at any time, into government securities, and leave the same in such investment, and make those payments. That, if the funds of the estate had been invested in government securities, it would have been necessary for the executor to sell and convert into money, from time to time, sufficient thereof to raise funds, in addition great measure by his fault, is chargeable, notwithstanding the lapse of twenty years before effectual suit was brought for an accounting, with full legal interest on the fund remaining undistributed during the whole period of retention, with the costs of the suit subsequent to the original decree, the account to be taken with annual rests with interest to be charged on annual balances. Stacpoole v. Stacpoole, 4 Dow, P. C. 209 (1816).

And an executor who, acting as such, pays himself a debt claimed to be due him personally from the estate, which claim is afterwards disallowed on appeal, is chargeable with simple interest on the amount thereof during the time the matter was in litigation, and with compound interest thereafter until paid. Clement's App. 49 Conn. 519 (1882).

An executor having a large available balance in his hands more than sufficient to pay all legacies, who pays but few of them, and sells stock and deposits the moneys in bank with his own, is guilty of a direct breach of trust for which he is chargeable with 5 per cent interest with annual rests, where he was engaged in trade, though he claims that he did not employ any portion of the moneys in trade. Williams v. Powell, 15 Beav. 461 (1852).

1. Nonperformance of trusts for accumulation.

The liability of executors, trustees, etc., for compound interest, or for such interest as should have been made, for noncompliance with the requirements of a trust for accumulation when they make use of the trust fund for their own benefit and give no account of the profits made by them, would seem to be beyond question.

Thus the rule that compound interest should be allowed in such case was laid down in Perkins v. Hollister, 59 Vt. 348 (1887), and the same was held in Spencer v. Popham, 5 Redf. 425 (1881); McKnight v. Walsh, 24 N. J. Eq. 498 (1879), 23 N. J. Eq. 136 (1872).

So an executor of a will directing the investment of a fourth part of the testator's estate for the benefit of a daughter and the payment semiannually of a part of the income thereof, the other three fourths going to the executor, who kept no separate trust fund and mingled the trust property with his own, and used it for his own profit, and managed the estate as though he owned it, ignoring her rights and paying her nothing on account thereof, and keeping no account with her, is properly chargeable with interest upon the trust fund at the legal rate computed with annual rests. Cook v. Lowry, 29 Hun, 20 (1883).

And a trustee of a trust fund consisting of a debt due from a firm of which he was a member, who disobeys a positive direction to call in the trust fund upon the death of the mother of the beneficiaries, and invest it in the trusts of the settlement, where it would have produced compound interest, and permits it to remain in the business of his firm for a long time, is chargeable with compound interest at 5 per cent with annual rests. Jones v. Foxall, 15 Beav. 888, 21 L. J. Ch. 725 (1852).

And an executor, who collects and applies to his own use all the interest on $1,000 directed to be invested as a legacy, should be charged interest on each $1,000 interest collected by him from the time of its reception, whether it be interest upon the principal or upon previously accumulated interest, as when the interest had accumulated to that sum there could be no excuse for not investing it. Male v. Williams, 48 N. J. Eq. 38 (1891).

So in Ringgold v. Ringgold, 1 Harr. & G. 11, 13 Am. Dec. 250 (1836), it was held that compound interest will be allowed against a trustee where he is directed to invest funds and reinvest the dividends, or where the trust directs an accumulation and the trustee has used the funds.

And in Crackett v. Bethune, 1 Jac. & W. 586 (1820), in which an executor, who was directed to lay out testator's personality in funds, unnecessarily sold out stock, keeping large balances in his hands and resisted payment of debts by a false pretense of outstanding demands, he was charged with 5 per cent interest, but the court held that it was not a case for rests.

So an executor under a will directing an accumulation, who renders no account of the disposition of the fund or what he received, is chargeable, after allowing six months for receipt and investment, with annual interest on the principal sum and upon the annual amounts of interest from the time they fall due while the capital remains in his hands. Voorhees v. Stoothoff, 11 N. J. L. 171 (1829).

And in Raphael v. Boehm, 11 Ves. Jr. 92 (1805), an executor directed not to derive any advantage from keeping money in his hands without accounting for legal interest and to accumulate for the benefit of the cestui que trust, who used the funds for his own benefit, was charged with 5 per cent on all sums received by him computed with semiannual rests, the court saying that an executor directed by the will to accumulate cannot account as if the money had been laid out in the manner directed, if it was not so laid out, or if it was so laid out and he had sold out at an advance.

And that ruling was reaffirmed and approved in Raphael v. Boehm, 13 Ves. Jr. 407, 580 (1807).

So compound interest may be charged where a guardian or trustee is directed by the will of the testator creating the trust to place the trust funds at interest and upon the receipt of such interest to

to the income, to pay the annuities and other demands on said estate. That therefore it appeared impossible for the executor, or any person charged with the execution of said will, to carry out the provisions thereof, and that to attempt such procedure would have been inexpedient, in view of the necessities of the family.

In view of these conditions, as appears from the record, soon after the return of the appraisal and inventory, on July 21, 1875, an application was presented to the probate court having jurisdiction of said estate, setting forth that the funds thereof, as shown by the inventory and appraisal, amounting to about $18,000, were on deposit in the First National Bank, People's National Bank, and L. H. Hershfield & Bro.'s Bank, of the city of Helena, respectively, where the decedent had deposited the same in his lifetime, drawing interest at the rate of 12 per cent per annum, and asking the court to make an order "directing said money to remain in said banks, respectively, on interest, during the term of the administration of said estate, or, at the option of said executor, during said term;" whereupon the court, after consideration of said application, made an order "that the request of said petitioner be granted; that the deposits, on time, of such moneys of said estate, drawing interest for the estate in such banks, be, and is hereby, approved." Thereafter the administration of the executor proceeded from year to year during the course of sixteen years, with annual accounts returned into court, verified by the affidavit of the executor, showing, in detail, receipts and disbursements in respect to said estate. Such accounts appear to have been considered and put it out again at interest in like manner, etc., which he wilfully fails to do, when to do it would have been practicable. Dictum in Lukens's App. 7 Watts & S. 48 (1844).

Many of the cases have gone farther, however, and adopted the rule that the trustee is liable for compound interest, or such interest as should have been made, for failure to execute an express trust to accumulate, though he did not use the trust fund and without reference to the question of his intention.

This was expressly held in King v. Talbot, 50 Barb. 458 (1867).

And in Knott v. Cottee, 16 Beav. 77, 16 Jur. 753 (1858), it was held that a trustee directed to accumulate, who makes an unauthorized and improper investment, but retains no benefit to himself, is chargeable with 4 per cent interest with annual rests.

And in Salisbury v. Colt, 37 N. J. Eq. 493 (1876), a failure by executors against the testator's intention to separate a legacy from the estate and invest it was held to be such a violation of trust as will justify charging them with compound interest.

And in Hough v. Harvey, 71 Ill. 72 (1873), in which the executor who was authorized to sell real estate and invest the proceeds for the benefit of the devisees held the money realized without making any investment or rendering the annual account required by law, but it did not appear that he had used the money or put it out at interest on his own account, an allowance of 10 per cent was refused and one of 6 per cent with annual rests was made.

So it is the duty of executors of a will, giving a legacy to an infant to be put out on bond and mortgage and paid when the infant attains his majority with the interest accruing thereon, to compound the interest by also investing it as soon as practicable, and when one of them lends the money set apart for the legacy to the other on insufficient security, he is liable for the amount with compound interest, and such liability is not affected by the fact that he stated such investment in his account to the orphan's court. Perrine v. Petty, 84 N. J. Eq. 198 (1881).

And executors directed by testator's will to sell his lands and invest the proceeds in bank stock or such other property as they may deem most advantageous to his children, who sell the lands, but do not invest the proceeds, but account therefor in money, are chargeable with interest on the annual balances in their hands, and their disbursements should be defrayed from the interest thus accruing. Garrett v. Carr, 3 Leigh, 407 (1833).

So executors directed to sell the whole estate on a credit of one, two, and three years, and invest the proceeds in stock to accumulate until certain of the legatees should come of age, who sell the property but fail to make any investment in stock and return no account of their administration, are chargeable with the whole amount of the sale with interest until the payments become due, after which the interests should be compounded with annual rests. Edmonds v. Crenshaw, Harp. Eq. 224 (1824).

And executors who are also legatees, who are directed by the will to apply the interest on a legacy to the use of a legatee annually, will be charged with interest on the arrears of interest due on such legacy, when at their request the court suffered it to remain in their hands because the estate was much in debt. Bowles v. Drayton, 1 Deasau. Eq. 489, 1 Am. Dec. 689 (1796).

So in Dornford v. Dornford, 13 Ves. Jr. 137 (1806), it was held that the estate of an executor in trust with a direction to accumulate, who retains the funds of the estate and becomes bankrupt, is chargeable with interest at 5 per cent with periodical rests.

But in Tebbs v. Carpenter, 1 Madd. 290 (1816), it was said that in Dornford v. Dornford, supra, compound interest was not directed.

So trustees to whom a debt was assigned in trust to call in an investment in Indian securities and accumulate, who neglected to take proper steps to call in the fund, and the debtor became insolvent and a considerable portion of the debt was lost, are chargeable with the amount lost, and should make good the accumulation which would have been produced, and pay the costs of the proceeding for an accounting. Byrne v. Norcott, 13 Beav. 326 (1851).

And in Wilson v. Peake, 3 Jur. N. S. 155 (1856), it was held that a trustee of an express trust to accumulate a legacy at compound interest for twenty-five years is chargeable with interest at 4 per cent, which is the usual rate which should be compounded until the expiration of twenty-one years, after which simple interest only should be allowed.

Wilson v. Peake, supra, however, is distinguished and explained in Re Emmet's Estate, L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 142, 50 L. J. Ch. 241, 44 L. T. N. S. 172, 29 Week. Rep. 464 (1881), the court saying that that case must be viewed with reference to its own facts, and particularly to the trust for accumulation which came to an end through the operation of the Thellusson Act, by which the accumulation could go no further than the twenty-one years, and that was the foundation of the judgment.

And in the latter case it was held that a trustee approved by the probate court, as provided in the Probate Practice Act (sections 260-270); but in this proceeding those accounts were all open to any question which the petitioner desired to raise against them (Probate Practice Act, § 269). Under this privilege a large number of specifications were formulated, and filed in this proceeding, contesting the correctness and good faith of said accounts. The evidence shows, however, that there was no attempt to sustain these charges by proof, with but one exception, and that was in respect to an item of $400 credited in one of the executor's annual accounts for money claimed to have been paid out, on behalf of the estate, to a person employed at the partnership ranch of testator and said M. A. Price, as housekeeper. In this single attack upon the integrity of the executor's accounts, the court below found against the accusation; and the evidence, as reported in the record, appears to be overwhelmingly in favor of the executor; so that, as a result of opening to the assaults of petitioner the sixteenth annual accounts returned, from time to time, by the executor, and approved by the probate court, such accounts appear to stand unimpeached in every item. These accounts are in the record before us, and, after approval by the court, are, by statute, made evidence of their showing, subject, however, to be impeached on being opened to contest. Ibid. But, after passing through such contest without any disparagement, such accountings must, with more force, be considered as evidence of the showing therein made. Therefore, the result of the management of said estate by the executor, herein set down, is taken from said accounts, wherefrom it appears that during under a will holding a fund which, after the determination of a life interest, he is directed to transfer and pay to a child upon his attaining his majority, and in case of the expiration of the life interest to apply the income to the support and education of the minor, who retained the fund after the child reached his majority without making any arrangement with him, or explaining his rights, the life estate having previously determined, will be deemed to have continued to hold the fund upon the same trusts and with the same obligation to accumulate, and is accountable therefor with compound interest.

This doctrine, however, is not universal, and seems to have been repudiated by some of the cases which have adopted the rule that failure to obey a direction to accumulate, with nothing more, is mere negligence and not misfeasance.

Thus in Tebbs v. Carpenter, 1 Madd. 290 (1806), it was held that an executor directed by testator's will to put the funds of the estate, after payment of expenses and a designated annuity, out into 4 per cents for the purpose of accumulation and division, who fails to do so, but makes no use of and acquires no benefit from the trust fund, is guilty of negligence only, and not of such misfeasance as will warrant a charge of more than the usual rate of interest against him.

And in Amies v. Hall, 3 Jur. N. S. 584 (1867), a trustee under a will containing a direction to accumulate, with which he did not comply, was charged with simple interest at 4 per cent from one year after testator's decease.

So in English v. Harvey, 2 Rawle, 305 (1880), it was held that an executor directed by the testator's will to put the trust fund at interest for the benefit of the legatee, and to put the surplus at interest and accumulate it after paying for his support and education, who fails to do so, is not chargeable with compound interest, but only with the amount of interest actually received.

And in Freeman v. Freeman, 4 Redf. 211 (1880), it was held that executors directed to invest a trust fund in bonds and mortgages in a particular state and locality, who with the consent of the beneficiaries took a mortgage upon property in another state, which was passed to testator's daughter by his will, which was not recorded in the latter state, thus constituting a defect of title, are not chargeable with compound interest upon the amount invested when they acted in good faith.

So in Wilmerding v. McKesson, 108 N. Y. 329 (1886), in which a trust was created by will directing the separate investment of the trust fund, and the surviving members of the firm of which the deceased and one of the trustees under the will were members continued, retaining the books, papers, and securities belonging to the estate, and moneys realized from the estate were received by the surviving partners with the knowledge of the cotrustee, who was not a partner, and used in the business, after which the firm failed and the funds of the estate were lost, an allowance of compound interest against the cotrustee, who was innocent of wrongful intention, was denied, and he was only charged with interest at 5 per cent.

And in Ringgold v. Ringgold, 1 Harr. & G. 11, 19 Am. Dec. 265 (1826), it was held that trustees authorized to sell real estate and invest the proceeds in stock, who, instead of doing so, exchange it for other real estate, will not be charged with compound interest on the value thereof when they acted in good faith with no view of reaping any benefit to themselves.

And in Mousley v. Carr, 4 Beav. 49, 10 L. J. Ch. N. S. 380 (1841), it was held that a tenant for life who was also trustee under the trusts of a doubtful will, who neglected to make proper investments of the trust fund, but who did not know that it was a trust fund which it was his duty to invest, should be charged with interest at 4 per cent only, without costs.

So the executor or other trustee will not be charged with compound interest when to carry out the directions of the trust would have been impossible or impracticable.

Thus, simple interest only will be allowed against executors who have converted a fund in their hands to their own use, where it does not appear that, and it is doubtful if, it could have been compounded as the will directed. Cranston v. Wilsey, 71 Mich. 356 (1898).

And a guardian directed to put the surplus income of the estate from year to year at interest on good security, who fails to do so but mingles such surplus with his own funds and uses it a part of the time in his business, will not be charged with compound interest, where the yearly balances were so small that proper investments in the mode provided by them were not often afforded, and it does not appear that any suitable opportunity to invest ever came to his notice. Bapaize v. Hall, 1 Sandf. Ch. 369 (1844).

And an executor will not be charged with compound interest for neglecting to invest interest accruing on funds of the estate received by him, annually, according to the directions of the will, where he states in his account that he has tried to keep the fund, together with the accumulated interest, invested as required by the will, but has not been able to do so except as stated in the account, and there is nothing to disprove the allegation said period the executor accounted for $56,009.96 derived from said estate, including accumulations by way of interest on the funds on hand, from time to time. Out of this it is claimed by the executor, and not disputed, that he paid to the widow and minor children, and to the three children first arriving at the age of majority, annuities and legacies amounting to $45,288.51, and that the liabilities of the estate, as shown by the annual reports and accounts, approved by the probate court, consumed the rest of the funds of said estate. The increase of said estate, during administration, shown in this result, was largely by way of interest on the funds on hand from year to year. From this source the increase appears to have amounted to between $14,000 and $15,000. The interest is returned in gross sums in the annual accounts, but the rate, according to the testimony of a witness called as an expert accountant to investigate said annual accounts, amounts to 7.9 per cent per annum, compound, upon the funds on hand from year to year, on the average, for the whole period of administration. These results are not controverted by the petitioner, except as to the one item of $400, above mentioned, wherein the executor's account was sustained on the proof. Notwithstanding these results, the court found and adjudged, in this proceeding, that, in addition to the amount so accounted for, the executor ought equitably to account to the heirs of said estate for the further sum of $51,000 and upwards ($51,684.73) on the 1st day of June, 1891, and also for an undivided one-half interest in a certain tract of land in the city of Helena, the value of which is not specifically shown, but, from the testimony in the record, appears to be of large value. From this to show that he used the funds in his own business, or made any profit therefrom, or was guilty of any gross delinquency or violation of duty. Lansing v. Lansing, 45 Barb. 182 (1866), 31 How. Pr. 64 (1865).

And as a general rule all that can be imposed is what the trust would have produced had its terms been properly carried out.

Thus, in Clemens v. Caldwell, 7 B. Mon. 171 (1846), a trustee who failed to invest a trust fund in stock with the interest also as directed, but employed it in his own business, was held to be responsible for interest upon the annually accruing interest, where the directed investment was practicable; if not, then for such interest as would have been produced in the hands of an ordinarily prudent man.

And in Brown v. Sansome, 1 McClell. & Y. 427 (1835), in which trustees, to whom the personal property was bequeathed in trust to invest in government or real securities and to permit the interest to accumulate until it amounted to a designated sum, and then to lay out and invest the interest in government and real securities to be applied in the same manner as the principal, retained the trust moneys in their business, an inquiry was directed as to what the fund would have amounted to if it had been invested and accumulated as directed, and the trustees were decreed to pay the amount and charged with 5 per cent interest on the balance in their hands.

So a trustee, directed by the testator's will to invest in consols and accumulate the dividends, who invests in mortgage on real estate instead, is liable to make good the amount of stock which would have been purchased, together with the amount of accumulation which would have been produced by a proper investment of the dividends of such stock. Pride v. Fooka, 2 Beav. 480, 9 L. J. Ch. N. S. 284, 4 Jur. 213 (1840).

And an executor directed to deposit the income of a trust fund in some good savings bank or to devote it to some other safe investment, who fails to comply therewith, will, in the absence of evidence of intentional wrong or personal advantage acquired, be treated as if he had pursued the course required by the will, and charged, after the lapse of a reasonable time for investment, with interest at the same rate and compounded in the same manner as that which would have been realized had the direction been obeyed. Shepard v. Patterson, 8 Dem. 183 (1884).

And executors directed by the testator to lay out the residue of his estate in the purchase of lands or upon heritable or personal securities at such rate of interest as they should think reasonable, who lend the fund to one of their number on bond at 4 per cent, are chargeable with interest on moneys coming to their hands at the rate of 5 per cent when 5 per cent might have been made from heritable or government securities. Forbes v. Ross, 2 Cox, Ch. Cas. 113 (1788).

So a charge of interest upon interest against an executor under a will directing the estate to be put out at interest, which he did not do, is not a ground for reversal, when, if the executor had been treated as a borrower and annually charged with interest, and the interest and not the principal had been applied to disbursements, a larger balance would have been found against him. Handly v. Snodgrass, 9 Leigh, 484 (1838).

And the general rule that trustees will not be charged with compound interest when they do not appear to have made it has been applied to trusts to accumulate.

Thus, in Gilman v. Gilman, 2 Lans. 6 (1870), executors directed by the will to invest in United States government stocks, state, city, or town securities, or upon bond and mortgage, who, because of the objection of some of the legatees to United States government stocks and the difficulty of loaning upon bond and mortgage retained in hand large average balances for several years, holding them on deposit in different banks, were held not to be chargeable with compound interest thereon when it did not appear that they derived any other personal benefit therefrom than might have arisen incidentally to their credit from the possession of the deposits.

But see Hough v. Harvey, 71 Ill. 72 (1873), in which interest was computed with annual rests, though the executor did not appear to have used the fund.

Interest upon interest upon a legacy will not be allowed, however, unless it is plainly required by the terms of the will. Calloway v. Langhorne, 4 Rand. (Va.) 181 (1826).

As to what constitutes a direction to accumulate, it was held in Fowler v. Colt, 22 N. J. Eq. 47 (1871), that a will giving a fund in the hands of an executor, with its increase, constitutes a direction to the executor to accumulate by putting out at interest both principal and accrued interest, where the sum is large and the term of holding the trust is long; and in case of his failure to do so interest should be compounded against him with annual rests.

And in Myers v. Myers, 2 McCord, Eq. 214, 16 Am. Dec. 648 (1827), it was held that the receipt, by an executor directed by the will of the testator to have certain beneficiaries educated out of the profits of the estate, of rents and profits from the lands and profits from the labor of the negroes, constitutes an annual fund in his hands for the benefit of the cestuis que trust, upon which he is chargeable with interest unless he shows that he used it for that purpose.

judgment, and the order of the court overruling the executor's motion for new trial, this appeal is prosecuted.

In the review of the case here it is not proposed to enter upon an inquiry as to the legality of said order of the probate court of July 25, 1875, authorizing the executor to keep said funds in banks, at interest, instead of converting the same into government securities, nor as to what additional responsibility for the safety of such funds not so invested the executor and his bondsmen may have assumed by reason of such departure from the will, because neither party has drawn into consideration any such questions, as affecting the determination of this proceeding. Said order of the court allowing such departure from the letter of the will is only pertinent to this proceeding as part of the history of said administration. The executor would not be heard to question the legality of that order or allowed now to depart therefrom, to the detriment of said estate, nor has he sought any such position; and the petitioner, for obvious reasons, does not desire an accounting to proceed on the basis of the result which would have been obtained by investing in government securities, instead of accepting and retaining, along with the other heirs and legatees, the larger rate of interest acquired and paid over by the course pursued. Nor is it pretended that any loss whatever happened to the principal fund by reason of departure from the will. We observe, however, that the court below took occasion to animadvert upon that proceeding in strong terms of condemnation of the executor for procuring such order from the court, and appears to regard it, in some measure, as ground for finding that the ex-

But a will giving full power to the executors to dispose of any part or all of the property devised or bequeathed thereby which they might think best, and from time to time to make distribution among the wife and children of the testator, does not enjoin upon such executors the duty of putting out the balances in their hands from time to time for the purposes of accumulation, so as to charge them, upon failure to do so, with compound interest. Peyton v. Smith, 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 325 (1839).

And an executor directed by testator's will to manage his farms and distribute the profits thereof when his grandchildren shall arrive at full age is not chargeable with compound interest upon the annual balances in his hands; the will not directing the investment of the profits so as to make them productive, simple interest only should be charged. Lovett v. Thomas, 81 Va. 245 (1885).

So compound interest will not be allowed on a legacy where there is no express direction in the will that the legacy shall be invested in any particular securities, and in fact no valid investment has been made, though the legacy is directed to be paid with "accumulations of interest." Gravely v. Gravely, 25 S. C. 1, 60 Am. Rep. 478 (1886).

As to excuses for nonperformance of the requirements of the trust, see infra, VIII., heading, What sufficient to release from accountability.

1. Neglect or violation of duty imposed by statute.

The violation of some statutory duty by the performance of which compound interest might have been made justifies a charge of compound interest against the delinquent trustee.

Thus, under the Kentucky statute regulating the duties of guardians, requiring them to settle their accounts annually and to keep the money of their wards out at interest upon such security as the county court shall approve, if he uses the money he is bound to pay interest, and the interest which accrues annually becomes principal in his hands and bears interest for the ensuing year so long as he uses it, but if he cannot let the money he is not responsible for interest, and if he puts it out at interest and cannot collect interest annually so as to convert it into principal, as it is his duty to do, the interest does not become new principal until it is actually put out at interest or until the guardian uses it. Hughes v. Smith, 3 Dana, 238 (1834).

And it is the duty of a guardian to settle with the county court at least once in each year, and if he fails to do so, he should be charged with interest on the amount which would have been found against him in each year if a settlement had been made. Campbell v. Williams, 3 T. B. Mon. 123 (1826).

A guardian is not only liable for interest upon the principal of his ward's estate when he fails to invest within a reasonable time after it comes to his hands, but also for interest on interest when he unreasonably delays to invest it. Karr v. Karr, 6 Dana, 3 (1837).

And if he invests the money of his ward in permanent loans without taking security of any kind, where the statute declares that he shall be personally responsible for taking insufficient security he is chargeable with compound interest thereon where the same is thereby lost, from the time of the making of the loans. Clay v. Clay, 5 Met. (Ky.) 548 (1861).

The Kentucky statute requiring guardians appointed by the county court to settle the accounts annually adding the interest on the funds in their hands to the principal each year, however, does not apply to testamentary guardians, as they are not within the jurisdiction of the county court, leaving them liable to account in equity like other trustees and liable for such interest as they may make upon funds entrusted to them, or which they may be presumed to have made by faithful and prudent management. Maupin v. Dulany, 5 Dana, 559, 30 Am. Dec. 699 (1837).

So interest on a balance in the hands of a guardian for which he is to account under 1 Va. Rev. Code 1819, p. 407, §§ 7, 9, requiring guardians to account to the appointing court annually, and directing that any balance against the guardian may be put out at interest for the benefit of the ward upon such security as the court shall direct and approve, must be credited to the ward like other profits of the estate, and if the interest and other profit exceed the disbursements the surplus, whether it arises from interest or other profits, will constitute a balance against the guardian upon which, if he retains it, he must account for interest. Garrett v. Carr, 1 Rob. (Va.) 196 (1842).

And a guardian who has failed to account to the appointing court is chargeable with interest from the time and in the manner that he would have been charged if his account had been exhibited annually as required by law. Ibid.

So a guardian, who suffers nearly all the moneys of his ward to remain in the hands of his brother-in-law without any security and without approval of the court, and upon which no profits were made for the benefit of the ward, is chargeable with compound interest upon the moneys received by him, under the Illinois statute providing that guardians shall put to interest the moneys of their wards upon mortgage security to be approved by the court, the letting to be for one year, and the interest added to the principal each year. Gilbert v. Guphill, 34 Ill. 141 (1864).

executor ought to be removed. Thus, the action of the executor in that regard has been brought in question as bearing upon his good faith in making application for such order. Whatever additional responsibility for the safety of said fund may have been assumed by the executor in that matter, and whatever questions as to the legality of such departure from the direction of the will in that particular might be raised, if pertinent, we think the circumstances under which that course was adopted—the fact that it was decided upon to avoid foreseen sacrifice of thousands of dollars out of the limited funds of said estate, and, according to undisputed testimony, after consultation and approval by the widow, the only legatee then of mature age, and upon advice of able counsel affirming the legality thereof, and sanctioned by the order of the probate court, with the final return of interest to the beneficiaries in double the amount which could have been obtained from an investment as directed by the will—repels all attempted condemnation of the motive which prompted the executor to that course.

We therefore pass to the questions demanding determination in this case, which have been found entirely sufficient for our most patient and painstaking consideration. In proceeding with the consideration of these questions, and the law and authorities applicable, it must be borne in mind that in the case at bar the trustee has admittedly, at all times since he became executor, in respect to this estate, punctually, and as required by the conditions of the will, accounted for all of the principal fund of the estate which came into his hands, together with interest on such funds, from year to year, as the same

And a loan by a guardian of his ward's funds upon real-estate security without the direction or sanction of the county court, in violation of the statute, will be regarded as a wilful violation of duty for which he will be charged with compound interest upon any loss to the ward's estate growing out of the insufficiency of the security. Hughes v. People, 111 Ill. 457 (1885).

So compound interest must be allowed on an account of a guardian running through a number of years, under the Tennessee statute requiring guardians to account annually for interest on all sums in their hands. Jones v. Ward, 10 Yerg. 160 (1836).

And that there is no guardian of an infant appointed by reason of a fund in the hands of an administrator is not a ground for excusing the administrator from the payment of interest thereon during the administration, under the Florida statute under which interest is computed on annual balances of moneys retained by him. Sanderson v. Sanderson, 20 Fla. 232 (1883).

Money received and not reinvested according to law is presumed to be money retained by the administrator upon which he is required by the Florida statute to be charged with interest to be added to the principal annually. Sherrell v. Shepard, 19 Fla. 300 (1882).

And he is not relieved from liability therefor by the commencement of litigation against him, unless he then relieves himself by paying the money into court. Ibid.

k. Interest or profits made.

A trustee is accountable for all interest or profits actually received by him for the trust fund whether used in his private business or otherwise employed. Cruce v. Cruce, 81 Mo. 676 (1884); Perrin v. Lepper, 72 Mich. 456 (1888); Stephens v. Van Buren, 1 Paige, 479 (1829).

Thus, an administrator should be ordered to pay interest on money in his hands belonging to the estate on which he has made interest. Perkins v. Baynton, 1 Bro. Ch. 375 (1784).

And interest must be calculated against a trustee upon funds properly invested in authorized securities, at the rate actually yielded. Re Emmet's Estate, L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 142, 80 L. J. Ch. 841, 44 L. T. W. S. 173, 29 Week. Rep. 164 (1881).

So in Childress v. Childress, 49 Ala. 237 (1878), and Brand v. Abbott, 43 Ala. 499 (1886), the rule was laid down that it is the duty of a guardian in Alabama to charge compound interest upon debts after maturity, and for any compound interest received by him he is chargeable.

And in Jennison v. Hapgood, 10 Pick. 77 (1830), 29 L. R. A.

compound interest with annual rests was charged against an executor who had been in the habit of demanding and receiving compound interest.

And in Foster v. Foster, 2 Bro. Ch. 616 (1788), it was held that an admission of assets with which to pay rents by an executor of a receiver of an estate makes him liable for interest if any was made.

A guardian who has not been guilty of any gross abuse of his trust is not liable to account for more than simple interest upon the funds of his ward, however, unless he received compound interest thereon. Vaughan v. Bibb, 45 Ala. 153 (1871).

And the same rule applies to an executor or trustee. Atty-Gen. v. Alford, 4 DeG. M. & G. 843, 1 Jur. N. S. 361 (1855).

And substantially the same rule is held in Tyson v. Sanderson, 45 Ala. 368 (1871); Starling v. Balkum, 47 Ala. 514 (1873).

And in Ex parte Strutt, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 439 (1788), it was held that a special case must be made to charge an assignee in bankruptcy with a greater rate than 4 per cent on money retained in his hands, —as, that he has made a greater profit from them.

And the same was held of executors, in Tebbe v. Carpenter, 1 Madd. 260 (1816).

So in Re Harland's Accounts, 5 Rawle, 823 (1836), it was held that guardians are chargeable with the interest actually made on sums invested only, where the estate has been properly managed, and there is no evidence of admixture, or use, or unnecessary delay in settlement.

But an order for the taking of an account against a guardian who had not received compound interest, authorizing the master to charge either simple or compound interest, though erroneous so far as it authorizes a charge of compound interest, is without injury and not a ground for reversal when the master charges simple interest only. Tyson v. Sanderson, supra.

l. Interest or profits which might have been made.

A trustee is accountable for such interest or profits as he might have obtained by the exercise of reasonable skill and exertion in the management of the trust fund, whenever the character of his trust or the relation which he holds to the fund requires him to make it productive. Cruce v. Cruce, 81 Mo. 676 (1884); Frost v. Winston, 33 Mo. 499 (1862); Stephens v. Van Buren, 1 Paige, 479 (1829).

Thus, in Re Guardianship of Thurston, 57 Wis. 104 (1883), the general rule is stated to be that a guardian should be charged with compound interest only in cases of fraud or flagrant breach of trust, but if he fails to invest the trust fund in his hands so as to derive an income from it when he should have done so, he should be charged with remained in his keeping, at rates which, according to the testimony, equaled, on the whole, 7.9 per cent compound. These results are admitted. The trial court, in treating the propositions involved in this case, "granted that, as a result, more profit and gain inured to the widow and children than the testator contemplated when he made the will." So, counsel for petitioner, in treating this appeal in their brief, say: "As a matter of fact, the appellant, in his reports returned to the probate court, has charged himself with compound interest with semiannual rests, whereas the directions of the court below to the referee, which were respected in the computation, called for annual rests only." It is therefore apparent that there is no contention that this executor has failed to account for all the property and funds committed to his charge, together with interest on the funds at the rates mentioned. But it is contended that he should be required to pay a higher rate of interest than he has returned, on such part of the estate funds as were, from time to time, in his hands, not deposited in bank at interest, as provided by said order of court. That demand is the only basis of claim made against the executor in this proceeding, and thereon rests said judgment for the recovery of money, as well as the decree impressing a trust in favor of the heirs in certain lands of the executor, as aforesaid.

1. With this premise, it is first to be inquired whether the law warrants the court in declaring a trust interest in lands of the executor in favor of the heirs upon the proposition that at a certain time he paid, in the purchase thereof, moneys in his hands belonging to the estate. It is found in this case that at a certain time in 1883 the execu-simple interest at the legal rate, although such failure may not have been the result of any fraudulent intent or wilful disregard of duty.

So a guardian, who failed to invest the estate of his ward and during the course of a long guardianship had its management and use, was held chargeable with compound interest thereon, in Boydton v. Dyer, 18 Pick. 1 (1836).

And in Ryan v. Blount, 1 Dev. Eq. 382 (1830), it was held that a guardian is ordinarily chargeable with compound interest upon the moneys of his ward in his hands, but may be exempted from it by proving that after suitable exertions he was unable to realize it.

And in Atty-Gen. v. Alford, 4 DeG. M. & G. 848, 1 Jur. N. S. 381 (1855), it was held that an executor or trustee will be charged with such interest only as he has received, or which he ought to have received, or which it is to be fairly presumed that he did receive; and misconduct on his part does not as a general rule warrant such a presumption.

And in Browne v. Southouse, 3 Bro. Ch. 107 (1790), it was held that an agent of an administrator, who keeps money of the intestate in his hands when he is under duty to lay it out from time to time, is chargeable with interest thereon. But there was nothing to show whether it was compounded or not.

So the court may order a trustee to invest the proceeds of a sale in his hands so as to be productive during pendency of a litigation as to their disposition, and if he fails or refuses to obey the order, he may be ordered to bring in the whole amount with compound interest from the date of the order directing the investment. Latimer v. Hanson, 1 Bland, Ch. 81 (1826).

And a person holding funds of another for the purpose of investment and reinvestment, who mingles them with his own, may be charged with interest upon interest when he forebore investment and used the money for his own purposes. Re Kernochan, 104 N. Y. 618 (1897).

But a trustee will not be held responsible for more than legal interest because he might have loaned the trust funds at such rate, as a court of equity will not hold him responsible for a refusal to violate the law by loaning at a usurious rate. Montjoy v. Lashbrook, 3 B. Mon. 261 (1842).

And a guardian will not be charged more than the statutory rate of interest on moneys of his ward in his hands on proof that he could have loaned them at 1 per cent per month where he acts in good faith and does not make use of the funds for his own profit, as he is justified in loaning at the statutory rate and has the right to determine for himself whether he will do so or take the risk of can-ing at the increased rate. Guardianship of Cardwell, 55 Cal. 187 (1880).

Nor will compound interest be charged against a trustee when no realization of profits on the assets appears, nor any withdrawal of funds from their legitimate channels of accumulation, and there is nothing from which a presumption might arise that the assets would have been increased in any way if the line of duty had been more strictly followed. Ames v. Scudder, 11 Mo. App. 168 (1881), 88 Mo. 189 (1884).

And compound interest will not be allowed against a guardian of a spendthrift on a note due on demand from the guardian to the ward, in an action on the probate bond of the guardian, when the note is so small that the interest on it would not be a sufficient object to make new investments. Fay v. Howe, 1 Pick. 528 (1823).

V. Who are chargeable.

The decisions as to who may be regarded as trustees, so as to be held liable for compound interest in a proper case, are not numerous. It is universally conceded and taken for granted, however, as will be seen by an examination of the cases throughout the whole body of this note, that executors, administrators, ordinary trustees, and guardians are within the rule.

So the rule was applied to a receiver who had employed the moneys of the receivership in trade. In Utica Ins. Co. v. Lynch, 11 Paige, 524 (1845).

And to an assignee in bankruptcy, in Ex parte Strutt, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 439 (1788).

And in Re Murdoch (Mo.) 81 S. W. Rep. 942 (1895), it was held that an assignee for the benefit of creditors, who retains moneys of the assigned estate in his hands in violation of Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, § 887, requiring payment to the extent of the funds in hand within one month of the allowance of claims, and who mingles the funds with his own and deposits them in his own name and uses them in his own private business, may be charged with compound interest thereon.

So in Hazard v. Durant, 14 R. I. 25 (1883), it was held that an officer of a corporation, who misappropriates the corporate funds and converts them to his own use, is liable as a trustee to the stockholders, but he will be charged with simple interest thereon only, and not with compound, when it does not appear that he made profit in excess of simple interest.

And in Robert's App., 32 Pa. 407 (1880), it was held that moneys received by a cotenant having title to the land of the cotenancy upon sale thereof by him are trust funds, and where he mingles such moneys with his own and uses them for his own benefit tor, in the course of his private transactions, bargained to purchase from Child & Young a tract of land in the city of Helena, Mont., for the agreed price of $10,000, paying, at the time of the bargain, the sum of $2,000, and obliging himself in the transaction to pay, at a certain date the following year, the balance, of $8,000, whereupon a deed was to be delivered by the vendors, conveying said land to the purchaser; that in the final consummation of such purchase, in 1883, the executor made use of $5,000 of said estate funds. This is disputed, and the finding is excepted to as not sustained by proof; but we pass over this dispute, and consider the fact as found, together with the other facts existing in the case. It also appears without dispute, as above shown, that the executor has long since, and without any delinquency, accounted, as fast as the terms of the will directed, to the legatees for said $5,000 which is claimed to have been paid in the purchase of said land, with interest thereon at the rate of 7.9 per cent compound. Thus, the heirs have long since received and used said sum, with the interest returned thereon. And so, granting that said sum of money has been traced into the purchase of said land, it has also been traced out of and beyond said land, into the hands of the legatees, in the execution of the trust. Still, it is insisted that the heirs of said estate are entitled to a half interest in said land. This involves a peculiar situation. It plainly requires the trustee to carry an interest in the land, for the benefit of the heirs, for years after they have admittedly been paid, not only all the principal of the trust fund, which is claimed to have been paid into the purchase of said land, but interest thereon. This would seem

he is chargeable, on settlement of his account with his cotenant, with interest upon the amount received and with interest upon interest.

And that a husband may be a trustee for his wife, and when thus acting he may be compelled in equity to account in the same manner, and becomes liable for compound interest for an abuse of the trust upon the same grounds as a stranger, was held in Walker v. Beal, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 743, 19 L. ed. 614 (1869).

So guardians of lunatics are chargeable with compound interest upon the trust estates in their hands in the same manner and to the same extent as guardians of infants, and bonds, etc., payable to them as such bear compound interest in like manner as bonds payable to guardians of infants. Spack v. Long, 1 Ired. Eq. 426 (1841).

And the rule was also applied to the committee of a lunatic, in Butler v. Jarvis, 61 Hun, 248 (1899).

So compound interest may be allowed on debts due from one partner to another, in case of bad faith, refusal to account, or private use of the money of the firm. Johnson v. Hartshorne, 52 N. Y. 173 (1873).

But not on balances against one partner and in favor of another. Ibid.

And compound interest is properly allowed in a decree for an accounting against a surviving partner by way of damages, where he has continued the partnership and resisted all attempts to ascertain its state, and wrongfully and persistently refused to account. Heath v. Waters, 40 Mich. 457 (1879).

But a partner who is to be paid interest on moneys advanced by him is not entitled to have his interest compounded on monthly balances. Ibid.

And no compounding of interest or computation with periodical rests should be made to the prejudice of either party in an adjustment of accounts in an action for an accounting by the representatives of a deceased partner against the surviving partners, who had continued the partnership business after their partner's death. Sangston v. Hack, 62 Md. 173 (1879).

A guardianship cannot be established for the purpose of holding the alleged guardian liable for compound interest for failure to invest the trust fund as required by testator's will, however, by proof that deceased had charged the alleged guardian with the special care of his children. Peyton v. Smith, 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 326 (1839).

And a direction in a will that the use of testator's property shall be in his wife, for her support and that of her children subject to the supervision of the executors, until a division can be conveniently made, does not constitute the executors the guardians of the children so that they can be held chargeable as such with compound interest for failure to invest the share of the estate belonging to the children. Ibid.

And annual rests should not be made in computing the amount due a mortgagee in possession accountable for rents and profits, where interest on the mortgage debt was in arrear when the mortgagee took possession, nor until the principal debt is entirely paid off. Bennett v. Cook, 5 Thomp. & C. 138, 3 Hun, 526 (1874).

VI. Jurisdiction to allow.

The allowance of compound interest against executors, trustees, etc., is undoubtedly a subject of equity jurisdiction. This would seem, from examination of the cases on the subject, to have been universally conceded and never questioned.

So probate courts have the same discretion within the scope of their jurisdiction, with reference to charging fiduciaries with compound interest on equitable principles, as appertains to a chancellor, subject always to correction for abuse. Price v. Peterson, 36 Ark. 494 (1883).

And in Cruce v. Cruce, 81 Mo. 676 (1884), it was held that probate courts are possessed, under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, § 232, authorizing them to exercise an equitable control in making executors and administrators account for interest received by them and accruing on moneys belonging to the estate loaned or otherwise employed by them, of the powers of a court of equity to exact compound interest from a delinquent executor.

The question of the allowance of compound interest in the settlement of the accounts of a guardian is one for the court, and a verdict of a jury, in response to an issue, that the guardian could have put the money out at loan and collected it promptly without delay or suit so as to put it out again promptly and keep it steadily at interest from year to year, not well supported by the evidence, furnishes no basis for a judgment compounding interest annually. Reed v. Timmins, 58 Tex. 84 (1878).

And the question of its allowance upon debts due one partner from another in case of bad faith, refusal to account, or private use of the money of the firm, is one of fact for the trial court, the decision of which is conclusive. Johnson v. Hartshorne, 52 N. Y. 173 (1873).

And the question of its allowance against an executor who takes out ancillary administration and sells lands in another state and brings the proceeds into the state of his domicile and that of the testator, is exclusively cognizable by the courts of the latter state. Jennison v. Hapgood, 10 Pick. 77 (1820).

to be allowing one to reap where he had not sown, and left the seed to the harvest. At least, it would be allowing the cestui que trust to have and use the trust funds, with interest thereon at the rate paid, for his maintenance, and at the same time require the trustee to carry an estate in the land in question for the benefit of the heir, without any of his funds remaining in said land. It has already been pointed out that the only ground of demand against the executor is that he ought to pay additional interest on such of the funds of the estate as were not kept deposited, at interest, in the banks, as will be more fully explained hereafter. By computing compound interest on such funds at a higher rate than the executor returned, a claim arises against him for a certain sum over and above the amount he has accounted for.

Now, counsel for petitioner insist that, when this sum arising from such compound interest equals the amount paid in the purchase of a certain tract of land by appellant during said administration, the heir has a right to take the land, at the purchase price, in lieu of an equal amount of the claim for interest against the executor. This is the position taken by counsel for petitioner in responding to the appeal by the executor, and also in the appeal by petitioner (which is consolidated with this), wherein petitioner's counsel urge their exception to the ruling of the court in refusing to decree a trust in favor of the heirs as to the whole tract of land above mentioned, and refusing, also, to declare a like trust interest, in favor of the heirs, in certain other tracts of land held by the executor. But the court impressed a trust upon lands of the executor

a. Methods of computing generally.

The general rule for the computation of interest against executors, trustees, etc., is to charge them as if the fund had been kept invested upon interest payable periodically, which interest had been received by him, and as if payments made by him had been made from the interest and principal thus received and in his hands when payments were made by him.

This rule was adopted in Spear v. Tinkham, 3 Barb. Ch. 218 (1847), with reference to executors mixing the trust fund with their own or neglecting to keep regular accounts of the investment and interest received thereon from time to time, the court holding that interest should not be computed upon the capital fund for a term of years with a deduction of the payments and the interest thereon.

So in Oswald v. Givens, Riley, Eq. 88 (1837), it was held that in the settlement of the accounts of an executor the payments made by him during the year are to be deducted from the charges against him, and the interest calculated on the balance for the ensuing year.

And in Miller v. Congdon, 14 Gray, 118 (1859), it was held that the account of an executor, who is also a trustee under the will to retain a legacy until the legatee attains her majority, paying her the interest or applying it to her use and maintenance, who fails to procure his discharge and makes no equal separation of the trust fund from the mass of the testator's estate, should be settled by adding the interest each year to the principal, deducting the payments made during the year, and taking the balance for the next year's principal.

So interest is chargeable on an administrator's bond on balances as they fall due, but not on the aggregate sum of principal and interest found due on a former accounting, and the question is not affected by an agreement of counsel to adopt such sum for the purpose of settling another estate. Chick v. Farr, 31 S. C. 468 (1889).

And the account of a trustee who has appropriated trust funds, against whom it is not necessary to compute compound interest in order to cover his gains, should be computed by deducting the disbursements for the year from the debits and receipts and using the result as the principal on hand for the next year, and deducting the interest on disbursements from the interest on debits and receipts and carrying the balance forward to apply on disbursements of subsequent years, and if the balance of interest for any year should be in favor of the trustee, it should be applied to a reduction 29 L. R. A.

of the debits chargeable against him in the succeeding year. Cruce v. Cruce, 31 Mo. 678 (1884).

So when a guardian has used the money of his ward he should charge himself in his annual account with interest from the time he received it, and the interest should be made a part of the principal, and interest should be computed on the balance then due up to the time for the next annual accounting. Bond v. Lockwood, 38 Ill. 213 (1864).

And the same rule was adopted in charging a guardian who had failed to invest the estate of his ward and during the course of a long guardianship had had its management and use, in Boynton v. Dyer, 18 Pick. 1 (1836).

And in Robbins v. Hayward (1832), referred to in 1 Pick. 522, it was held that when large sums of money have come to the hands of a guardian and no account has been rendered for many years, and rents from real estate and income from public stocks have been periodically received, his account should be settled with a rest for every year, including principal and interest, and the balance thus struck carried forward, to be again on interest, whenever the sum is large enough that a trustee acting faithfully and discreetly would put it in a productive state.

So where the terms of a testamentary trust provide that interest shall be added to the principal during the minority of the beneficiaries, and that from majority each beneficiary shall be entitled to the income of his portion, the share of each beneficiary becomes, on his attaining majority, a new principal, on which the trustee is chargeable with interest or dividends, a rest to be made at the date of majority of each beneficiary. McKim v. Hibbard, 142 Mass. 423 (1894).

In Jordan v. Hunt, 3 Hill, Eq. 145 (1836), however, it was held that a guardian who receives funds of his ward from time to time is not chargeable with interest on the funds received until the end of the year, when they are brought into the account and the balance in his hands after deducting the expenditures constitute the interest-bearing fund for the succeeding year.

And in Re Tutorship of Minor Heirs, 45 La. Ann. 184 (1890), it was held that a tutor should be charged, on the settlement of a tutorship, with legal interest on rentage and on the capital in his hands, and allowed credit of legal interest on all disbursements and indebtedness from their respective dates, without annual compound of interest.

And that interest on an amount converted by a trustee should be computed from the time the amount is found to have been due to the day when execution is awarded, without making a only in the one case above mentioned, where it was found that in 1888 the executor had used, in the purchase of said piece of land, estate funds equal to one half the purchase price, but which sum the executor had afterwards accounted for, with interest as aforesaid, without delinquency, in compliance with the terms of the will. He must, therefore, not only have accounted for said $5,000 which is claimed to have been paid in the purchase of said tract of land, but for a large amount of interest thereon, as it is not disputed that he returned 7.9 per cent annually, until such funds were entirely paid over to the heirs. To impress upon lands of the trustee a trust in favor of the beneficiary, under these circumstances, would be allowing him, not only the advantage of compound interest at rates determined on by the court, but would permit him to collect such interest by selecting lands out of the trustee's estate, purchased during the continuance of the trust, at the purchase price paid therefor years before. It would not only give the heirs the advantage of compounding interest against the trustee for having temporarily used trust funds, in order to draw away from him the profit of such use, but would also give them the further advantage of increasing that exaction by whatever rate the property so selected might vouchsafe, whether it be thirty, sixty, an hundred, or a thousand fold. Counsel for the petitioner undertake to sustain the decree of the court declaring said trust in the lands of the executor, and their contention is that the court ought to have gone further, and decreed to the heirs additional trust interests in the lands of the executor, by invoking the doctrine of equity that the trustee shall not be permitted to rest at the date of the commencement of the suit, was held in McKim v. Hibbard, 142 Mass. 422 (1896).

So in Scott v. Crews, 72 Mo. 281 (1890), it was held that an administrator who has paid out money for the estate should, upon being charged with interest with rests for an improper use of the funds of the estate, be allowed interest upon the amounts paid by him with the same rests and at the same rate.

Rests cannot be made by the master, however, unless so directed by the decree.

This was held in Webber v. Hunt, 1 Madd. 13 (1815), in a proceeding against a mortgagee in possession for an accounting.

But a decree directing the master, in taking an account against the executor, to ascertain balances in his hands at the end of each year and compute interest on such balances and make annual rests, charging him with interest after the rate and in the manner aforesaid upon such balances, requires that the interest computed on the balance due for the first year shall form a part of the balance due at the end of the second year, and upon which interest is to be then computed, and so on from year to year. Heighington v. Grant, 5 Myl. & C. 258 (1840).

And the object of a direction to compute interest at 5 per cent on all sums received, making half-yearly rests, in a decree against an executor directed not to derive any advantage from keeping the money in his hands without accounting for legal interest, and to accumulate for the benefit of the cestui que trust, is to charge compound interest; and the decree is properly executed when the executor has the whole property in his hands, by a computation of interest upon each receipt from the day it was received, the balance of the receipts with the interest so calculated and payments being struck at the end of the half year, and that balance so composed of principal and interest being carried forward as an item in the account producing interest. Raphael v. Boehm, 11 Ves. Jr. 321 (1806), 13 Ves. Jr. 407 (1807).

And a rest ought to be made, under a decree directing that in taking the accounts of a mortgagee in possession annual rests should be made, and that the rents and profits of the premises should be applied in reduction of the principal as often as they exceed the accrued interest, at the date of the receipt by the mortgagee of a sum in excess of the interest, though occurring in the interval between annual rests, and the subsequent annual rests should be computed from that date. Binnington v. Harwood, Turn. & R. 477 (1823).

But a decree for an accounting by a trustee will not be reversed on appeal because the master has made annual rests in the account without a direction in the interlocutory decree or otherwise to do so, when the facts stated in the bill and taken to be true by a default require rests in computing interest, and they are allowed by the master without objection, and his report is confirmed. Hurd v. Goodrich, 59 Ill. 457 (1871).

And the omission of the commissioner, in stating the accounts of an executor, to charge him with interest on annual balances in his hands, is a ground for surcharging and falsifying the accounts, executors being chargeable with interest on such balances generally. Burwell v. Anderson, 3 Leigh, 348 (1831).
